PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 101st CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, February 7, 1990

The House met at 12 noon.

Rev. Dr. Calvin V. French, pastor, Massachusetts Avenue Congregation, Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, Washington, DC, offered the following prayer:

O God and Father of us all: These are momentous times as the winds of freedom swirl in many lands. As this yearning for democracy unfolds before us, may it remind us of the freedoms we enjoy—freedoms so carefully crafted by our forefathers with Thy divine help. May we who are charged with protecting and defending the rights of the people be guided by that same spirit.

We approach our tasks knowing that there will be differences of opinion, but may we be one in spirit, and one in purpose, and may good will abide.

Amidst the noise and stress that surround us, help us to listen for Thy still small voice, that it may direct us to do that which is right.

Grant us integrity of character that we will not break faith with Thee or with those who look to us as leaders.

And now Father, bless the Republic and those who lead with wisdom and skill to implement our just intentions. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRANDY] come forward and lead the House in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. GRANDY led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

SOCIAL SECURITY

(Mr. BONIOR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. BONIOR. Mr. Speaker, there they go again. Back in 1981 the Republican Party and the administration in which the present President was Vice President decided to cut $200 billion out of Social Security.

In 1985, President—then Vice President George Bush—rushed to the Senate to break a tiebreaking vote on cost of living COLA's for Social Security, and in the 1980's they took tens of thousands of disabled people who were on Social Security off disability. They closed hundreds of offices across the country.

Recently they are suggesting that we privatize Social Security. The leadership on the Republican side of the aisle has suggested this idea. The President indicated the other day that it was an interesting idea.

Mr. Speaker, there they go again. The Democrats have fought for Social Security, created it and defended it—defended it for the last 55 years—and we will do the same for the next 55 years.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOL COUNSELING ACT

(Mr. PURSELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing H.R. 3970, the Elementary School Counseling Act that is the first of a series of bills I intend to offer which will strengthen our educational system.

Elementary teachers are overwhelmed with students that need early counseling.

Single parent families, drug and alcohol abuse, and other unprecedented stresses make it imperative that we assist the classroom teacher at the early stage of life.

The Elementary School Counseling Demonstration Act would provide demonstration grants to local school districts, to establish effective counseling programs.

My bill would make grants available for up to $200,000 per school per year, for up to 3 years. Demonstration grants would be made to urban, suburban, and rural schools.

Early elementary counseling and Head Start will greatly reduce the dropout rate, help the classroom teacher, and provide a higher standard of educational excellence that we need to compete in the 21st century.

Counselors are more valuable in the elementary system, where problems are identified in the early stages.

MORE ACTION, FEWER STUDIES

(Mr. TORRICELLI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, this week the President has announced a plan to study global warming. Since the President has come to office he has also asked for studies on competitiveness, space, a study of technology, of health care, agriculture, a study of rural America, education, and transportation. There is even, Mr. Speaker, a study on a thousand points of light.

All these studies can lead us to only one conclusion. There is no problem so big, so serious, and so immediate that the administration cannot duck it, hide from it, avoid it by some study or another, by some commission or board.

Mr. Speaker, we now know what it is the President had in mind when he said he wanted to be the education President. He wanted to educate himself, to study it, to have another commission, not to lead America.

Mr. Speaker, what we need is for the President to confront bold problems, to come up with answers, not to peer at America's problems behind a mounting pile of paper produced by another board and another commission.

KEEPING PROMISES TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

(Mr. THOMAS of Wyoming asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. THOMAS of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, in my last visit and communications from Wyoming people, there are two issues that seem to have the highest priority among all others. One is financial responsibility. They believe we spend too much, that we have too large a government, and that we are not responsible in our financial organization of that government.

The second priority is that we maintain and keep our promises that we have made to people, promises that have been made in terms of retirement, and specifically in terms of Social Security. The Moynihan proposal which has been talked about a great deal in the last number of days deals with both those issues.

One issue is the notion that we are hiding the real deficit by the Social Security trust fund. I agree that we are doing that, and if we are we should take it off. This is a government of the people, and we ought to share with everyone the real depth of that irresponsible deficit.

The other is to maintain a fund that will be able to meet the obligations and the promises that we have made.

Mr. Speaker, I support the President in his admonishment in that we should not mess around with Social Security. I hope we take heed in the Congress.

GEORGE BUSH'S PRESIDENCY: STUDY, STUDY, STUDY

(Mr. NAGLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NAGLE. Mr. Speaker, a disturbing trend is beginning to emerge as George Bush's Presidency enters its second year.

Plainly put, George Bush wants to study everything. Talk takes the place of action, public relations replaces public policy.

This week the topic was global warming: the President recommended a study but no action.

Last week, it was health care: after a decade of studies and after a decade of increasing crisis in America's health care system—the President used his State of the Union address to propose yet another study, this one to be headed by the Secretary of Health and Human Services.

The week before, the issue was rural development.

Mr. Speaker, rural America aches for meaningful action to meet its critical development needs. So we waited anxiously as the President unveiled his rural development plan. Its central component: creation of a Presidential advisory commission to study the development needs of rural America.

The list goes on. Last year education was the President's top priority. He summoned the Nation's Governors to an "education summit" where—over the course of 2 days—he talked about education, promised to study it further, and promptly adjourned the meeting.

The American people have a right to expect more than a "we'll get back to you" Presidency.

They deserve more than a President who seeks only to deflect and delay in order to defend his standing in the popularity polls because to make choices, to decide—to govern—is to run the risk of ruffling the feathers of somebody somewhere.

After 8 years of a President who played to the grandstands, the last thing this country needs is a President who wants to sit in the grandstands and merely watch the world go by.

FIFTY-FIVE PERCENT OF OUR ARMED SERVICES ARE MADE UP OF EITHER RESERVISTS OR GUARDSMEN

(Mr. SAXTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Speaker, earlier today Mr. MAZZOLI, Mr. HUBBARD, and I had the privilege of attending the ceremony wherein newly promoted Lt. Gen. John Conoway was sworn in as head of the National Guard. I think it is important to point out to the Members of the House that more than 55 percent of our armed services are made up of either reservists or members of the National Guard and that 50 percent of our combat forces are in fact National Guardsmen.

With all the talk about reducing the size of our Army and our armed services, it is more important than ever that National Guards and reservists be of high-quality people and highly trained.

To that extent I am pleased as I can be that Lt. Gen. John Conoway has been given the job of heading up that effort.

IEP THREATENS TAKEOVER BID OF CUMMINS

(Mr. McCLOSKEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, a shining example of American industrial competitiveness is the Cummins Engine Co. which has its headquarters in Columbus, IN. Cummins, with 7,000 workers in Columbus, is now threatened by a foreign raider.

The continued existence of Cummins, the largest independent diesel engine manufacturer in the world, is imperiled by a Hong Kong corporate raider with a history of disrupting companies to reap short-term profits. Industrial Equity (Pacific) Ltd. allegedly has threatened to commence a proxy contest or launch a takeover bid for the sole purpose of putting Cummins' stock in play. These tactics, which are the tools of trade for so-called greenmailers, have been used before by IEP to disrupt other U.S. companies' operations. Cummins has charged IEP with violations of the securities, antitrust, and racketeering laws.

Of course, not all corporate takeovers are bad. However, I believe Congress must ensure our laws are not violated by those seeking to make quick profits.

KEEP YOUR COTTON-PICKIN' HANDS OFF SOCIAL SECURITY

(Mr. CAMPBELL of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CAMPBELL of California. Mr. Speaker, Senator MOYNIHAN, and colleagues, I have a word on Social Security: Keep your cotton-pickin' hands off of it.

This proposal that will jeopardize the Social Security trust fund has caused concern among our senior citizens and among our younger citizens alike. They have good reason to worry whether there will be any money in the Social Security trust fund.

I put to you a very simple choice: Are you going to put money aside now so that there is money available for when we need it, or are you going to tell the American people, "Don't worry, come the next century we are just going to double or triple the tax rate and the people then will willingly pay for it?"

I think the people who rely on Social Security deserve an honest answer.

Mr. Speaker, there are two types of people in America, those who are over 65 and those who want to be over 65. To each of those groups we should tell them, "Your money is safe."

Do not mess around with Social Security; keep your cotton-pickin' hands off Social Security.

CLOSED CAPTION TELEVISION AND PUBLIC FACILITIES ACT OF 1990

(Mrs. LLOYD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, today it is a great pleasure for me to introduce the Closed Caption Television and Public Facilities Act of 1990.

My bill will provide access to the crucial information available via television for the deaf and hearing-impaired segment of our Nation's population.

Two years ago we were advised by the Commission on Education of the Deaf that the most effective way to assist persons who are deaf and hearing impaired is to better utilize closed captioning, that is, the appearance on screen of what is being said.

This important technology is available, and I believe it is high time that Congress mandates its use.

Mr. Speaker, nearly 38 percent of older Americans suffer from some loss of hearing and could potentially benefit from closed-captioning technology.

Mr. Speaker, by requiring public facilities to provide access to closed-captioning television, this legislation targets the badly needed assistance to the most vulnerable of all, deaf and hearing-impaired persons.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this legislation.

THE ROLE OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE IN THE WAR AGAINST ILLEGAL DRUGS

(Mr. LEWIS of Florida asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, for whatever reasons we have ignored a front of attack available to us in the war against the production of illegal drugs.

That point of attack is on the international trading field.

The U.S. Trade Representative could be doing much, much more.

Ambassador Hills has the tools and the opportunity at the trading table to get the message to our trading partners that we no longer tolerate complacency, or complicity, in the production of drugs.

A resolution I have filed today tells the Trade Ambassador that this Congress expects her to get tough and deal with the issue of illegal narcotics as an integral part of our trade policies.

Let us take the war to every front. Let us send a message no one can misunderstand. If you tolerate drug harvesting, you threaten your position on the world trading field.

IF IT WORKED FOR SEARS, ROEBUCK, WHY NOT FOR UNCLE SAM?

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, now that the Iron Curtain is a screen door, literally Pentagon cuts are in order although the Pentagon says, "Be careful, we have needs."

I would like to talk about a couple of those needs. Several years ago the Pentagon spent $2.5 million to study brain-injured soldiers at Louisiana State University. They took hundreds of cats and shot them in the head, and the conclusion was that, at the end of the study, if you shoot a cat in the head, it dies. The Pentagon coined a whole new clinical term; it is called catmort.

But the Army went a step further. They had 40 different sizes of women's shirts. So they spent $3 million to study the need for women's sizes in shirts. After the $3 million, they came up with 120 different sizes that are now rotting in warehouses all over the world.

Whatever happened to small, medium, and large? If it worked for Sears, Roebuck, why not Uncle Sam?

The bottom line here is we have a Pentagon out of control, and Congress is letting them get away with it. Cuts are in order. Let us start doing something for the people.

Enough is enough.

NATIONAL QUARTER HORSE WEEK

(Mr. SARPALIUS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. SARPALIUS. Mr. Speaker, there is something about the beauty, the majesty, and heritage of the American quarter horse. There are 2.8 million registered quarter horses in every State in the Union and in 62 countries in the world. More people participate in the American quarter horse activities than any other breed of horse in the world.

The national headquarters is located in the heart of my district, in Amarillo, TX. I am asking for your support in supporting Resolution 345 which will recognize the American quarter horse on their 50th anniversary designating the week of March 1 through 7 as "National Quarter Horse Week." I ask for all Members' support on signing on to this resolution.

RESPONSIBLE DEFENSE REDUCTION

(Mr. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend President Bush and Defense Secretary Cheney for proposing orderly and prudent reductions in the defense budget, one of only two proposed cuts in defense spending since the 1970s'. Proposed savings would result from large troop reductions, cancellation of 20 major weapons programs and closure of numerous military bases.

Almost every congressional district in the country will be affected by current and future proposals to cut defense spending. While I am always willing to fight against spending cuts which may affect Ohio citizens and my own constituents, I also realize that we must pay some price for freedom and peace around the world.

In light of the numerous job losses that will occur as defense spending is reduced, and the recent slowing of the Nation's economy, it is irresponsible for those who want new tax money not to support the President's call for reasonable and realistic cuts in defense spending. Those who are calling for swifter and deeper cuts are insensitive to the economic impact larger cuts would have on the economy. The slow, responsible restructuring adopted by the President and Secretary Cheney will allow the economy to not only absorb dislocated workers, but create more jobs.

THE CRIMINAL PROCEDURES REFORM ACT

(Mr. SANGMEISTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SANGMEISTER. Mr. Speaker, to sentence a person to death is a gut wrenching task to ask of 12 jurors, and as a former prosecutor of capital crimes I can tell you that supporting the death penalty is not all that easy. But despite all the money we spend, prisons we build, or drug wars we fight, every time a violator beats the system—whether because of endless Federal appeals or supressed evidence—the integrity of our criminal justice system is undermined and the morale of citizens and law enforcement officers is devastated.

This doesn't have to be the case though, Mr. Speaker. While I realize the delicate balance between due process and an effective criminal justice system, there are changes that can—and should—be made. For instance: First, implementing a limited death penalty for visible, Federal crimes; second, limiting Federal appeals in capital cases, if competent counsel is provided; and third, codifying current Supreme Court exceptions to the exclusionary rule.

Today, as the Senate and law enforcement groups convene in Washington to consider these topics, I will be introducing the Criminal Procedures Reform Act to implement these reforms. I invite all my colleagues who are interested in furthering this necessary dialog on crime to join me in this effort.

REPUBLICAN TASK FORCE PROTECTS SOCIAL SECURITY

(Mr. RIDGE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce the creation of the Republican Task Force To Protect Social Security. We need to send a message loud and very clear to the American people.

Like the emperor's new clothes, the Democrats' plan for Social Security is very revealing. Cut benefits and raise taxes. The response of the Republican task force is simple: We will not allow the Democrats to take Members back to the perilous days of 1983 and 1984 when Social Security was nearly bankrupt. We will not allow Democrats to put a dollar back in the left pocket of working America with reduced Social Security taxes, and take out $2 for increased sales tax or gasoline tax. We will not allow the Democrats to undermine the confidence of the elderly, justifiably, now in the system, nor will we allow them to jeopardize the future of Social Security benefits for short-term election year gain.

As members of this task force we will work together to ensure that the Social Security system remains sound, remains secure, and on a strong foundation, now and in the future. We invite our Democratic colleagues to join.

CONGRATULATING LIEUTENANT GENERAL CONAWAY

(Mr. MAZZOLI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, today I attended ceremonies, along with my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. HUBBARD], at the Pentagon at which John B. Conaway was promoted to lieutenant general in the Air Froce, and was also promoted to become Chief of the National Guard Bureau.

While I am always proud any time an American rises to heights in his or her profession, I was particularly proud today because John is a long-time friend of mine. John is a native-born Kentuckian, having been born in my colleague's district in Henderson, and John spent many of his formative years in my district in the city of Louisville when he was in charge of our Air National Guard at Standiford Field.

John is an outstanding military man, pilot, and commander; he is also an outstanding American and Kentuckian. I wanted to salute John and to extend praise to him and to his wife, Linda, and to their four children on a job well done. I wish John much luck in the years ahead.

SECRETARY CHENEY NEEDS UPDATE

(Mr. RAVENEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RAVENEL. Mr. Speaker, something curious happened at the Armed Services Committee meeting yesterday. I told Secretary Cheney again, as I have told this House, that we are not going to win the drug war until the military starts shooting down the drug planes. No shooting to be done, of course, until every precaution is taken to prevent mistakes. I told him that I hoped he was doing contingency planning for this eventuality. Mr. Speaker, do you know what that man told the committee? He said they were not going to be shooting down any drug planes because they "didn't know which planes were carrying drugs." Well, why don't they know? Last year this Congress designated the military the "lead agency for the detection and monitoring of air and sea drug smugglers." The military does know which planes and ships are carrying the drugs. Mr. Cheney, how come you don't know?

TRIBUTE TO LT. GEN. JOHN B. CONAWAY

(Mr. HUBBARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, at 10 a.m. this morning U.S. Senator TED STEVENS, of Alaska, Congressmen RON MAZZOLI, of Kentucky, and JIM SAXTON, of New Jersey, and I were among about 150 admirers of Lt. Gen. John B. Conaway attending his swearing-in ceremony as Chief of the National Guard Bureau.

The impressive Pentagon ceremony was also attended by dozens of our Nation's top military leaders.

President George Bush recently nominated Maj. Gen. John B. Conaway for the rank of lieutenant general and to serve as Chief of the National Guard Bureau. In this new responsibility Lieutenant General Conaway will be the senior National Guard officer representing the interests of the National Guard, consisting of 575,000 Army and Air National Guard soldiers and airmen.

I am very proud that General Conaway, a long-time friend of mine, was born in my congressional district at Henderson, KY, in 1934.

After graduating from Bosse High School, Evansville, IN, he attended the University of Evansville, IN, and graduated in 1956 with a BS degree in business administration. He continued graduate work at the University of Louisville and the University of Kentucky. In 1975 he received a master's degree in management and human relations from Webster College, St. Louis. General Conaway completed U.S. Air Force Commanders Safety School in 1969, Air Command and Staff College in 1971, Air University Commanders School in 1972, and the Industrial College of the Armed Forces in 1973. In 1986, General Conaway received an honorary doctor of laws degree from his alma mater, the University of Evansville, and, in 1988, was elected to the board of trustees of the University of Evansville.

At the University of Evansville, General Conaway entered the ROTC program and was commissioned a second lieutenant in the U.S. Air Force in 1956. After completing basic pilot training he attended advanced combat crew training, graduating in 1958. His next assignments were as an F-102 fighter interceptor pilot in the Air Defense Command at K.I. Sawyer Air Force Base and Kincheloe Air Force Base, MI. The general is a command pilot with more than 6,000 flight hours.

In 1960, he joined the West Virginia Air National Guard as a SA-16 pilot, flying a special forces operations mission. In 1963 he transferred to the Kentucky Air National Guard's 123d Tactical Reconnaissance Wing in Louisville, as an RB-57 pilot, and, in 1965, became an air technician flight training instructor in operations, flying RF-101's.

I am proud that General Conaway and I served together in the Kentucky Air National Guard for about 7 years.

He was called to active duty with the Kentucky Air National Guard in January 1968 and served in Alaska, Panama, Japan, and Korea. Upon deactivation in June 1969, he returned to the Kentucky Air National Guard as operations officer.

In October 1972, General Conaway was appointed air commander of the Kentucky Air National Guard. In December 1974, he was appointed vice commander of the 123d Tactical Reconnaissance Wing. His other assignments have included duty as wing director of operations, wing chief of safety, wing chief of standardization and evaluation, group commander, group deputy commander for operations, and squadron operations officer.

General Conaway was recalled to active duty as Deputy Director, Air National Guard in April 1977 and in April 1981 was named Air National Guard Director. He was reappointed to that position in April 1985 and was named to his current position as the first Vice Chief, National Guard Bureau, on July 20, 1988.

His military decorations and awards include the Air Force Distinguished Service Medal, Legion of Merit, Meritorious Service Medal, Air Force Commendation Medal, Army Commendation Medal, Air Force Outstanding Unit Award with one oak leaf cluster, Combat Readiness Medal with three oak leaf clusters, Air Force Organizational Excellence Award, Air Force Recognition Ribbon, National Defense Service Medal with one bronze service star, Armed Forces Expeditionary Medal, Armed Forces Reserve Medal with hourglass device, Air Force Training Ribbon, Small Arms Expert Marksmanship Ribbon, and Kentucky Distinguished Service Medal. He is also the recipient of the Air Force's Eugene M. Zuckert Management Award and the Air National Guard's Order of the Sword.

General Conaway was promoted and federally recognized as a major general on April 1, 1981.

General Conaway is married to the former Linda K. Narcavage of Mt. Carmel, PA. He has four children: Ellen, David, who is a lieutenant in the U.S. Navy, Daniel, and Bolyn. His talented and very attractive wife Linda and their four outstanding children, General Conaway's parents, and mother-in-law attended this morning's ceremony at the Pentagon.

MARINE MAMMAL PUBLIC DISPLAY REFORM ACT

(Mr. GOSS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, we need to clarify the Marine Mammal Protection Act when it comes to dolphin captures for public display.

The problem is clear. Under the MMPA, the Federal Government has the right to grant capture permits for dolphins—even in State waters that have been protected from such captures by State law.

When Congress passed the MMPA in 1972, its purpose was to protect dolphins and other marine mammals. Unfortunately—and ironically—this law has become a tool for the exploitation of dolphins.

It is increasingly possible to see federally permitted dolphin capturers plying the waters off coastal communities. Dolphins are becoming big business.

This situation has fueled the drive among citizens and elected officials to seek greater protection for dolphins at the State level. For instance, the State of Florida has protected specially designated areas along its coastline under the Aquatic Preserve Program.

However, the MMPA preempts States like Florida from enforcing their own, more stringent standards for marine mammal protection in State waters. Federal capture permits are granted—and dolphins are captured—in waters expressly protected by State law.

Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to correct this problem. My bill, the Marine Mammal Public Display Reform Act of 1990, would allow States to enforce their own, more stringent standards of dolphin protection in State waters. The legislation would give the States the right to say no.

I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort to make sure the Marine Mammal Protection Act lives up to its name.

CHINA'S MOST RECENT RESTRICTIONS ON OVERSEAS STUDY

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, the Chinese Government made a telling announcement yesterday. Chinese university graduates will now be required to work for 5 years before they become eligible to study abroad.

This announcement gives us further proof, if it were needed, that Congress should have followed the lead of this House and overridden the President's veto of H.R. 2712. In doing so, Congress would have sent a clear message that this country will not bow to threats from a brutish Chinese Government. It would have proven that Congress has not forgotten the Chinese Government's murderous crackdown on prodemocracy forces and its continued repression of dissent and freedom of speech.

President Bush told Congress that signing H.R. 2712 into law would threaten student exchange programs. He told us as an "old China hand" that because of his veto things would get better in China. The President was wrong. The Chinese Government's 5-year work requirement tells us that Congress was wrong in permitting George Bush to equivocate on defending the human rights of the Chinese students in this country.

A PROPOSED REDUCTION OF SOCIAL SECURITY REVENUES

(Mr. SCHIFF asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHIFF. Mr. Speaker, Senator MOYNIHAN deserves great praise for bringing public attention to a long-standing problem, and that problem is the misuse of the Social Security trust fund figures to conceal the actual budget deficit each year of the U.S. Government. However, although Senator MOYNIHAN has correctly pointed out a problem, he has not proposed a correct solution.

To do as Senator MOYNIHAN proposes, to reduce Social Security revenues to 1983 levels, threatens the ultimate collapse of the Social Security system. The Social Security revenues were set to insure that benefits would be available to Americans when they reach Social Security retirement age.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Moynihan plan to subvert those revenues should be rejected by the Congress.

THE ADMINISTRATION SURRENDERS ON TRADE ISSUE

(Mr. GEJDENSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, the President in today's business section of the Post announced surrender. The headline says, "The President Vows to Resist Calls for Managed Trade." What he has just done is laid our cards on the table.

As the Europeans band together to give an advantage to them against American companies, mandating that certain processes and products that were previously made in the United States be made in Europe, as the Japanese bluntly admit that they have restrictions on American agricultural products and other products, our President says he is not going to manage trade. The tug of war in the administration is over, and the answer is to surrender on trade. There would be no HDTV, no policy to try to maintain America's base for defense, either in a military sense or for our economy.

This administration had better focus on this economy and the trade of this economy before we lose the most important battle of the next decade. While changes in Eastern Europe may make us feel more secure militarily, our economy is under seige today with an industrial base that is rapidly falling apart and with an economy that has a continued increase of deficit in trade in excess of $100 billion.

No, policy is not the answer here. We need an administration that is ready to engage the American people, American industry, and American workers to make sure that we have a competitive economy to hand off to our children and not just the remnants of what was once a great and powerful nation.

THE 1990 GOODWILL GAMES TO BE HOSTED BY THE STATE OF WASHINGTON

(Mr. CHANDLER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to my colleagues' attention an important event which will take place in the Pacific Northwest this summer. Between July 20 and August 5, some 2,500 amateur athletes from over 50 countries will convene in the State of Washington to participate in the 1990 Goodwill Games. Competition will be held in 21 sports at sites in Seattle, Tacoma, Federal Way, Redmond, Enumclaw, Spokane and the tri-cities. Also featured are cultural performances of musicians, singers, and dancers from participating countries.

The many changes that have recently occurred in Eastern Europe make this event a very important one. This is a time when ties to Eastern bloc countries need to be strengthened. I believe this event will help foster improved trade relations and better understanding between the cultures of the participating countries.

Since this is the first time this event will be held on American soil, it is important that our country make every effort to ensure that the experience of those participating in the games is a good one. Today I am introducing legislation with my colleagues from Washington State to enhance the facilitation and expeditious processing of the international travelers participating in the event. My proposal would allow for the duty-free entry of the personal effects and equipment of participants and officials involved in the 1990 Goodwill Games.

I would encourage my colleagues to support this measure and to be sure to visit Washington State this summer to observe this world-class event.

FEDERAL RETIREES—NOT SOCIAL SECURITY RECIPIENTS—IN JEOPARDY

(Mr. SMITH of Florida asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, let me just talk about an issue that has just come up on the floor of the House on savings Social Security. Let there be no mistake—and I say this to all of you out there who can hear this—Social Security is not in jeopardy, and this is a bogus issue run up by the President.

If we want to know what is in jeopardy, we should look at the President's budget. No. 1, he has cut COLA's for retired military personnel in the budget. No. 2, he has cut COLA's for retired Federal employees.

It is not Social Security that is in jeopardy; it is all the other retired elderly in this country who are in jeopardy, and I say, shame on the people who made up that budget. I say, shame on you for pitting one elderly group against another to try to make sure you have enough money to build more weapons.

Mr. Speaker, it is time to save everybody and stop the bogus issue of Social Security being in jeopardy. I say, "It just ain't so."

A TRIBUTE TO THE BATTELLE MEMORIAL INSTITUTE

(Mr. MORRISON of Washington asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, many changes have occurred in the State of Washington and at the Hanford site in the Fourth Congressional District over the past 25 years. One of the most significant events was Battelle Memorial Institute being selected in 1965 by the Federal Government to manage and operate what was then called the Hanford Laboratories, and is now called the Pacific Northwest Laboratory. Battelle is today a unique asset to the Tri-Cities, to the State, and to the entire Pacific Northwest.

When Battelle was selected to manage the Hanford Laboratories in 1965, it committed to create a northwest division of Battelle Memorial Institute whose business is contract research. In the ensuing 25 years, Battelle has invested more than $50 million in laboratories and equipment in Washington not only to support its contract research business but to complement the Department of Energy's own laboratories at Hanford. To my knowledge, no other contractor to the Federal Government has made such a corporate commitment to a local community or region.

The Hanford Laboratories employed approximately 1,525 people in 1965 in support of the materials production mission of the former Atomic Energy Commission. In 1990, there are approximately 3,300 scientists, engineers and support staff at the Pacific Northwest Laboratories, with the largest percentage supporting the research and development programs of the Department of Energy.

Battelle also conducts research for private industry. Several spin-off companies have been formed in the Northwest as a result of technologies developed by its scientists and engineers. In addition, Battelle supports research projects in several foreign countries.

Battelle is also well recognized for its community involvement. Every year Battelle is the largest supporter of the local United Way, and supports many educational and cultural organizations with financial and human resources.

Mr. Speaker, as Battelle commemorates 25 years in the State of Washington during 1990, I would like to share with you and my colleagues the strong feeling that all of us have in the Tri-Cities and the State of Washington—Battelle is a class act and Washington looks forward to many more years of its presence and commitment to a better Washington, a better Pacific Northwest, and a better world.

ONTARIO VIOLATES UNITED STATES-CANADA FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

(Mr. KOSTMAYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Province of Ontario is engaged in a remarkable, blatant violation of the United States-Canada Free Trade Agreement. Ontario's action threatens the American trucking and truck trailer manufacturing industries.

In January, Ontario began a new program that allows truckers to operate 53-foot trailers within Ontario—if they get a permit from the Ontario government. But there's a hitch; only new trucks built in Canada can get these permits.

What Ontario is doing, Mr. Speaker, is quite simple. They are attempting to capture all or part of the new 53-foot trailer market for Canadian manufacturers, particularly the two major manufacturers located in Ontario. Protecting Canadian manufacturers, of course, comes directly at the expense of truck and trailer manufacturers throughout the United States—who are widely considered the leaders in 53-foot trailer production.

Ontario's action is unacceptable, Mr. Speaker, and I suggest that we consider strong steps to end it, including barring any truck with one of these discriminatory permits from operating in the United States.

WHY THE PRESIDENT'S DEFENSE BUDGET MUST BE IMPLEMENTED

(Mr. DREIER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, the term "alive and well" would be a gross exaggeration in describing the multiparty system which is developing in the Soviet Union. However, Mr. Speaker, it is very clear that within the past 72 hours we have witnessed historic changes, and it is apparent that we are seeing the prospects for a multiparty system in the Soviet Union grow dramatically.

Mr. Speaker, as we look at some of the developments that have come about in the wake of these changes, it is very important that the defense budget, which the President has called for, is implemented, and let me tell my colleagues why.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard within the last several hours that Yegor Ligachev, who had been the head of ideology and personnel, now the head of agriculture in the Soviet Union, one of the hard-line conservatives, has made an attempt to negotiate with the military standing up to Mikhail Gorbachev, and so the prospect of expending 4.3 percent of gross national product on defense, juxtaposed to the 8.7 percent of our gross national product that was spent on national defense before the Vietnam war by John F. Kennedy, would be very, very good for us to do.

CHINA DISCONTINUING STUDENT EXCHANGE PROGRAM WITH THE UNITED STATES

(Ms. PELOSI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, as was mentioned earlier on the floor, it was announced that China will discontinue its student exchange program with the United States, that only those students who are eligible to travel to the United States for study are those who have spent 5 years working in China.

Mr. Speaker, what are they afraid of? They are afraid of democracy.

It is very curious to me that only 2 weeks ago in the debate for the override of the Chinese student bill we were told that, if the veto was overridden, then the Chinese would cut off the student exchange program. We did not, the veto was sustained, and the Chinese have cut off the student exchange program. It seems to me they were going to do it anyway.

Mr. Speaker, it is also very clear that they have done nothing in China to address the human rights problem. The administration's own human rights report, which will be released this month, reads like an indictment of Deng Xiaoping and a few senior officials to keep them in government at the expense of the many people who demonstrated for democratic reform.

In fact, the entire freshman class of the University of Beijing has been assigned to a remote camp for ideological indoctrination and reeducation.

So, Mr. Speaker, we look forward to receiving this human rights report from the administration in a couple of weeks, but I think it is clear to this House that we acted correctly in overriding the veto. They were never going to continue the programs anyway. They are afraid of the democratic principles the students learn in the United States.

MANDATED PARENTAL LEAVE

(Mr. LIVINGSTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I think most of the distinguished Members of this Chamber have already read at least part of a new book, "The Japan That Can Say 'No.'"

That book spells out clearly the feeling many Japanese have that they—not America—are destined to be the world's No. 1 economic power.

Mr. Speaker, this book is just one more example of how we are in an era of unprecedented foreign competition. And the reason I bring this to your attention is that now more than ever we in the Congress must create a business climate that fosters initiative, entrepreneurship, and growth.

If we keep writing expensive regulations and piling them on the backs of small businessmen and women then America will lose her economic superiority. Not only will the Japanese have beaten us, we will have beaten ourselves.

Mr. Speaker, soon this body will consider mandated parental leave. I will oppose that bill because I believe it is just one more attempt by the Federal Government to tell businesses how to operate.

Should we help families in need? Of course. Should we give businesses incentives to provide for parental leave? Yes.

But, Mr. Speaker, a unilateral dictum from the Federal Government—issued without regard for individual circumstances—is not the way to go.

When this issue comes to the floor, I will vote "no" and I urge my colleagues to do the same.

THE MISUSE OF SOCIAL SECURITY SURPLUSES

(Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I have noticed today the buttons that say "Save Social Security, Vote Republican."

Mr. Speaker, I just want to make this point about Social Security. We are collecting a surplus in Social Security that is taken from the paychecks of the working people in this country, and they are told it is going to be saved in Social Security for their future. This President, this administration, in concert with some in Congress think it is wonderful that we take that surplus and use it to reduce the Federal deficit. We use it as an offset to either reduce spending or higher taxes.

Mr. Speaker, one way or another this is dishonest budgeting. It not only is unfair to the working people of this country. It is dishonest in terms of the Social Security promise that is made that this money is going to be saved for America's future. Some of us want it stopped.

The President says, "Well, the Moynihan plan; that threatens Social Security." Mr. Speaker, I will tell my colleagues what threatens Social Security. The President threatens Social Security by saying, "I want to take money that we collect for Social Security and misuse it to reduce the Federal deficit." That is what threatens the Social Security program.

Mr. Speaker, some of us want to say, "No more. Take those computations out of the Federal budget, out of the Federal budget now, and unmask the real Federal deficit," and then we are going to have to confront what the real deficit is and make the tough choice to put this country back on track, but none of this nonsense about who is for and who is against.

My colleagues, what threatens Social Security is the people who misuse the Social Security surpluses.

PLUGGING AMTRAK'S DISCHARGE PIPE

(Mr. GRANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GRANT. Mr. Speaker, in January, we ushered in a new decade, full of promise and opportunity around the globe.

Unfortunately, our national railroad wants the nineties to look just like the eighties—the 1880's, that is.

I really think it's time to stop the obnoxious Amtrak practice of dumping untreated human sewage from its passenger trains.

In my home State of Florida, Amtrak was recently found guilty of three counts of criminal littering for dumping raw sewage onto four unsuspecting retirees fishing under the railroad bridge which crosses the St. Johns River. Amtrak is appealing the decision, contending that Federal law supersedes State standards. That may be true, but Amtrak is the national railroad of the United States and depends on this body for its operating subsidy.

Now, is this the kind of practice Members of the U.S. Congress want to condone?

I do not think so. Congressman HOWARD NIELSON and I and others have introduced legislation, H.R. 3772, to correct this disgraceful practice. It gives Amtrak 3 years to retrofit its cars and provides the means to do it. I urge everyone to support this sensible legislation.

Let 1990 be the year we finally plug Amtrak's discharge pipe and being our national rail service into compliance with the public health standards we require of everyone else.

TAXPAYER RECOVERY ACT OF 1990

(Mr. WYLIE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, today Congressman HILER and I are introducing the Taxpayer Recovery Act of 1990. Senator DOLE introduced this bill in the Senate on January 31, 1990, and it currently has four Senate cosponsors.

The bill would amend the Federal Bankruptcy Code to prevent bankruptcy courts from discharging criminal restitution orders issued against those individuals who have caused losses to a financial institution. The bill would also prevent those who have committed acts, involving fraud or reckless disregard of the law, against any financial institution that is now in receivership from taking advantage of generous State homestead exemptions. In certain cases, these homestead exemptions have been abused by bankrupt debtors that were involved in the looting of insured depository institutions by allowing them to protect personal property—including multimillion dollar mansions—from the reach of the FDIC and other regulatory agencies.

The average taxpayer is angry over abuses uncovered during the passage of FIRRES and Congress must do everything in its power to recover money that has been recklessly or fraudulently appropriated from our federally insured depository institutions. We must not support the lavish lifestyles of those who abused their government granted privileges and created havoc in the thrift industry. Criminals have been able to use the shelter of the Bankruptcy Code to shield assets obtained through fraud and dishonesty. The list of miscreants in the thrift industry who abused the Federal deposit system for their own personal benefit at the expenses of taxpayers is long and sordid. These individuals should not be able to shelter their ill-gotten profits through bankruptcy protections and homestead exemptions. We strengthened the Government's hand in prosecuting criminals at federally insured institutions. However, these powers become meaningless if in the final analysis, the taxpayer is still left holding the losses. This bill corrects this situation.

The bill we introduce today works to protect taxpayers by allowing Federal regulators to relentlessly pursue the ill-gotten gains of those who have defrauded our federally insured financial institutions. I urge my colleagues to support the Taxpayer Recovery Act and promptly pass this legislation.

PROVIDING TIME TO LEARN THE ECONOMIC AND HEALTH EFFECTS OF BST

(Mr. SMITH of Vermont asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. SMITH of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced legislation today that would create a 3-year moratorium on the marketing of milk produced with the synthetic hormone bovine somatotropin. This bill is not intended to throw a permanent roadblock in front of BST or in front of biotechnology in general. Rather, this legislation would make certain we have enough time to learn all the economic and health effects of this hormone before it is used to produce the milk you, I, and all Americans purchase at our neighborhood stores.

BST, also known as bovine growth hormone, increases per-cow milk production significantly. While that sounds like a great stride forward in farm technology, it scares many dairy farmers back in my home State of Vermont and all across the country. Why? Because we do not know how BST will truly affect the economic stability of farms, particularly smaller family-owned farms. Nor do we know how it will affect consumer trust in dairy products.

We may decide that BST will benefit the entire dairy industry. But for now, I maintain we must come down on the side of caution.

I ask my colleagues to join me in supporting this legislation.

FRAUDULENT FREE MEDICAL SCREENING TESTS FOR SENIOR CITIZENS

(Mr. SHAW asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, last Friday I told the senior citizens across south Florida: if it seems too good to be true, it's probably not true. I rise this morning to urge my colleagues to return to their districts for the Lincoln and Washington work period and share this message with their senior citizens.

What is too good to be true? Free medical screening tests for senior citizens.

Medicare is being bilked out of millions of dollars for medical tests provided at mobile laboratories in Fort Lauderdale. Senior citizens are offered free cholesterol screening at labs that are set up in their condominium rec center, housing projects, or wherever seniors gather. After an initial cholesterol test, Medicare beneficiaries are advised that they need followup tests. Before seniors leave these mobile labs they are asked to sign a Medicare form—like the ads maintain—all the tests are free of charge. But months later these same seniors receive forms from Medicare indicating that Medicare has been charged for thousands of dollars of tests and other services that may have never been provided at the mobile labs, or were probably not needed.

I talked with HHS Secretary Dr. Sullivan last Thursday. As he shares my concern, he has investigators working already. However, chances are that similar mobile labs may be operating in your own congressional district, so I urge you to inform seniors that they may be victimized by similar free testing offers.

A MISLEADING STANDARD OF COMPARISON IN EDUCATION

(Mr. PETRI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, bad studies lead to bad policy. And one of the worst studies in years keeps getting more ink in the liberal media. Last Sunday's Washington Post devoted an entire page to reprint a study that has already been thoroughly discredited, the Economic Policy Institute effort to show that the United States spends less money than its industrialized competitors on elementary and secondary education.

The EPI says we spend a lower percentage of our GNP on education, and that is true. But it is a stupid standard of comparison. We also spend a far lower percentage of GNP on food. But that does not mean we eat less. It means we are richer, so a lower percentage of our income buys more food, or more education. By the EPI standard of comparison, Mississippi spends more of its State product on education than Minnesota, 3.9 percent to 3.7 percent. But Minnesota, being richer, spends almost twice as many dollars per pupil. Actual dollars per pupil is the only sensible standard of comparison, and by that standard, we rank near the top.

The liberals are trumpeting this hokum from the ramparts for one reason: They want to pump in more and more money. It's the same old religion of tax and spend. But we have already increased our spending 27 percent in real terms in the eighties, with no appreciable results.

Mr. Speaker, the answer is not more money; it is more effective money. It is reforms like competition between schools, parental involvement, school-based management, standards and testing, and less bureaucratic overhang.

SOCIAL SECURITY IS BIPARTISAN

(Mr. GUNDERSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I think many of us remember the decade of the eighties here in the Congress. During that time we read little bumper strips and saw little buttons that said, "Save Social Security. Vote Democrat." I did not believe that at that time.

There is a button out right now that is just the opposite. It says, "Save Social Security. Vote Republican."

I would like to think Social Security is not any more partisan today than it was back in the 1980's; but if it is not going to be partisan, I have got to call on my Democratic colleagues to join with us now in 1990 to reject the Moynihan proposal.

A pay-as-you-go plan for Social Security sends two signals. Immediately we have to start looking at a cut in benefits and we send a signal to the baby boomer generation that when they get there, there will be no funds for them.

That is why even the AARP this week came out against the Moynihan proposal.

Let us take the politics out of Social Security. Let us, Democrats and Republicans, reject the Moynihan proposal.

COMMENTS ON DEMOCRATIC SPEECHES OF TODAY

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I have several comments on some Democrat speeches we have heard today.

The chief deputy whip for the Democrats, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] claims that Republicans are trying to undermine Social Security. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] should talk to a fellow Democrat, Senator MOYNIHAN, who has a proposal which could lead to Social Security benefit cuts.

Another Democrat, Senator BENTSEN, is holding hearings on that irresponsible idea and other Democrats have embraced the proposal.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TORRICELLI] accused the President of relying too much on commissions. Well, I happen to serve on the Science, Space, and Technology Committee with the gentleman from New Jersey. On that committee, one of his chief legislative proposals is none other than a Mars Commission.

Et tu, Brute?

Other Democrats have noted an inability to move on national issues. They do so while the President's anticrime program languishes in congressional committees. His antidrug program languishes in congressional committees, and the balanced budget amendment remains buried in a congressional committee.

No wonder most of America finds politicians untrustworthy and unbelievable.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MONTGOMERY). Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5 of rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

Such rollcall votes, if postponed, will be taken after debate has concluded on all motions to suspend the rules.

URGENT ASSISTANCE FOR DEMOCRACY IN PANAMA ACT OF 1990

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3952) to authorize certain United States assistance and trade benefits for Panama, and for other purposes.

H.R. 3952

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Urgent Assistance for Democracy in Panama Act of 1990".

TITLE I—PANAMA

SEC. 101. IMMEDIATE UNITED STATES ASSISTANCE.

(a) ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS.—

(1) AUTHORITY TO USE FUNDS FOR ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—The President may use up to $32,000,000 of funds made available for economic assistance programs in order to provide economic assistance for Panama for fiscal year 1990 notwithstanding the provisions of law specified in subsection (c) of this section.

(B) DEOBLIGATION/REOBLIGATION AUTHORITY.—Funds may be made available for use under subparagraph (A) without regard to the limitation in section 515 of the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1990 (Public Law 101-167), that funds deobligated under that section are available for reobligation only for countries within the same general region for which the funds were originally obligated.

(C) ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE DEFINED.—As used in subparagraph (A), the term "economic assistance" means assistance under part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2151 and following; relating to development and related economic assistance programs) and assistance under chapter 4 of part II of that Act (22 U.S.C. 2346 and following; relating to the economic support fund).

(2) AUTHORITY TO USE CERTAIN GUARANTEE AUTHORITIES.—The President—

(A) may use up to $10,000,000 of the guaranty authority available to carry out section 222 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2182; relating to the housing guaranty program), and

(B) may exercise the authorities of section 224 of that Act (2 U.S.C. 2184; relating to the trade credit insurance program for Central America), with respect to Panama for fiscal year 1990 without regard to the provisions of law specified in subsection (c) of this section.

(b) LAW ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE.—

(1) ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE PROGRAM.—Up to $1,200,000 of the funds made available for Panama under subsection (a)(1) of this section may be used to provide—

(A) assistance authorized by subsection (b)(3) of section 534 of Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2346c; relating to the administration of justice program); and

(B) training for the Public Forces and other civilian law enforcement forces of Panama in human rights, civil law, and investigative and civilian law enforcement techniques, notwithstanding section 660 of that Act (22 U.S.C. 2420; relating to the prohibition on assistance for law enforcement forces).

All assistance provided for Panama under this paragraph shall be counted toward the limitation contained in the second sentence of section 534(e) of that Act and toward the requirement of the second sentence of section 599G(c) of the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1990 (Public Law 101-167).

(2) USE OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE PIPELINE FOR PANAMA TO PROCURE LAW ENFORCEMENT EQUIPMENT.—

(A) AUTHORITY.—Prior year military assistance funds that are obligated for Panama shall be available to finance the procurement of defense articles by law enforcement forces in Panama and related defense services (other than training) notwithstanding the provisions of law specified in subsection (c) of this section and section 660 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2420; relating to the prohibition on assistance for law enforcement forces).

(B) LIMITATIONS ON LETHAL EQUIPMENT.—Not more than $500,000 of the funds made available under subparagraph (A) may be used for the procurement of lethal equipment. Only lethal equipment that is appropriate for standard civilian law enforcement requirements may be procured with such funds.

(C) PRIOR YEAR MILITARY ASSISTANCE FUNDS DEFINED.—As used in subparagraph (A), the term "prior year military assistance funds" means funds that were appropriated for a fiscal year prior to fiscal year 1990 to carry out chapter 2 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2311 and following; relating to the grant military assistance program) or section 23 of the Arms Export Control Act (22 U.S.C. 2763; relating to foreign military sales credits).

(3) CONGRESSIONAL NOTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subparagraph (B) of this paragraph, the President shall notify the congressional committees specified in section 634A of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2394-1) in accordance with the procedures applicable to reprogrammings under that section at least 15 days before—

(i) each obligation of funds under paragraph (1) of this subsection, and

(ii) each commitment to use funds under paragraph (2) of this subsection.

(B) EXCEPTION.—Such notification is not required with respect to—

(i) obligations under paragraph (1), and

(ii) commitments to use funds under paragraph (2) for the procurement of uniforms and communications equipment (and related defense services), that occur prior to the end of the 15-day period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act to the extent that such obligations or commitments, as the case may be, were previously justified to the Congress.

(c) BROOKE-ALEXANDER AMENDMENT.—The provisions of law referred to in subsections (a)(1), (a)(2), and (b)(2)(A) of this section are section 620(q) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2370(q)); and section 518 of the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1990 (Public Law 101-167), and the corresponding sections of foreign assistance appropriations Acts for prior fiscal years.

SEC. 102. RESUMPTION OF UNITED STATES ASSISTANCE: ANTINARCOTICS CERTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS.

Because the vital national interests of the United States so require and because the Endara government of Panama has indicated its willingness, and is taking steps, to cooperate fully with the United States to control narcotics production, trafficking, and money laundering, the requirements of paragraphs (1) and (5) of section 481(h) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2291(h)) shall cease to apply to Panama as of the date of enactment of this Act to the extent that those requirements became applicable to Panama by reason of the fact that the President did not make a certification with respect to Panama under paragraph (2) of that section at the time the international narcotics control strategy reports for 1988 and 1989 were submitted to the Congress pursuant to section 481(e) of that Act.

SEC. 103. RESUMPTION OF TRADE BENEFITS: ANTINARCOTICS CERTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS.

(a) RESUMPTION UPON DATE OF ENACTMENT.—Because the vital national interests of the United States so require and because the Endara government of Panama has indicated its willingness, and is taking steps, to cooperate fully with the United States to control narcotics production, trafficking, and money laundering, the conditions specified in section 802(b)(4)(B) of the Narcotics Control Trade Act (19 U.S.C. 2492(b)(4)(B)) shall be deemed to be satisfied as of the date of enactment of this Act with respect to the action taken pursuant to section 802 (a) of that Act that is described in subsection (b) of this section.

(b) SPECIFICATION OF BENEFITS.—The action referred to in subsection (a) is the denial to articles imported from Panama of preferential tariff treatment under the Generalized System of Preferences (19 U.S.C. 2461 and following) and the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act (19 U.S.C. 2701 and following) pursuant to Presidential Proclamation 5779 of March 23, 1988.

SEC. 104. REPORT ON PANAMANIAN BANK SECRECY LAWS.

(a) CONGRESSIONAL CONCERNS.—The Congress commends the Endara Government for its cooperation and assistance in freezing Panamanian bank accounts believed to be implicated in narcotics-related and other illegal financial transactions. The Congress remains concerned, however, that the current status of bank secrecy laws in Panama may lend itself to continued criminal abuse of those laws despite the best intentions of the Endara Government.

(b) REPORT.—Therefore, no later than April 15, 1990, the President shall submit a detailed report to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate on specific actions being undertaken by the Government of Panama to modify the existing bank secrecy regime in order to facilitate detection and prosecution of criminal activities, including—

(1) the modification of bank secrecy laws by the Government of Panama;

(2) the conclusion of an exchange-of-information agreement between the United States and Panama; and

(3) agreements entered into by the Government of Panama or in the process of negotiation that are designed to deter illegal financial transactions and to facilitate early detection and prosecution of such illegal activities.

TITLE II—EASTERN EUROPE AND YUGOSLAVIA

SEC. 201. ASSISTANCE TO SUPPORT TRANSITION TO DEMOCRACY.

(a) AUTHORITY.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the President may use up to $10,000,000 of the funds appropriated for fiscal year 1990 to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2346 and following; relating to the economic support fund) to support the process of democratic transition in East European countries and Yugoslavia, in addition to amounts otherwise available for such purposes.

(b) LIMITATION.—Funds provided under this section shall be made available only—

(1) after the President has certified to the Congress that the country where funds are being expended has had, or is scheduled to have, open and free multiparty national or regional elections; and

(2) in such a manner so as to benefit substantially a full range of non-Communist political parties in the countries in which such funds are used.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL].

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker. H.R. 3952 is being considered under expedited procedures in order to provide the President with the authority to immediately remove the remaining restrictions on aid and trade with Panama and provide urgent assistance. This bill permits the administration to initiate the steps which must be taken to assist in returning Panama to civilian control and recommence economic activity. Under the administration's plan, this legislation will be followed by a much larger package, authorizing some $500 million in supplemental fiscal year 1990 appropriations and an equal amount in credits and guarantees, designed to jump start the economy.

H.R. 3952 also authorizes up to $10 million in assistance for democracy for the countries of Eastern Europe. This bill is being used as the vehicle for this initiative in order to provide pre-election assistance to those countries which have experienced rapid political transformation since the enactment in November of the SEED Act and have scheduled free, multiparty elections for this spring.

H.R. 3952 was referred to four committees—the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Committee on Ways and Means, Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations. I appreciated the expeditious consideration of the bill by the Committee on Ways and Means, and the willingness of the Committees on Appropriations and Banking to support the bill's consideration in the House without formal action by those committees. The bill has been drafted and brought to the floor in the period of a week. It has been done with the cooperation of the four committees, the administration, the House leadership, and the Senate. The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations reported an identical bill, and the Senate is expected to consider the House passed bill tomorrow. The bill could be signed into law as early as this week end. I would like to commend the many participants for the cooperative and bipartisan approach which they brought to the process of developing this bill and which permitted a quick consensus.

I urge all members to vote in favor of this urgent legislation to support democratic, civilian government in Panama and Eastern Europe.

I submit for the RECORD a brief summary of the bill:

SUMMARY OF DRAFT BILL ON PANAMA

SECTION 101—ASSISTANCE

(a) Economic Assistance authorizes $32 million for urgent economic assistance for Panama; exempts this assistance from the provision in FY 1990 appropriations act which restricts deobligation/reobligation authority to funds being used in the same region; authorizes $10 million for housing guarantees; and authorizes Trade Credit Insurance Program for Panama.

(b) Law Enforcement authorizes $1.2 million for Administration of Justice and training law enforcement authorities, notwithstanding the prohibition against police training in section 660 of the Foreign Assistance Act; authorizes use of MAP and FMS pipeline for procurement of equipment for law enforcement forces, except not more than $500,000 may be used for procurement of lethal equipment; and 15 day notification period is waived for non-lethal assistance provided as justified to Congress within 15 days of enactment.

(c) Brooke-Alexander waives restrictions against assistance to countries in arrears on repayment of U.S. government loans.

SECTIONS 102 AND 102—ANTINARCOTICS REQUIREMENTS

Sections 102 (FAA) and 103 (Narcotics Trade Control Act) lift restrictions on aid and trade with Panama for reasons of narcotics trafficking.

SECTION 104—BANK SECRECY LAWS

Commends Endara government for freezing bank accounts implicated in narcotics-related transactions and requires Presidential report on steps by the Panamanian government to modify bank secrecy and deter illegal financial transactions.

SECTION 201—EASTERN EUROPE

Authorizes up to $10 million for assistance to support the process of democratic transition in Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia, subject to 15-day notification requirement and Presidential certification that multi-party elections have been held or are scheduled in the recipient country.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the House has moved quickly to consider this important legislation providing certain U.S. assistance and trade benefits for Panama.

The administration has proposed a two-part $1 billion Panama assistance package to address the emergency and long-term needs of the Panamanian people. The second part of the package will be a supplemental assistance program which the House will consider in March.

The first part of the package, which we are considering now, authorizes $42 million for an emergency assistance program. This program will include funds for new housing, employment and public works, small business rehabilitation, and technical assistance.

The remainder of the bill waives numerous prohibitions in current law which were passed to put some teeth into the U.S. sanctions against Noriega and his regime.

By waiving those prohibitions and thus withdrawing United States sanctions now that a democratic government is in place, the bill we are now considering will allow Panama's private sector to serve as the key to that nation's economic recovery.

Panama and, particularly, its private sector will once again benefit from a package of loans, guarantees, market access, and private investment incentives under such initiatives as the Caribbean Basin Initiative [CBI], the Generalized System of Preferences [GSP], the Overseas Private Insurance Corporation [OPIC], and U.S. sugar quota programs.

The administration has estimated that the worth of the benefits of these programs to Panama is approximately $500 million.

I believe that the first part of this two-part package sets out a reasonable but appropriate and responsible commitment on the part of the United States to assist both the emergency and long-term needs of the Panamanian people.

I would also like to note that this bill provides $10 million to support the process of democratic transition in East European countries. At a crucial time in the development of democracy in this important part of the world, this important initiative also deserves our support.

I urge all Members to support this legislation.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD], the distinguished ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, for his remarks and his assistance.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3952, the Urgent Assistance for Democracy in Panama Act of 1990, which the Committee on Ways and Means ordered favorably reported to the House yesterday.

Section 103 of that bill enables the President to restore immediately trade benefits to Panama as part of his program of economic assistance to aid Panama's recovery efforts. These benefits consist of preferential duty-free treatment under the generalized system of preferences and Caribbean basin initiative programs that were removed as trade sanctions in March 1988. Specifically, section 103 waives the 45 legislative-day period under the Narcotics Control Trade Act for congressional disapproval of the certification by the President on January 26 that the new government of Panama is fully cooperating with the United States on narcotics control.

While recognizing the urgency of economic aid to Panama, the Committee on Ways and Means is very concerned about reports that the Endara government is resisting changes in bank secrecy laws that are necessary to prevent the continuation of money laundering in Panama. The committee expects the administration to keep it fully informed of its efforts to ensure that Panama fully complies with the President's certification in this regard.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 3952.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MONTGOMERY). Is the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO] now controlling the time?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I am controlling the time temporarily.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from California is recognized.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my strong support for H.R. 3952, legislation to authorize U.S. assistance for Panama and to support the transition to democracy in Eastern Europe.

The decision by President Bush to send American forces to Panama was supported by both the Panamanian people and by a majority of Americans, as well. The President chose a course of action designated to accomplish four objectives: To protect Americans living in Panama; to protect American interests in the Panama canal; to restore democracy in Panama and to bring to justice indicted drug kingpin Manuel Antonio Noriega.

All four of those objectives were accomplished. While all of us regret the loss of life—both American and Panamanian—that resulted from this military action, the defense of freedom and democracy and the prevention of even greater threats against Americans fully justified the President's decisive order to introduce American combat troops into Panama.

The defense of both democracy and of U.S. national security interests in Panama deserve our strong support. We have both rights and obligations in Panama, and it is vital that we help the Endara administration in Panama strengthen its government institutions, its economy, and its control over the security forces. Moreover, if we are to see the prompt return of all the American troops sent to Panama in December, it is imperative that we help the Panamanians develop for its new public force the police functions necessary to provide for the security of Americans and Panamanians living in Panama.

This assistance package deals with the immediate needs of Panama and provides the President with the flexibility he requires to respond effectively to the desperate conditions for some sector in Panama. Obviously, followup legislation will be necessary as additional areas where assistance can be useful are identified. In order to respond to emergency conditions, however, it is essential that we act expeditiously.

I enthusiastically join those of my colleagues who have commended our U.S. Armed Forces personnel who served and continue to serve so effectively in Panama and also our commander in chief for his decisive leadership at a critical time in U.S. history.

I urge my colleagues to support this vital legislation.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CROCKETT], the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs.

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, while I support the compromise fashioned by my colleagues and the administration which provides that the fiscal year 1990 supplemental appropriations bill will return to the African foreign aid account the $30 million which the administration now wants to give Panama, I still have very grave concerns about the very disturbing pattern and practice that is emerging with respect to the African foreign aid account.

This is the second time this year that the administration has attempted to raid the meager African aid budget to give money to other regions of the world.

Just this past September, the State Department proposed that $10 million in funds earmarked for Somalia be reprogrammed for use in the resettlement of ethnic Turkish refugees who had fled Bulgaria.

The situation in Turkey may, indeed, have merited the immediate attention of our Government, but Turkey alone already receives more U.S. financial assistance than all of the countries of Africa together.

It was a travesty for the administration to look to the paltry foreign aid appropriations for Africa to find those funds for Turkey.

There were tremendous unmet needs for those funds for refugees on the African continent. All of us have seen the pictures of starvation in the Horn of Africa—a cause for which our colleague, Mickey Leland, gave his life.

Africa is, after all, home to the world's largest refugee population. And that is, precisely, why the Congress had earmarked those funds for Africa and why members objected so strongly to the reprogramming.

Fortunately, faced with our adamant congressional opposition, the administration decided to look elsewhere for funds for Turkish refugees.

Now, we are told that we have no choice but to tranfer $30 million in aid from Africa to Panama. The administration claims to be unable to find the funds needed for Panama anyplace except in the minuscule amount of aid we give to Africa.

Why Africa again? Why not Central America? The State Department recently reported that there were more than $700 million in unexpended funds in the aid accounts of four Central American countries—El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Costa Rica.

Let me point out that $700 million in unexpended funds is more than the $575 million that all of Africa received in fiscal year 1990. And had the administration chosen an intraregional transfer of funds from Central America to Panama, it could have done so quickly and easily without needing congressional consent.

It's time for the administration and Congress to end this blatant and willful disregard for Africa. No region of the world has experienced the steep economic decline that Africa has in the past few years; and yet, Africa is still allocated the smallest portion of U.S. foreign assistance—less than 6 percent. And Africa is still the region first and hardest hit when cuts in assistance are made.

In his State of the Union speech, President Bush said, and I quote: "Every one of us must confront and condemn racism. * * * Not next week, not tomorrow, but right now. Every single one of us."

I urge the Congress here and now to stop this pattern and practice of taking from the poorest continent in the world to provide for middle- and upper-income countries.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CRANE].

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I regret that this bill, originally drafted to assist Panama, has now become a vehicle to increase U.S. foreign assistance to Eastern Europe, and Yugoslavia. Unfortunately, in my view, this makes H.R. 3952 totally unacceptable. The short description of the bill is very misleading since it attempts to mask the dual purpose of this legislation, the second title of which provides expanded foreign aid to Eastern Europe.

The issues related to Panama and to Eastern Europe are farther apart than the miles that separate them geographically. Congress should deal with them separately. Originally, this bill was intended primarily to extend or reinstate certain benefits to Panama following that country's liberation from the tyrannical rule of Gen. Manuel Noriega. In my view, that goal should be the sole focus of this legislation.

Although I cannot support H.R. 3952 in the form before us today, primarily because I question the wisdom of rushing massive foreign aid to Eastern Europe before that region has demonstrated a true commitment to and actual implementation of democratic principles, I want to reaffirm my support for the people of Panama who have struggled so long for the freedom that is now in their grasp.

Section 103 of the bill is the section under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Ways and Means. These provisions would immediately reinstate tariff benefits for Panama under the Generalized System of Preferences [GSP] for developing countries and under the Caribbean Basin Initiative [CBI]. The duty-free treatment of certain imports to the U.S. from Panama under these two programs was suspended on March 23, 1988 by the President under the Narcotics Control Trade Act after determining that Panama was not cooperating with the U.S. in the fight against drug trafficking.

Now that the duly elected administration of President Guillermo Endara has assumed the reigns of government in Panama, it is appropriate for the U.S. to act quickly to support this new leadership. Unfortunately, under existing law, the President must recommend to Congress that trade benefits be reinstated and that recommendation must pend before Congress for 45 days of continuous session. During this time, the Congress would have the option of passing a joint resolution disapproving the President's determination.

This is a long time to wait for such a fragile economy, long devastated by corrupt leadership and repressive policies. It is also a long time to wait for the new government, widely supported by the American people and anxious to begin the process of healing and revitalizing the economy of their country.

H.R. 3952 would waive the 45-day layover requirement and allow these trade benefits to go into effect almost immediately. These provisions, along with the additional foreign assistance benefits to Panama provided under the bill, are extremely important to Panama not only substantively but also as a demonstration of the continued support of the United States for freedom and democracy in Panama.

It is very unfortunate that the bill has gained controversy and opposition because of unrelated provisions dealing with Eastern Europe. I strongly believe that we should enact the Panama provisions separately, and quickly, but we need to remove the unrelated sections and address the Eastern European question on its own merits based on adequate commitments to freedom, democracy, and market principles made by individual countries in that region.

I have long supported the Panamanian people in their struggle for self-determination and freedom. I have also considered vital the strategic importance of that country, and have spoken out strongly against the Panama Canal Treaty which was the first step demonstrating a policy of neglect by the United States. Such a policy paved the way for militaristic leadership. Now we have another chance to stand up for the Panamanian people and for freedom and self-government in that region.

The United States put a great deal at risk when it stepped in to insure that the government elected by the Panamanian people could indeed have the chance to govern. The Panamanian people embrace the same ideals, principles, and desire for certain inalienable rights that brave young American men and women so recently fought to reaffirm. Some died in this precious cause. To those that died and to the Panamanian people who have also suffered and died over the years waiting for freedom, we owe every ounce of support we can muster to assure that these ideals are preserved.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to reject H.R. 3952, strip the unrelated provision from the bill, and move quickly to enact new legislation incorporating those provisions that support the Panamanian people along their new road to freedom and democracy.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GEJDENSON] who is the chairman of the Subcommittee on International Economic Policy and Trade and who has taken the lead with respect to the Panama question now for quite some time.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], the chairman of the committee, and the leadership of the House for reaching out to the President in an area where there is broad agreement in the Congress. Often times when we disagree out of principle we are accused of being partisan. I hope that some of my friends on the other side who raise the partisan issue when it is to their advantage recognize that where we agree on the proper course for the United States that the chairman of this committee and the leadership of this House have rushed forward with as quick a process as possible. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD], who always is someone it is a pleasure to work with on this and other issues I think recognizes that. There are times when we have deep disagreements. But where there is an agreement, the chairman and the Speaker and the majority leader of this House assist the administration in every way they can.

We do owe a debt to Panama. The economic embargo has caused a significant portion of the crisis they presently face. There is no question that within Panama we need to see changes in their banking laws and a movement toward full participation of all their citizens in this new democracy they have undertaken.

This is an important step to try to start that economy, which is stalled, but it is an economy which has great strength within it. The revenues from the Canal, the revenues from the pipeline, the fact that it is a dollar economy gives it a certain stability and an opportunity for rebuilding that often is not present in other countries in similar situations.

This is a first step. I would hope the administration comes quickly to the Congress with its final piece of legislation. If this area of the world was important enough to risk and lose American lives for, to those of our colleagues who often take great pride in voting against foreign assistance but then go to the floor and applaud military intervention, if it was worth risking and losing American lives, it is worth more capital to make sure that this democracy becomes a democracy and that its people prosper.

Again, I commend the chairman and the leadership as well as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] for their efforts.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON].

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, the world is upside down. I never thought I would stand on this floor and say I concur wholeheartedly with the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GEJDENSON]. But it is not often that I take the floor of the House in order to announce my support for a foreign aid bill. Today happens to be one of those times, and it is only the second time in my 12 years in this Congress.

This package for Panama is a necessary part of finishing the job that Operation Just Cause began.

Let me take off my hat to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], chairman of the committee, and to the ranking Republican, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] for bringing this package to the floor the way they have today. I find this package particularly worthwhile because it does combine, and I would ask my friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRAFICANT] and my other colleagues to listen, this package combines aid, trade and investment and that is important for Panama and for the American people.

Prior to Noriega's reign of repression and plunder, Panama had the highest standard of living and the most well developed economic and physical infrastructure in all of Central America. So our task here today is to help the Panamanians build on that foundation that is already there.

Mr. Speaker, some of my conservative colleagues have raised some concern about $10 million being in this bill for Eastern Europe. I for one would have preferred to see that come here under a different bill too. But the fact of the matter is it is in the bill, and the reason we are a deliberative body, and the reason we do compromise is because we have to accomplish something. We have done that, and again I say to the gentleman from Florida, the gentleman from Michigan and the Ways and Means Committee, they have done a very able job.

Limitations on that $10 million are built into the last section of the bill. For my conservative colleagues out there listening and questioning whether they are going to vote for this bill, let me just read this. It says "(1) after the President has certified to the Congress that the country where funds are being expended has had, or is scheduled to have, open and free multiparty national or regional elections." That is important. That is why I am going to vote for the bill, because that limitation is in here.

Second, "in such a manner so as to benefit substantially a full range of nonCommunist political parties in the countries in which such funds are used."

There is plenty of protection for those of us who are concerned that these funds are going to go to a Communist party or a Communist Government. I think we all should get behind this bill.

I take off my hat to the gentleman from Florida, Mr. DANTE FASCELL, and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. BROOMFIELD, for bringing this bill before us in a timely manner and in the form in which it is.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RUSSO] a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, it is critical that before the United States moves to life sanctions on Panama that we obtain from their government and their banking community assurances that the country's bank secrecy laws will be changed to prevent hidden banks accounts and money laundering. The United States must insist that we get from Panama an exchange-of-information agreement and a requirement that Panama override bank secrecy and confidentiality laws such an agreement should provide for the exchange of such information, not limited to information concerning nationals or residents of the United States or Panama, as are necessary to enforce the tax laws of the United States and Panama, whether criminal or civil proceedings. We have insisted on and obtained such exchange of information agreements from many other countries, such as many Caribbean countries that are part of the Caribbean Basin initiative. An article in the New York Times yesterday states that the Panamanian Government is resisting United States pressure to change their bank secrecy laws.

Let me quote from that article in the New York Times:

The nation's new President, Guillermo Endara, has for years been a director of a Panamanian bank used extensively by Colombia's Medellín drug traffickers.

Guillermo (Billy) Ford, the Second Vice President and chairman of the banking commission, is a part owner of the Dadeland Bank of Florida, which was named in a court case two years ago as a central financial institution for one of the biggest Medellín launderers, Gonzalo Mora.

Rogello Cruz, the new Attorney General, has been a director of the First Interamericas Bank, owned by Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela, one of the bosses of the Cali drug gang in Columbia.

It is no wonder they are resisting United States pressure to change the bank secrecy laws. It would be unconscionable for the Congress to act at this time to improve economic relations with Panama without first taking this essential step that will help to crackdown on Panama's flourishing drug trade, which uses Panama's bank laws to its benefit. We must insist that Panama cooperate with the United States on this issue.

PANAMA IS RESISTING U.S. PRESSURE TO ALTER INADEQUATE BANK LAWS

(By Stephen Labaton)

PANAMA, Feb 5.—Officials of the new Panamanian Government are resisting United States pressure to change the banking laws that the Americans say have made the country a haven for enormous illicit drug profits before Gen. Manuel Antonio Noriega was removed from power.

"The only problem of money laundering in Panama is the newspapers that mention that Panama is a big money-laundering center," Edgardo Lasso Valdes, president of the Panamanian banking association and one of the country's seven banking commissioners, said in an interview. "To be honest, we don't feel there is any problem."

But a senior State Department official here, who asked not to be identified, said the existing laws "are grossly inadequate" to prevent money laundering, a process in which illegally earned profits are deposited in bank accounts or legitimate businesses, then withdrawn as "clean money." He said the United States was strongly urging Panama to revise them.

Indeed, American law-enforcement officials and legislators are concerned that the new Government and the country's appetite for foreign investment will actually lead to even greater use of Panamanian financial institutions to conceal illicit drug profits.

In a series of interviews in recent days, local banking regulators, senior Panamanian officials and United States officials demonstrated through their comments a growing tension between the two nations over the money-laundering issue. A fight now appears likely in Congress over a proposed $1 billion aid package for Panama.

An extensive review of Panamanian banking records and court documents shows, too, that many senior leaders in the Government, while never accused of money laundering, have had strong ties to corrupt banks. Several of the banks have either been indicted for money laundering or been shut because of pressure from the United States.

TOP OFFICIALS' BANK TIES

The nation's new President, Guillermo Endara, has for years been a director of a Panamanian bank used extensively by Colombia's Medellín drug traffickers.

Guillermo (Billy) Ford, the Second Vice President and chairman of the banking commission, is a part owner of the Dadeland Bank of Florida, which was named in a court case two years ago as a central financial institution for one of the biggest Medellín launderers, Gonzalo Mora.

Rogello Cruz, the new Attorney General, has been a director of the First Interamericas Bank, owned by Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela, one of the bosses of the Cali drug gang in Colombia.

There is no evidence that President Endara, Vice President Ford, Mr. Cruz or other current leaders were aware of or involved with the illegal operations carried out at the banks to which they have ties. But officials of the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Justice Department say the business connections and friendships make it difficult to believe that any real crackdown against money laundering is likely.

American law-enforcement officials said they had evidence that Panamanian banks were used to launder money through the waning hours of the administration of General Noriega, who is awaiting trial in Miami on drug and money-laundering charges. And though most of General Noriega's senior aides remain either fugitives or in jail, all the bankers with whom they are said to have dealt remain in key positions.

"I'm very concerned about it," said Senator John F. Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, who has held extensive hearings on money laundering and the use of Panamanian banks. "This is the moment to do something—but it now appears that not enough is being done."

LONG HISTORY OF AIDING MONEY LAUNDERERS

Panama's secrecy laws and tax breaks for foreign depositors, coupled with the country's proximity to cocaine production and trafficking in the Andes, have long made banks here a kind of hidden tub for cleaning dirty money.

In a recent interview, President Endara acknowledged that the success of Panama's financial center in the 1970's and 1980's was a result of the Latin American drug cartels.

Increased pressure is now on the nation's banks, whose foreign deposits have fired rapid economic growth for two decades, to lure back more foreign investors, many of whom had left during the turmoil of recent months.

ILLEGALITIES AID GNP

The financial community represents as much as 15 percent of the Panamanian economy, according to Government figures. Last year, the gross national product was estimated at $1.76 billion, and virtually all economists agree that laundered drug money, arms sales and other illicit income have played a large role in the accumulation of that wealth.

The United States imposed economic sanctions on Panama in 1988 in an attempt to halt money laundering. As a result some banks were forced to freeze some deposits, and some banks failed. Until the sanctions, Panamanian authorities would occasionally seize assets of suspected accounts but would generally not provide information to law-enforcement authorities.

Merchants from Colón, on the Atlantic coast about 50 miles north of Panama City, said one common way of laundering money was the purchase of large amounts of clothes with millions of dollars in drug profits. The clothes are then shipped to Colombia and sold for Colombian pesos, which are deposited in local banks.

HIDDEN BANK ACCOUNTS AND SECRECY LAWS

But the strongest attraction for money launderers appears to be Panama's hidden bank accounts.

The bank secrecy laws permit a depositor to sue a bank if confidential information is disclosed, and prosecutors can also bring criminal charges against the banker who, without authorization, provides information about an account. Panama also has corporate secrecy protection that enables the founder or founders of a business to keep their identity secret.

TALKS ON COOPERATION

Negotiations have been under way to forge an agreement on cooperation between Panamanian and American law-enforcement authorities, following a preliminary agreement signed last month by the Panamanian Government and the State Department.

Nonetheless, the widely held view among drug officials is that as banking restrictions imposed during the period of United States sanctions are lifted over the next four months, illegal profits will again pour into many of the country's 110 banks.

"Given the chaos and general turmoil of the country following the invasion, there is now an excellent opportunity for organized crime and the cocaine cartels to step back in," said James E. Preston, an Arizona prosecutor who has spent recent months on a Federal grant studying international money laundering.

President Endara has said he sees no need for any significant banking-law changes and so does not expect any. The National Banking Commission, which regulates banks, is dominated by local and international bankers, many of whom agree with the President and Mr. Lasso that the magnitude of the drug problem has been exaggerated.

FEELINGS OF RESENTMENT OVER U.S. PRESSURE

Disputing reports by the Drug Enforcement Administration and other people at the Justice Department, the new Finance Minister, Mario Galindo, said in an interview that there was no money-laundering problem in Panama. Many banks and some officials expressed resentment over pressure by the United States to alter the banking system.

Mr. Lasso, who is also general manager of the Panamanian branch of the International Bank of Costa Rica, said it was hypocritical of United States officials to be citing Panamanian banks. He said the punishment meted out recently in the two largest drug money-laundering cases in the United States shows that American officials themselves are not particularly tough on money laundering.

The settlements were of $5 million over four years in the case of Banco de Occidente and $14 million for Bank of Credit and Commerce International. Both banks admitted in courts that their Panamanian branches were used extensively to launder drug money.

"How can you ask us to break a bank in Panama when all they do in the U.S. is pay a fine?" Mr. Lasso asked. "We don't understand it. It gives us some doubts."

REPUTABLE BANKS DRIVEN OUT

The economic sanctions have driven out some of the more reputable international banks, and many of those left continue to be found to have drug ties, knowingly or not. Testimony in one recent case tied a third of the banks to laundering operations for drug money. Most of those banks were used not as points at which customers would deposit cash but rather as places to which launders in the United States would electronically transfer funds for deposit.

Virtually all those banks remain in operation today, and none were prosecuted for laundering.

"There are already laws here on the books that make money laundering illegal," said a senior banker who has been in Panama for more than 20 years and now works at a large Asian bank in Panama City. "But the laws have only been as good as the people who enforce them."

IMPORTANT BANKING TIES OF TOP PANAMA OFFICIALS

It is difficult to find any senior officials here who do not have important ties to banks.

President Endara has for years been a director of Banco Interoceanico de Panama, one of the two dozen Panamanian banks named in a case based on a Federal Bureau of Investigation case code-named Cash-web/Expressway. F.B.I. agents posing as money launderers were given large amounts of cash in that case by Colombians in the United States who instructed them to transfer the funds to these 24 banks.

Mr. Endara, a corporate lawyer before becoming President, is a close friend of Carlos Eleta, a Panamanian businessman who was arrested in Atlanta in April on charges of conspiring to set up a major cocaine smuggling ring. Released on bail, he is now awaiting trial.

The families of First Vice President Ricardo Arias Calderón and the Finance Minister, Mr. Galindo, are also heavily involved in banking. Mr. Galindo's cousin, Samuel Lewis Galindo, is chairman of Banco del Istmo.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. DYMALLY].

Mr. DYMALLY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to rise in opposition to any kind of legislation which would help people who have been devastated by an invasion. That is not my intention.

I simply want to raise a couple of issues. One, for the third time in recent years we are raiding the Africa account to support other regions.

The Latin American region is not without adequate funds. We could have gotten the $30 million which we have taken from the African account to send to Panama.

The second issue I want to raise is that we seem to equate democracy with free elections. And we do not take into account that free elections in Panama have not included a number of poor people and a number of people of color. It is like saying we have free elections in New York but blacks and Puerto Ricans cannot participate.

As we administer aid in Panama, we have to keep in mind the fact that by and large this country has had some very racist policies in the administration of its Government and its policies.

We need to examine very closely the whole operation of race relations in Panama as we proceed to give them American taxpayer dollars.

CHANGING AID TO AFRICA (DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE PLUS ECONOMIC SUPPORT FUND)

[Dollar amounts in millions]

	Africa	Percent of total
Fiscal year:
1985	759	9.66
1988	636	12.5
1989	645	12.6
1991 (request)	616	10.9

Among all the world's regions, sub-Saharan Africa has experienced substantial absolute and proportional cuts in economic aid in the last few years. Between fiscal year 1984 and fiscal year 1988, allocations to Africa plummetted from $667 million to $636 million and fell further to $575 million in fiscal year 1990. In proportional terms they fell from 13.95 percent of the total to 11.1 percent.

The administration's fiscal year 1991 request confirms this trend and aggravates it. The proposed level—$616 million—would be $50 million below fiscal year 1984, $143 million below fiscal year 1985 and $29 million below fiscal year 1989. In proportional terms, it would take Africa down to only 10.9 percent of the total economic aid, well below the 13.95 percent of fiscal year 1984 and even the 12.5 percent of fiscal years 1988 and 1989.

No region has experienced the steep economic decline that Africa has in the past few years, according to the World Bank.

The decline in Africa's per capita output during the 1980's, together with the decline in the 1970's, will wipe out all its rise in per capita output since 1960. As a result, low-income Africa is poorer today than in 1960. Improvements over those years in health, education, and infrastructure are increasingly at risk. For the first time since World War II, a whole region has suffered retrogression over a generation.

Two-thirds of African countries have embarked, amidst unfavorable external trends like falling commodity prices and high interest rates, upon important economic policy reforms that Eastern Europe is now just considering and beginning. But these reforms will not succeed if the United States and other donors cut back on, rather than increase their resources.

United States aid to Africa is proportionally lower than all of our major allies and not commensurate with our important national interests on the continent. As the cold war eases, we need to pay more, not less, attention to these interests. First there are evident humanitarian interests concerning the poorest and most recently decolonized continent. Second, Africa is of economic interest importance, producing more than 25 percent of 15 minerals essential to United States productivity and supplying us with nearly 40 percent of our imported oil. U.S. exports generally amount to over $4 billion annually, supporting over 160,000 American jobs. Nearly 40 percent of these exports comprise agricultural equipment or products. Third, Africa comprises a third of the world's nations and its support is critical in terms of our new global foreign policy agenda of environmentalism, the war on drugs, antiterrorism, and creating the conditions for economic and political reforms in an interdependent world.

Beyond assuring that the $130 million to be transferred to Panama under this legislation shall be restored in the Panama supplemental, we need to support major increases in the fiscal year 1991 budget for development assistance to Africa.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of California. I thank the chairman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, later today the House will vote on H.R. 3952 to provide emergency economic assistance to the new government of Panama.

Before we vote, however, all Americans should be aware of the continuing allegations of drug money laundering against Panamanian banks, some of them with leading government officials on their boards of directors.

U.S. law enforcement agencies have confirmed the widespread use of Panamanian banks throughout the 1980's by the cocaine cartels which utilize that country's banking secrecy laws to conceal deposits of billions of dollars in drug-derived funds. The president of the Panamanian banking association denies there is a problem; but our own State Department acknowledges that existing antilaundering laws are grossly inadequate.

I do not hesitate to vote for economic aid to a reviving democracy that has historic, economic, and strategic importance to the United States.

But we should all be very cautious—and on notice—about voting to spend our own taxpayer money to any government that cannot, or will not, take aggressive action against the drug cartels that are pouring billions of dollars in narcotic poison into the United States.

According to the New York Times, the extent of illicit activity in the Panamanian economy is no state secret. "[V]irtually all economists agree that laundered drug money, arms sales, and other illicit income have played a large role in the accumulation of [Panama's] wealth," the Times reported yesterday.

I recognized that much of this activity took place during the reign of Gen. Manuel Noriega, and with his approval, and that our 1988 sanctions were designed in part to halt the money laundering activities. But apparently the evil that Noriega did lives after him.

And I am concerned that current leaders of the new government maintain their close ties to institutions that have been directly implicated in drug money laundering.

President Guillermo Endara, for example, has long served as a director of a bank used heavily by the Medillin drug cartel.

Second Vice President Guillermo Ford is the chairman of the banking commission, and a part owner of the Dadeland Bank of Florida, named 2 years ago as a central financial institution for Gonzalo Mora, one of the Medillin cartel's biggest money launderers.

And Rogello Cruz, the new Attorney General, is a director of the First Interamericas Bank, owned by one of the bosses of the Cali gang in Colombia.

Mr. Speaker, I will not oppose this bill, but I do raise serious concerns that the Congress not begin down the long road of hundreds of millions of dollars in aid to Panama without strong assurances that vigorous action will be taken against drug money launderers.

To those in Panama who raise objections of United States interference, I respond: I believe the American taxpayer, who is writing the checks for Panama aid, have a right to know that the banks in which their money is being deposited, and the government that we are supporting, is drug free. That is not intereference: it is protecting our investment.

I will be watching the ongoing negotiations between our governments, and will want an accounting from the State Department, the Justice Department, and the Drug Enforcement Administration before supporting additional funds to Panama. We are providing aid to a struggling democracy. But we will not write a blank check to those without the commitment to rooting out drug trafficking and drug profiteers.

PANAMA IS RESISTING U.S. PRESSURE TO ALTER "INADEQUATE" BANK LAWS

(By Stephen Labaton)

PANAMA, February 5.—Officials of the new Panamanian Government are resisting United States pressure to change the banking laws that the Americans say have made the country a haven for enormous illicit drug profits before Gen. Manuel Antonio Noriega was removed from power.

"The only problem of money laundering in Panama is the newspapers that mention that Panama is a big money-laundering center," Edgardo Lasso Valdes, president of the Panamanian banking association and one of the country's seven banking commissioners, said in an interview. "To be honest, we don't feel there is any problem."

But a senior State Department official here, who asked not to be identified, said the existing laws "are grossly inadequate" to prevent money laundering, a process in which illegally earned profits are deposited in bank accounts or legitimate businesses, then withdrawn as "clean money." He said the United States was strongly urging Panama to revise them.

Indeed, American law-enforcement officials and legislators are concerned that the new Government and the country's appetite for foreign investment will actually lead to even greater use of Panamanian financial institutions to conceal illicit drug profits.

In a series of interviews in recent days, local banking regulators, senior Panamanian officials and United States officials demonstrated through their comments a growing tension between the two nations over the money-laundering issue. A fight now appears likely in Congress over a proposed $1 billion aid package for Panama.

An extensive review of Panamanian banking records and court documents shows, too, that many senior leaders in the Government, while never accused of money laundering, have had strong ties to corrupt banks. Several of the banks have either been indicted for money laundering or been shut because of pressure from the United States.

TOP OFFICIALS' BANK TIES

The nation's new President, Guillermo Endara, has for years been a director of a Panamanian bank used extensively by Colombia's Medellin drug traffickers.

Guillermo (Billy) Ford, the Second Vice President and chairman of the banking commission, is a part owner of the Dadeland Bank of Florida, which was named in a court case two years ago as a central financial institution for one of the biggest Medellin launderers, Gonzalo Mora.

Rogello Cruz, the new Attorney General, has been a director of the First Interamericas Bank, owned by Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela, one of the bosses of the Cali drug gang in Colombia.

There is no evidence that President Endara, Vice President Ford, Mr. Cruz or other current leaders were aware of or involved with the illegal operations carried out at the banks to which they have ties. But officials of the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Justice Department say the business connections and friendships make it difficult to believe that any real crackdown against money laundering is likely.

American law-enforcement officials said they had evidence that Panamanian banks were used to launder money through the waning hours of the administration of General Noriega, who is awaiting trial in Miami on drug and money-laundering charges. And though most of General Noriega's senior aides remain either fugitives or in jail, all the bankers with whom they are said to have dealt remain in key positions.

"I'm very concerned about it" said Senator John F. Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, who has held extensive hearings on money laundering and the use of Panamanian banks. "This is the moment to do something—but it now appears that not enough is being done."

LONG HISTORY OF AIDING MONEY LAUNDERERS

Panama's secrecy laws and tax breaks for foreign depositors, coupled with the country's proximity to cocaine production and trafficking in the Andes, have long made banks here a kind of hidden tub for cleaning dirty money.

In a recent interview, President Endara acknowledged that the success of Panama's financial center in the 1970's and 1980's was a result of the Latin American drug cartels.

Increased pressure is now on the nation's banks, whose foreign deposits have fired rapid economic growth for two decades, to lure back more foreign investors, many of whom had left during the turmoil of recent months.

ILLEGALITIES AID G.N.P.

The financial community represents as much as 15 percent of the Panamanian economy, according to Government figures. Last year, the gross national product was estimated at $1.76 billion, and virtually all economists agree that laundered drug money, arms sales and other illicit income have played a large role in the accumulation of that wealth.

The United States imposed economic sanctions on Panama in 1988 in an attempt to halt money laundering. As a result some banks were forced to freeze some deposits, and some banks failed. Until the sanctions, Panamanian authorities would occasionally seize assets of suspected accounts but would generally not provide information to law enforcement authorities.

Merchants from Colón, on the Atlantic coast about 50 miles north of Panama City, said one common way of laundering money was the purchase of large amounts of clothes with millions of dollars in drug profits. The clothes are then shipped to Colombia and sold for Colombian pesos, which are deposited in local banks.

HIDDEN BANK ACCOUNTS AND SECRECY LAWS

But the strongest attraction for money launderers appears to be Panama's hidden bank accounts.

The bank secrecy laws permit a depositor to sue a bank if confidential information is disclosed, and prosecutors can also bring criminal charges against the banker who, without authorization provides information about an account. Panama also has corporate secrecy protection that enables the founder or founders of a business to keep their identity secret.

TALKS ON COOPERATION

Negotiations have been under way to forge an agreement of cooperation between Panamanian and American law-enforcement authorities, following a preliminary agreement signed last month by the Panamanian Government and the State Department.

Nonetheless, the widely held view among drug officials is that as banking restrictions imposed during the period of United States sanctions are lifted over the next four months, illegal profits will again pour into many of the country's 110 banks.

"Given the chaos and general turmoil of the country following the invasion, there is now an excellent opportunity for organized crime and the cocaine cartels to step back in," said James E. Preston, an Arizona prosecutor who has spent recent months on a Federal grant studying international money laundering.

President Endara has said he sees no need for any significant banking-law changes and so does not expect any. The National Banking Commission, which regulates banks, is dominated by local and international bankers, many of whom agree with the President and Mr. Lasso that the magnitude of the drug problem has been exaggerated.

FEELINGS OF RESENTMENT OVER U.S. PRESSURE

Disputing reports by the Drug Enforcement Administration and other people at the Justice Department, the new Finance Minister, Mario Galindo, said in an interview that there was no money-laundering problem in Panama. Many bankers and some officials expressed resentment over pressure by the United States to alter the banking system.

Mr. Lasso, who is also general manager of the Panamanian branch of the International Bank of Costa Rica, said it was hypocritical of United States officials to be citing Panamanian banks. He said the punishment meted out recently in the two largest drug money-laundering cases in the United States show that American officials themselves are not particularly tough on money laundering.

The settlements were of $5 million over four years in the case of Banco de Occidente and $14 million for Bank of Credit and Commerce International. Both banks admitted in courts that their Panamanian branches were used extensively to launder drug money.

"How can you ask us to break a bank in Panama when all they do in the U.S. is pay a fine?" Mr. Lasso asked. "We don't understand it. It gives us some doubts."

REPUTABLE BANKS DRIVEN OUT

The economic sanctions have driven out some of the more reputable international banks, and many of those left continue to be found to have drug ties, knowingly or not. Testimony in one recent case tied a third of the banks to laundering operations for drug money. Most of those banks were used not as points at which customers would deposit cash but rather as places to which launderers in the United States would electronically transfer funds for deposit.

Virtually all those banks remain in operation today, and none were prosecuted for laundering.

"There are already laws here on the books that make money laundering illegal," said a senior banker who has been in Panama for more than 20 years and now works at a large Asian bank in Panama City. "But the laws have only been as good as the people who enforce them."

IMPORTANT BANKING TIES OF TOP PANAMA OFFICIALS

It is difficult to find any senior officials here who do not have important ties to banks.

President Endara has for years been a director of Banco Interoceanico de Panama, one of the two dozen Panamanian banks named in a case based on a Federal Bureau of Investigation case code-named Cash-web/Expressway. F.B.I. agents posing as money launderers were given large amounts of cash in that case by Colombians in the United States who instructed them to transfer the funds to these 24 banks.

Mr. Endara, a corporate lawyer before becoming President, is a close friend of Carlos Eleta, a Panamanian businessman who was arrested in Atlanta in April on charges of conspiring to set up a major cocaine smuggling ring. Released on bail, he is now awaiting trial.

The families of First Vice President Ricardo Arias Calderón and the Finance Minister, Mr. Galindo, are also heavily involved in banking. Mr. Galindo's cousin, Samuel Lewis Galindo, is chairman of Banco del Istmo.

PANAMA REVIEWS BANK CHANGES THAT WOULD PREVENT LAUNDERING

(By David Harris)

PANAMA CITY, Panama.—In an effort to wipe out money laundering by drug traffickers, Panama's new government is considering changes in its banking secrecy laws, which have been called "grossly inadequate" by a U.S. official.

Bankers, meanwhile, say they are worried that any changes could harm Panama's recovery as an offshore banking center after massive capital flight by foreign depositors since 1987.

No proposals have been made public, and the head of Panama's National Bank said recently that he did not know what was in store.

Panamanian President Guillermo Endara, however, said at a news conference with U.S. Vice President Dan Quayle last week that Panama is committed to fighting drug trafficking and that some changes are being examined.

"We don't know yet what exact changes will have to be made in the banking laws," he said at the end of Mr. Quayle's three-day visit.

But he added that because under existing law authorities can examine accounts when sufficient evidence exists to warrant an investigation, "the changes we are talking about are not that major."

A U.S. official, however, said that the United States was not heartened by Mr. Endara's remarks and that present laws are "grossly inadequate."

"I wasn't very reassured by President Endara's words on this subject, but we're early on in this game," said the official, who asked not to be identified.

The official said that existing laws left too much discretion to Panamanian authorities to decide when to examine a particular account and had been designed to let cronies of deposed strongman Gen. Manuel Noriega expose illicit activities by rivals.

But he sought to reassure bankers that the changes the United States wants would not allow it to go on a fishing expedition and said "there will be procedural safeguards."

U.S. banking experts are in Panama looking at what changes might be made and draft agreements will be drawn up soon for negotiation, he said.

While there are no hard figures on how much drug money moved through Panama last year, U.S. officials say the Central American nation flourished as a money-laundering center until the Dec. 20 U.S. military intervention that ousted Gen. Noriega.

Panama's bankers, meanwhile, are worried.

Foreign deposits dropped from about $30 billion in June 1987, when Panama's political crisis erupted, to about $8 billion before the U.S. action, according to Panama's National Bank.

They say deposits are just beginning to trickle back, and talk of changing the secrecy laws drives customers away.

"We don't want any changes in that law [that] we don't think it is needed," said Rene Diaz, general manager of Panama's International Bank. "The secrecy law is not made for the United States, it is made for Panama."

The president of the Panama Banking Association said he told visiting U.S. officials recently that the banking community is not necessary opposed to an agreement as long as it does not threaten the secrecy law. But he added the officials are not clear about what changes they had in mind.

"We don't know what they really want," said Edgardo Lasso Valdes, who also heads the International Bank of Costa Rica. "They are just saying they want an agreement."

Panamanian Vice President Guillermo Ford said earlier this month that with a new judicial system in place there is no immediate need to change the law. He echoed Mr. Endara that Panama will no longer be used as a money-laundering haven.

"Secrecy will not be used for illegal purposes, period," he said. "They have a claim against an account, we have a judiciary now we feel proud of all the way up to the Supreme Court. They can use our system. Secrecy is not synonymous with corruption."

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE].

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I just want to briefly say the elections in Panama were free down there last May, that it was one of the most observed elections in history, certainly in this hemisphere and the Endara government won by a 3-to-1 margin.

So the taking of office of the Endara government is in fulfillment of the democratic process.

I also would like to take issue with the words of my friend from California [Mr. DYMALLY], who said the country was devastated by the invasion. It was devastated by Mr. Noreiga and the Dignity Battalions. It was liberated by the invasion. There is a vast difference.

Mr. Speaker, as far as raiding the African account, I think it should be understood that the $30 million was to be taken from money for Somalia, and Somalia was not eligible because of its horrible human rights record.

So we would not send them any money. That was part of it.

The other was for the Sudan, which does not have a government, which has undergone a military coup.

So the areas of Africa are not homogenous. There are different countries and different sums allocated to different countries.

So no hardships would have been worked on people who have a minimal respect for human rights.

As far as the banking laws are concerned, Panama does not even have a parliament yet. So the bank laws will be addressed when their parliament is elected and takes office.

Mr. Aronson, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, has pledged a review, a close review of the banking laws. We are told by experts that they have adequate laws, they just need to be enforced. They have not been enforced.

I feel all of us will be very cautious to make sure that laundering, which was part of the Colombian Mafia's operation under Mr. Noriega and his predecessor, Mr. Torrejos, with whom we were happy to conclude a treaty to provide the Panama Canal to the Government of Panama, there was not much of an improvement under Noreiga, if any. So I think we will be very cautious. We will make sure laundering is not facilitated by weak laws or unenforced laws.

I want to congratulate the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] and their respective staffs for the timely, effective response to a fledgling democracy in our hemisphere.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Africa of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I intend to lend my support to this legislation, but I also want to underscore, as I do so, the concern a number of us have that $30 million of the funding in this legislation is to be reprogrammed from the Africa region.

The gentleman from Illinois is correct when he indicates that the money cannot now appropriately be spent in Somalia and Sudan. That is not the issue. The issue is that there are enormous high priorities in the remainder of the African Continent where that money could be directed. It needs to be emphasized, among all of the world's regions, sub-Saharan Africa alone has experienced both absolute and proportional cuts in United States economic aid in the last few years.

Between fiscal years 1984 and 1988, allocations to Africa plummeted from $667 million to $636 million and they fell further to $575 million in fiscal year 1990. In proportional terms they fell from 13.95 percent of the total to 11.1 percent.

The administration's fiscal year 1991 request confirms this trend and aggravates it. The proposed level—$616 million—would be $50 million below fiscal year 1984, $143 million below fiscal year 1985, and $29 million below fiscal year 1989. In proportional terms, it would take Africa down to only 10.9 percent of the total economic aid, well below the 13.95 percent of fiscal year 1984 and even the 12.5 percent of fiscal years 1988 and 1989.

It also needs to be emphasized that no region has experienced the steep economic declines that Africa has in the past few years. Africa is very low on the totem pole of American foreign policy interests and concerns to our enormous disadvantage, in terms of our own strategic, economic, and political interests.

In terms of trade and potential trade, in terms of imports of natural resources, in terms of our humanitarian concerns, Africa is a very important continent indeed. I share the concern expressed by some of my colleagues about the recommended transfer of funds. In fact, I indicated to the Administration, when I was first approached, that I did not support the transfer unless the account would be made whole. I have been given such assurances.

Our leadership here in the House, and the leading members of the Foreign Affairs Committees and the Committees on Appropriations of the House and Senate, have all provided assurances that the $30 million to be reprogrammed from Sudan and Somalia will be part of the fiscal year 1990 Panama supplemental that will soon come before the Congress.

The administration likewise has provided assurances it will not object to the reinclusion of those funds in the supplemental so that the Africa amounts will be kept whole. Only on that basis can this legislation be affirmed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MONTGOMERY). The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] has 7½ minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] has 5½ minutes remaining.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my strong support for H.R. 3952, a bill to lift certain restrictions on Panama.

During the 2 years of Manuel Noriega's dictatorship in Panama, the nation became a haven for narcotics traffickers and money laundering. In an endeavor to restrict these activities, the U.S. Government imposed a series of economic sanctions on that nation. We ceased Overseas Private Investment Corporation privileges, as well as halting Export-Import Bank and U.S. sugar quota programs.

Following the successful "Operation Just Cause," President Bush has prepared a $1 billion aid program to help Panama get back on its feet again. H.R. 3952 comprises the first two aid packages, each totaling $500 million in aid.

The first aid package authorizes $42 million to meet immediate humanitarian needs, including a housing program, public works, small business rehabilitation, and technical assistance to strengthen the Panamanian justice system.

The other critical aspects of this legislation are that it waives the prohibitions necessary to restore Panama's eligibility for the above-mentioned programs and trade benefits with the United States and provides the necessary certification under the Narcotics Control Act, based on the Endara government's commitment to playing a cooperative role with the United States in the antidrug war.

Mr. Speaker, this is an appropriate timely measure. I urge my colleagues to fully support its adoption.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES].

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the emergency assistance package for Panama that was approved yesterday by the Foreign Affairs Committee. This aid will meet immediate needs of the Panamanians, including assistance for housing and urgently needed communication equipment for law enforcement.

However, I am compelled to tell my colleagues that there are serious deficiencies in the area of money laundering that must be addressed as we proceed with consideration of the larger administration aid package legislation over the next 2 months. As a member of the Banking Committee, I have, for a number of years, been actively working to strengthen our domestic banking laws to curb money laundering through U.S. banks. I am equally distressed by drug-money-laundering transactions in Panama, which are to a large extent facilitated by Panama's current bank secrecy laws.

While I am pleased to see the bill before us today includes a mandatory report to Congress on Panamanian bank secrecy laws by April 15, we should not approve additional assistance until more concrete steps are taken by the Panamanians to stop the laundering of billions of dollars through their banks.

It is estimated that as many as one-third of all Panama's banks are involved in money laundering. Yet, not one has been prosecuted for money laundering and all of them remain in operation today. Unfortunately, money laundering remains big business in Panama. This is just not acceptable as we in this country are undertaking an all-out war on drugs and drug-related crime. The American people are committed to ending the drug scourge and we should expect no less of a commitment from those countries to whom we extend our taxpayers' dollars.

I am announcing today that I will be introducing a proposal to secure from the Panamanians positive, measurable progress in the war on money laundering in exchange for our aid dollars. I will be working closely with the Foreign Affairs Committee to see that we have meaningful money-laundering reforms incorporated into the second phase of the Panamanian aid package.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER].

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, first let me thank the gentleman for ceding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I have been very much troubled by this huge aid request, because Panama is one of the world capitals of money laundering. In fact, many have argued that if Panama had not been fulfilling to the role it has been with its bank secrecy laws, the amount of illegal drugs flowing into this country would have been much decreased.

Now there is no more Noriega, but there are still the same laws to protect drug profits. There is still money laundering going on. There are disturbing signs at the top of the Panamanian leadership that they do not intend to change. The Panamanian banking commissioner says there is no problem, the Panamanian Finance Minister says they are not going to change. Even the President, Mr. Endara, says he sees no need to change any laws.

I think both this body and the other body, we should all put Panama on notice: No more aid until they get rid of their bank secrecy laws that allow the drug profiteers to continue killing our young men and women on the streets of our cities.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Task Force on the Foreign Affairs International Narcotics, I want to respond and be very direct to the very, very significant arguments made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER], and prior to that, both the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RUSSO] and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER].

There is a reality to what they say that would be underscored. They have suffered for a long time with the nonenforcement of any laws that were on the books in Panama with enormous amounts of money laundering, with the use by the Medellin cartel and other drug traffickers as a haven for money laundering, as a haven for trafficking and as a haven for themselves, a safe haven. We believe that with the advent of the Endara government which was popularly elected, there will be a change. It is a smidgen too early, quite honestly. We would ask if the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RUSSO] and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] had their way, we would ask of the Panamanians, something I do not believe they are quite capable of doing at this moment.

However, we anticipate exactly what those gentlemen want to do, and what Mr. SCHUMER says ought to be done. No. 1, this bill only authorizes $32 million in temporary aid. The administration still must come back for significant authorization for the amounts of money that they want for Panama.

One of the items that I will be looking for, and we discussed this at the committee meeting yesterday, will be a commitment on money laundering then, and changing bank secrecy laws in addition to enforcing the existing laws. No 2, in this bill there is a commitment because there is a provision that by April 15 there will be a report to Congress by the administration, by the President, on the movement toward changes in the bank secrecy laws. No. 3, the certification process for trafficking in growing countries. Though the certification process which will take place March 1 for all the trafficking and producing countries will allow Members to go over what Panama is doing for the fiscal year 1991 authorization to provide money, without sanctions. When the President comes in and certifies Panama, as I am sure he will, we are going to want to know exactly what "fully cooperative" means, in terms of the money laundering issue. We are going to hold their feet to the fire.

The gentleman from Illinois is correct. They do not have a legislature. It will be impossible to change their laws now. They should be on notice as of today, we want some changes. We want them to commit to those changes. This business about saying that there is not any change necessary ought to be rhetoric left in the dust.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this legislation. However, I am concerned. I am concerned we are often in the position of lobbying the poorest nations to finance and transfer funds to other nations.

However, I am pleased to know that there is a commitment that funds that are being temporarily transferred from the Africa account, in order to meet this emergency need, will be restored. Therefore, I join with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CROCKETT], and the gentleman from California [Mr. DYMALLY] in their concern about Africa.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER], a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

I rise in strong support of the Panama legislation. Indeed, I am happy to be a cosponsor of it. I have, quite sincerely, great respect for the leadership of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs on both sides of the aisle.

I would have to say, however, I am also a member of the Committee on Banking, and perhaps it is appropriate that my remarks follow those of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER], and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITH]. Specifically, on section 104, it appropriately requires the President to report to Congress by April 15 of this year on progress being made by the Government of Panama in modifying and enforcing the bank secrecy laws and other banking laws.

This is within the shared burden, in this instance, of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs and the House Committee on Banking, appropriately.

It is my understanding further that the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that accompanies H.R. 3952 states that this report will be referred to both the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. This issue is surely one in which the Banking Committee has a long-standing interest. The majority and the minority on the Banking Committee have asked me to speak on this matter and to assure the Members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of our interest in this matter, and I would say further that since the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOSTMAYER] gave indication at the meeting of the Committee on Foreign Affairs the other day that he would be offering a further amendment relating to the Panamanian banking law, the Banking Committee will certainly scrutinize this section in anything offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania or otherwise.

Finally, though, I want to say that I think it is appropriate that we do focus on the actual implementation of existing banking law and not simply on exactly whether the law is sufficient as it exists in Panamanian statutes. This has been a major concern to all of us in the Congress, especially those on the Committee on Foreign Affairs and on the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do rise in strong support of this Panama legislation. It is the first of at least two necessary bills that the Congress will have to pass this year.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MONTGOMERY). The Chair will state that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] has 3 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] has 1½ minutes remaining.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRAFICANT], who has been patiently awaiting his turn.

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I oppose the bill for two reasons. No. 1, we have captured Noriega with the freedom fighters in October. Our Government said, "No." In my opinion, the CIA and our President wanted Noriega dead, not alive. We should have an investigation, not an appropriation.

Second of all, I opposed the Panama Canal Treaty to start with. I am against more foreign aid, and this new money will come out of a supplemental appropriation the taxpayers are going to pay for.

Finally, Noriega was a crook. We went in there after him. I say, "When you knock down and kick down Al Capone's door, you don't build him a new house, folks."

I think it is time to take a look at kids who cannot read in America and start spending some bucks at home. We conjure up ways to find money for everybody. I do not mean to demean the chairman of this committee, because he is one of the best in the House, and he is probably doing the right thing. I may be wrong, but I am sick and tired of this, and I am voting no.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, this is a bipartisan bill brought to the floor by the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Florida. I congratulate them for that effort. This is a very important piece of legislation.

The effort in Panama is more than simply an effort to go in and knock out Noriega, as important as that was. Now we have an obligation to make certain that we assure the kind of stability in Central America that allows us to move on from there, that allows us to do something about the drug-running that was going on through that country, that allows us to take steps to assure that the neighboring countries around Panama benefit from what happened there, and also allows us to assure that the Panama Canal remains a major economic asset for this entire hemisphere.

Mr. Speaker, by moving forward on this bill today, it seems to me that we give those kinds of guarantees, and I would like to thank the gentleman for bringing it to the floor.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this legislation and I commend the authors for bringing it to the floor today.

I have been to Panama three times over the past 6 weeks. I went once before Operation Just Cause and then shortly after the military action. Just two weekends ago, I accompanied Vice President DAN QUAYLE there and I can tell you that things have settled down quite a bit.

I support President Bush's decision to bring our troops home by the end of this month, but as we do that, I think it is important to give Panama the means to strengthen their civilian police force. President Endara and his Vice Presidents told us they would prefer that American troops stay on in Panama for a while because of their concern about being able to keep order after we pull out.

As you know, Noriega's thugs ran the police and the army, so it is going to take time and some money to help them build that police force.

That is why the funding for training law enforcement authorities is so important, even though it would be an exception to the prohibition against police training under section 660 of the Foreign Assistance Act. This is a necessary exception, given the circumstances that exist today in Panama. Noriega's thugs ran the army and the civilian police forces. We want to make sure the forces of democracy get their law enforcement people in place and prevent factions of the Dignity Battalions from having any chance to rise up and cause trouble for the Endara government.

The bill also provides $500,000 for procurement of equipment for law enforcement purposes and that is also essential, in my opinion.

We have given Panama the chance to have freedom with Operation Just Cause. Our troops and military equipment worked well. It was a totally successful operation and our troops deserve great credit for it. But we also have an obligation to help this struggling Government get on its feet and move ahead. That is what this bill will do.

The people of Panama must get behind their new Government and I am confident they will, because it was obvious from my visits that they approve of the United States action to rid their country of Noriega. But they do need our help and I think this action today is important to the continuation of the process of restoring democracy and freedom down there. I hope you will join me in support of the bill.

SUMMARY OF DRAFT BILL ON PANAMA

SECTION 101—ASSISTANCE

(a) Economic Assistance:

Authorizes $32 million for urgent economic assistance for Panama.

Exempts this assistance from the provision in FY 1990 appropriations act which restricts deobligation/reobligation authority to funds being used in the same region.

Authorizes $10 million four housing guarantees.

Authorizes Trade Credit Insurance Program for Panama.

(b) Law Enforcement:

Authorizes $1.2 million for Administration of Justice and training law enforcement authorities, notwithstanding the prohibition against police training in section 660 of the Foreign Assistance Act.

Authorizes use of MAP and FMS pipeline for procurement of equipment for law enforcement forces, except not more than $500,000 may be used for procurement of lethal equipment.

15 day notification period is waived for non-lethal assistance provided as justified to Congress within 15 days of enactment.

(c) Brooke-Alexander:

Waives restrictions against assistance to countries in arrears on repayment of U.S. government loans.

SECTIONS 102 AND 103—ANTINARCOTICS REQUIREMENTS

Sections 102(FAA) and 103 (Narcotics Trade Control Act) lift restrictions on aid and trade with Panama for reasons of narcotics trafficking.

SECTION 104—BANK SECRECY LAWS

Commends Endara government for freezing bank accounts implicated in narcotics-related transactions and requires Presidential report on steps by the Panamanian government to modify bank secrecy and deter illegal financial transactions.

SECTION 201—EASTERN EUROPE

Authorizes up to $10 million for assistance to support the process of democratic transition in Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia, subject to 15-day notification requirement and Presidential certification that multi-party elections have been held or are scheduled in the recipient country.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the United States military intervention in Panama has produced considerable debate among my constituents. Whatever the merits of the action, the final score on the United States policy in Panama will hinge not so much on what we already did but on what we do in the future.

I generally have opposed military incursions by U.S. troops because they usually produce counterproductive results. They show a proclivity for military solutions over diplomatic ones and fail to recognize the causes which give rise to conflict. They tend to mire our Government in untenable or unwinnable situations and breed contempt among our neighbors around the world. This has been particularly true in Latin America, where the repetition of United States intervention has left a legacy of bitterness and ill will.

In Panama alone, the United States has intervened a dozen times in this century. It's no wonder that our latest action was greeted by nearly universal disapproval or opprobrium in the Western Hemisphere. Admittedly, many neighboring countries privately expressed a more supportive position than their public posture. Nevertheless, the image of Yankee imperialism was again printed on newspapers throughout the region.

At the same time, I believe that the President had some good reasons for sending down American forces to Panama. We needed to protect American citizens and military personnel from unprovoked attacks by armed thugs under the control of then-Panamanian dictator Manuel Noriega. General Noriega's declaration of a state of war also threatened major United States security interests, including the Panama Canal. We needed to give Panama a chance to establish a democratic government, one stolen from the Panamanian people by General Manuel Noriega. Finally, we needed to stop the use of Panama as a safe haven and money launderer in the international drug trade.

President Bush has now submitted a $1 billion request for aid to Panama. I am leery of pumping that much aid into a small country so quickly. I can support the $42 million package before us today which also includes some trade preferences and loan guarantees.

However, I would urge my colleagues to exercise caution in approving further aid. We should first insist on the removal of all U.S. expeditionary troops, a clear commitment to democratic elections by the Endara government, and a workable game plan for using the aid. We must also weigh the merits of sending another $500 million of proposed supplemental appropriations against our own pressing domestic needs and other competing humanitarian needs in Africa and Eastern Europe.

Finally, the test of our policy will depend on our willingness to fashion a constructive and creative policy toward all of Latin America. It will require that we recognize the dramatic changes in East-West relations and match our concern about democracy in Panama with more even-handed treatment of all neighbors on the democratic path.

This will mean we stop relying on security aid to prop up right-wing regimes and to arm proxy armies and start responding to the human needs of our neighbors with food, medicine, and technical aid. It will entail creative solutions to the crushing burden of debt repayments in Mexico, Argentina, and Brazil, diplomatic backing for Chile in its effort to restore civilian control, partnerships with Andean nations in the antidrug war, and a recognition of the desperate poverty which grips most of Central America and the Caribbean, particularly in Haiti. These are the kinds of bridges to peace which we ought to be building.

In short, if our action in Panama serves to trigger a new awareness of hemispheric problems and to engender new policies which address the key problems, then we will be on the right track. If not, I fear we will drift down the old, dead-end road of gunboat diplomacy and security aid.

Mr. NEAL of Massachusetts, Mr. Speaker, we have arrived at a point in history toward which decades of American foreign and defense policies have been directed. Freedom is returning to the countries of Eastern Europe, faster in some than in others to be sure, but the direction is clear, and, I believe, irreversible.

We must now decide how best to seize the opportunities recent events in Eastern Europe have provided. Last month, I had a chance to visit Poland and East Germany. In the meetings I had with leaders in both countries, the very clear impression I received was that, while there is no illusion as to the difficulty of the economic, social, and political challenges ahead, neither is there the slightest hesitation about doing whatever is necessary to meet them. Extraordinary sacrifice and patience will be required from the people of Eastern Europe, for their needs are great and their economies are not going to be reborn overnight. But I was struck by the spirit of hope found in the countries I visited, hope that those sacrifices for democratic reform would pay big dividends in the years to come.

With commitment from within, and material and moral support from outside their borders, I believe that the hopes of the people of Eastern Europe will be realized. Nations with democratic traditions, like the United States, have a particular responsibility to ensure that the movement away from communism in Eastern Europe succeeds. This is a responsibility born only partly out of altruism. We have long talked of the benefits of freedom. That talk has inspired the people of Eastern Europe, who have now taken the first steps toward attaining the kind of political and economic system we have so glowingly described. Who can believe that the United States will not be better off, by any imaginable standard of measurement, in being confronted by an Eastern Europe striving to open its markets and its political process, than by a Warsaw Pact arrayed threateningly behind armored divisions, missile batteries, and miles of barbed wire.

Yes, investments in democracy cost money. Yes, we have unmet needs at home with legitimate claims on our budgetary resources which for too long have been ignored. But the actions of those seeking liberty in the countries of Eastern Europe have presented us with opportunities we simply cannot afford to ignore. If the United States is not an active participant in the struggle now being waged by the democratic reform movements in those countries, we risk not only the success of those movements, but our credibility as a champion of liberty as well.

Today we take a small, but important step in providing the kind of assistance the people of Eastern Europe need. H.R. 3952 builds on the program of aid Congress fashioned for Poland and Hungary last year. By restricting its economic assistance to countries in which free, multiparty elections have been held, or are scheduled, the legislation offers both clear political goals, which we should support, and an incentive for attaining them. More U.S. assistance is going to be required, especially in the economic area and we must be clear on that. But passage of this measure sends an important message that the United States is committed to working with the worlds' other democracies to ensure that the revolutions which began in the shipyards in Gdansk, the streets of Prague and Budapest, and at the Berlin wall, do not fail.

Mr. FAUNTROY, Mr. Speaker, I rise in qualified support of the bill before the House today. My qualification is based on the assumption that an agreement reached between the administration and those of us here on the Hill concerned about aid levels for Africa will be honored.

I, along with Chairman WOLPE, Senator SIMON, and the entire membership of the Black Caucus were opposed to the resolution in its original form. Our opposition was based on the fact that $30 million was to be transferred from the already depleted foreign aid allocations for sub-Saharan Africa.

While I have supported the President in his efforts to restore democracy in Panama, it makes no rational sense to take precious resources away from the poorest region of the world. I am pleased, therefore, and can only support this bill, in light of the fact that Chairman OBEY, Chairman LEAHY, House leadership, and President Bush have agreed to restore this $30 million in funds to the Africa account during consideration of the supplemental. I hope and trust that such a transfer is only the first step we take this year to ensure equitable treatment for sub-Saharan Africa.

As a member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, I want to briefly comment on a provision of the legislation that is within the shared jurisdiction of the Foreign Affairs and Banking Committees. Section 104 requires the President report to Congress by April 15 on progress being made by the Government of Panama in modifying its bank secrecy laws. It is my understanding that the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that accompanies H.R. 3952 states that this report will be referred to the Committees on Foreign Affairs and Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. It is also my expectation that the Secretary of the Treasury and Federal bank regulators will be consulted during the development of this report.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] that the House suspended the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 3952.

The question was taken.

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SENSE OF CONGRESS CONCERNING OPERATION JUST CAUSE IN PANAMA

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and agree to the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 262) expressing the sense of Congress concerning Operation Just Cause in Panama.

H. CON. RES. 262

Whereas the President, with the support of the Congress and the American people, acted decisively and appropriately in ordering United States forces to intervene in Panama after making substantial efforts to resolve the crisis in Panama by political, economic, and diplomatic means in order to avoid resorting to military action;

Whereas United States Armed Forces showed great dedication and professionalism in their actions to restore democracy to Panama during Operation Just Cause, which began December 20, 1989;

Whereas those United States military personnel involved in the Panama operation performed their duties selflessly, as evidenced by the tragic loss of 23 soldiers' lives in support of the democratic aspirations of the people of Panama;

Whereas those soldiers who lost their lives in Panama demonstrated the full measure of their devotion to their country and to the democratic ideal;

Whereas the United States' action has received broad support and approval from the people of Panama;

Whereas the United States' action in Panama was a response to a unique set of circumstances, and does not undermine the commitment of the government of the United States to the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of other countries; and

Whereas the American people overwhelmingly support and are proud of the actions taken by the United States forces to further universal democratic ideals, to protect American lives and to bring to justice a major international criminal: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved that the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring): That the Congress—

(1) expresses its sadness over the loss of 23 United States soldiers' lives in Panama, and conveys deep condolences to the families of those who died in Panama;

(2) commends the President for his efforts to provide for the early return to the United States of the remaining United States troops engaged in Operation Just Cause; and

(3) urges the President to continue his efforts to foster democratic ideals in Panama and the establishment of a democratic government so long sought by the people of Panama.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire, is the gentleman from Michigan opposed to the bill?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, let me state that I am not opposed to the bill. I was not aware that the gentleman from California was going to be opposed to the bill. I would be glad to share my 20 minutes with the gentleman, if we could do it that way. We have a number of speakers who wish to be heard.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, let me say that I have no desire to be difficult. I would be satisfied if the gentleman would yield the opposition an appropriate amount of time so that my speakers might be heard.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, let me suggest that we yield the opposition 5 mintues. Would the gentleman be satisfied if he had a total of 10 minutes?

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, that would be enough as long as some of our colleagues have an opportunity to express their views. I know that both the gentleman from Michigan and the chairman of the committee are more than cooperative.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, we want to give the Members sufficient time to be heard. Let us just agree on the time here.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might, by unanimous consent, ask that the gentleman from Florida, the gentleman from California, and the gentleman from Michigan each have 20 minutes?

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Michigan would just hold up on that request for a minute, let us see if we can get an agreement on time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that if the gentleman from California is opposed to the bill, he is entitled to the 20 minutes if he so requests it.

Mr. FASCELL. I recognize that, Mr. Speaker, but if I may be heard for just 1 minute, may I ask, if both the majority and the minority gave the gentleman and the opposition 7½ minutes apiece, for a total of 15 minutes in opposition to the legislation, would that be satisfactory?

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Yes, of course it is, Mr. Speaker, I doubt if we will use all the time. I just want to make sure that those of us who are in opposition to the bill have enough time to express our views.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is satisfied that the gentleman from California does not claim the time, and so, without objection, the request of the gentleman from Florida is implemented.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair wishes to state the situation. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] has 20 mintues, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] also has 20 minutes. Without objection, the gentleman from Florida and the gentleman from Michigan may yield 7½ minutes each to the gentleman from California [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, without objection, I yield 7½ minutes to the gentleman from California, and I will reserve the balance of my time for myself.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

There was no objection.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the principal purpose of the resolution before the House is to commend the dedication of the U.S. military personnel involved in the operation in Panama.

These men and women demonstrated their dedication to American ideals and their professionalism in the courageous and correct manner in which they performed their responsibilities in this incursion.

Our heartfelt sorrow is extended to those families who lost members in this action, and we hope they can take solace in the proud and courageous role which these Americans played in removing the yoke of oppression and restoring democracy to the Panamanian people.

The resolution takes note of the support of the American people for the success of this action. It also commends the President for his efforts to extend democracy in Panama and to provide for the early return home of United States forces involved in the operation.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to defer to the principal author of this resolution, the gentleman from Michigan, the ranking Republican on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Mr. BROOMFIELD.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying how pleased I am that this resolution has the support of both parties.

It has been said that politics stops at the water's edge. That may not always have been the case, but it reflects the principle that a President can sustain no great initiative in foreign affairs without the support of Congress.

This resolution offers bipartisan support for the President and the thousands of soldiers who served in Operation Just Cause under his command.

The fact that it has such wide bipartisan support is due in no small measure to two Members of this great House: the highly esteemed chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, DANTE FASCELL, and our distinguished colleague, STEVE SOLARZ.

I would like to thank them and all the other Members who made it possible to vote on this important resolution today.

Mr. Speaker, 2 months ago, Manuel Noriega was a brutish and dangerous tyrant. He had destroyed political freedom in Panama; his goons had assaulted both Panamanian and American civilians.

What is more, this unpredictable dictator presented a serious threat to the West's most strategically important waterway.

Today Manuel Noriega is a common inmate in the U.S. prison system. For that outcome, America can thank the courage and professionalism of its Armed Forces and the decisive leadership of its President.

I am sure the President and our men and women in uniform shared some dark days during the time when Manuel Noriega was able to avoid being captured. At the time, I recall faint stirrings of the kind of criticism that comes up when leaders engage in bold enterprises.

President Bush and America's fighting men and women stayed the course. In doing so, they won the support of their countrymen and the profound gratitude of the Panamanian people.

Panama is once again a democratic nation. But freedom was obtained, as it always is, at no small cost. Twenty-three brave Americans gave their lives fighting for the rights of others.

The deeds of these courageous soldiers will not be forgotten. Their courage and their selflessness will be memorialized in the resolution we passed today.

The sacrifices made by our troops in Panama should not be in vain. This resolution urges the President to continue his efforts to foster democratic ideals in Panama and help promote the kind of political and economic environment in which democracy will thrive.

I urge my colleagues to vote for this resolution.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this resolution that has been presented by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] and also supported by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of going to Panama twice since the Operation Just Cause had been completed, and I might say, to follow up what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] said, it was a totally successful military operation. The American soldiers and volunteers did a splendid job. Mr. Speaker, we are saddened by the loss of lives and those severely wounded.

So, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of us who have been down to Panama and saw that operation, I certainly think this resolution is in order, and I totally support it, and I commend the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] for getting it to the floor, as well as the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, only portions of this resolution should be approved.

We all join every American in expressing sadness over the loss of 23 U.S. soldiers and convey deep condolences to their families.

The resolution should also express sadness over the deaths of hundreds of Panamanians and offer condolences to their families. It should also express regret for the widespread physical destruction caused by the U.S. invasion.

We should not declare that the President acted appropriately in invading this small, weak nation.

The invasion was unwise and illegal. It violated all of our treaties and agreements wherein we were bound not to intervene militarily in another country.

Our invasion turned a Panamanian problem, the burden of having a corrupt and cruel leader into an American problem.

Like it or not, the invasion created for America a client state, with all the resulting obligations and expenses.

We Americans have volunteered to be responsible for Noriega's present and future, a formidable task involving much expense, tedious legal proceedings, and hyped up media coverage.

The war has also given us the responsibility of repairing the enormous damage caused by the invasion. We approved the first installment of $42 million today. We will be asked to approve at least another billion.

As time passes and the euphoria of a victorious war fades. President Bush will be hard put to justify legally this decision.

Our national security was not at risk. Neither American lives nor the Panama Canal were in danger. And there is no law licensing the President to send an invading army to arrest a minor drug suspect in a foreign country.

My view is the overwhelming majority view of the nations of the world. The minority view is that the President acted appropriately.

I hope that President Bush will hereafter respect the constitutional mandate that Congress be included in warmaking decisions.

Both the Constitution and the War Powers Act allow unilateral Presidential warmaking only in an emergency requiring an immediate response.

In the case of Panama there was no emergency and the plans for the invasion were secretly drawn up months ago without congressional consultation or even knowledge.

Congress shares some of the blame in these Presidential decisions to engage in unauthorized wars. It is not Congress' job to be a cheerleader for any military adventure.

The Constitution requires us to be advisers, authorizers, and critics.

The invasion of Panama was the 36th American military intervention in Central America in this century.

It is time for us to give up the practice of foreign policy by military force and instead to be a responsible law-abiding member of the world family of nations.

I urge a "no" vote on this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, permit me to take this opportunity to commend the President of the United States and our military personnel for the outstanding manner in which they fulfilled their mission defending United States interests in Panama. The United States action in Panama made an unequivocal statement to the world that our Nation will not allow itself to be kicked around by anyone.

This legislation is particularly noteworthy, because it recognizes that after extensive diplomatic, political, and economic efforts, the President took appropriate and decisive action. The resolution recognizes the broad support and approval of the Panamanian people for the U.S. action. Finally, the resolution expresses the Congress's profound sadness over the loss of 23 of our soldier's lives, and conveys our condolences to their families.

I commend the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], the ranking Republican, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD], as well as all of our colleagues on the Committee on Foreign Affairs who were involved in the drafting of this legislation and particularly the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TORRICELLI] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ].

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the resolution before the House today.

I certainly share those sentiments expressed in this resolution which express deep sadness for the American servicemen who lost their lives during the Panama invasion. The bravery of those who served and died in Panama deserves the respect of all Americans, and this resolution rightly conveys deep condolences to the families of these brave men; but Mr. Speaker, I cannot support a resolution that calls our illegal invasion of Panama a decisive and appropriate operation.

The invasion violated international law, including the OAS Charter and the United Nations Charter, and it violated the Panama Canal Treaty, which prohibits military intervention by the United States in the internal affairs of Panama.

Perhaps most importantly, the invasion violated the U.S. Constitution which gives the Congress the responsibility for the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces into hostilities abroad, and says that it has to be done by way of a declaration of war, except in emergency circumstances, which certainly did not apply in this instance.

The U.S. invasion has also hampered our diplomatic efforts to gain cooperation from our Latin American allies in the war against drug trafficking, and it has given unwarranted credibility to the ridiculous notion that the U.S. Government, or any government for that matter, may invade another country in pursuit of an indicted criminal. Can you imagine the outcry if Mu'ammar Qadhafi decided to apply that principle to this Nation's leaders?

Even though President Bush may have achieved some of the short-term goals he outlined as justification for the invasion, I am convinced that the U.S. action was contrary to our long term national security interests, and will ultimately reflect poorly, as it has already begun to, on the reputation and prestige of the United States.

The real costs of this unjustified invasion are only now becoming clear. Whole neighborhoods in Panama City were completely destroyed. Hundreds of innocent Panamanian civilians were killed and thousands are now homeless as a result of the so-called Just Cause operation.

Was the capture of one drug trafficker whom we helped elevate to that position worth so much devastation?

Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues today in mourning the loss of 23 brave Americans and the hundreds of Panamanians who were killed, but I cannot support President Bush's decision to place these United States troops at risk in an invasion that was unjustified and illegal.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to oppose the resolution.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO].

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Concurrent Resolution 262.

The decision by President Bush to send American forces to Panama was applauded by the Panamanian people and supported by a majority of Americans, as well. After exhausting all other diplomatic, economic and political alternatives and after Noriega declared war on the United States the President chose a course of action designed to accomplish four objectives: To protect Americans living in Panama, to protect American interests in the Panama Canal, to restore democracy in Panama and to bring to justice indicted drug kingpin Manuel Antonio Noriega.

All four of those objectives were accomplished, due to large part to the exemplary service of United States personnel already in Panama and those sent by the President to bolster our forces there.

While all of us regret the loss of life—both American and Panamanian—that resulted from this military action, the defense of freedom and democracy and the prevention of even greater threat's against Americans fully justified the President's decisive order to introduce American combat troops into Panama.

Virtually all those who have investigated the actions carried out by American service personnel during the initial hours of combat and the following several days of stabilization activities believe U.S. Armed Forces, both men and women, conducted themselves in an extraordinary manner. I am proud to the professional conduct of our military forces throughout this operation. The success of their mission reflects the training, the discipline and the leadership that are so vital to preserving the defense of American interests both at home and abroad.

I am pleased this resolution recognizes the decisive action of President Bush in ordering American combat troops to Panama. I am only sorry that some in this House find it impossible to more directly commend the President for what he did, particularly when it was supported by the majority of the American people, and more importantly, by a very strong majority of Panamanians.

I urge my colleagues to give their strong support to this resolution.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OWENS].

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the resolution.

Certainly I agree that we should express our sadness over the loss of lives of 23 U.S. soldiers in Panama, and we should convey our deepest condolences to the families of the soldiers that were killed.

I think that also we should have gone further and expressed our regrets to the civilians who were killed, our regrets over the loss of life. A great Nation, one of the world's two superpowers, can afford to be generous enough to regret the loss of civilian life in an operation of this kind. I think it is unfortunate that the resolution omitted that.

I think also that we should understand that these men who died had to carry out orders. They did their job well. They ought to be commended. It is up to us to see to it that they did not die in vain. Since they were there to deal with problems created by the thug fanatic, totally out of control Noriega, I hope that they did not die in vain and that Noriega will be punished for his crimes. I hope that we will not have a deal made with Noriega and that after a pretense of a trial he will walk off scot-free someplace to enjoy the millions that he has stored away. Those soldiers would have died in vain, and our Nation would look ridiculous, and the immorality of this invasion will be that much greater if that happens.

I hope they have not died in vain in the pursuit of the elimination of Panama as a drug trafficking center. I hope that our Government will take steps to guarantee that the people who are in power now are not also in any way involved with drug trafficking. I hope our Government will keep the members of the Government and their families placed under immediate scrutiny and certify to us that these men did not die in vain, that we do not have one set of drug traffickers replaced with another set of drug traffickers.

I hope that our Government will see to it that they have not died in vain and they have advanced the cause of human rights and democracy. We have said that we helped to make a democracy in Panama. I hope they have not died in vain, that truly we will have democracy throughout this hemisphere, including Panama. Panama has serious human rights problems.

Panama is primarily a country where the minorities are in the majority. The Indians, the West Indians, the mulattoes, constitute the majority, but in the present government you see very few of their faces. They have a definite human rights problem in Panama which I hope our Government will use its influence and its present role as a mentor for Panama to deal with that human rights problem that is there.

The men who built the Panama Canal, the canal was built mostly by persons who were black, who were transported from the West Indies Islands after other people could not do it. They laid aside their racism and brought black people in. They built the Panama Canal. They have not been given credit for that by this Government or any government. They deserve some justice as we distribute the aid that we have by voice vote voted to begin. That is not enough, but as we distribute that aid I hope that it gets down to the men who built the Panama Canal, the poor people, many of whom blindly followed Noriega, because like most dictators he looked down at the downtrodden and he knew that he could build a supporting constituency there, so he gave them some opportunities and they blindly followed him.

But Noriega was a thug and eventually he was out of control. He had to be stopped. I think our Government should have put more pressure on him.

I think the Government should have made the kind of deal with him before we lost all of these lives that they are going to make now. They are going to make a deal. They would not accept a deal before, but they are going to make a deal now.

I hope the 22 U.S. soldiers did not die in vain and have a deal made that takes care of Noriega after all of these deaths. I hope the civilians who were killed unjustly did not die in vain. I hope the reputation of our Nation, as a nation that represents law and order, international law and order, was not sullied in vain.

I hope that we have learned from this importance of democracy in our whole hemisphere, and that 90 miles from the shores of our Nation just off the coast of Florida, the nation of Haiti, which suffers under a more brutal dictatorship even, a dictatorship that often is involved in drug-running, the dictatorship in Haiti, the dictatorship of Lieutenant General Avril, which has never been opposed by this Government in loud terms. They say they are against it, but they do not speak out against it. No pressure is being applied against Haiti.

I hope we will go on in the name of these soldiers, in the name of all people who died, to establish democracy everywhere in the hemisphere including in Haiti and including Panama. I hope that they have not died in vain.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON].

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, let me just thank our chairman, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], for his understanding cooperation in allowing this resolution to be marked up in his Committee on Foreign Affairs and to come to the floor here today.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly support this resolution. Because it is entirely appropriate for us to consider this resolution in tandem with the aid package for Panama, because the whole idea of helping Panama and supporting the democracy there would not even be an issue right now if not for the skill and courage of our American armed forces, as well as the decisiveness and leadership of their commander in chief, President George Bush.

Mr. Speaker, every American regrets the circumstances that made Operation Just Cause necessary. But I am convinced, as the American people are convinced, that military intervention was justified as a last resort when all other options had been exhausted. Moreover, Operation Just Cause had a clearly defined set of objectives. And the commitment of troop strength and materiél was appropriate to those objectives.

But most importantly, our American forces were welcomed as liberators by the Panamanian people themselves. They were the ones who had suffered under the cruel yoke of Noriega and the dictators who came before him. They were the ones whose hopes for democracy had been denied repeatedly. And they are the ones who hold the keys to Panama's future.

I have always believed that our policy toward Panama, particularly with respect to the future of the canal, has to be based on maintaining the confidence and support of the Panamanian people. That is why it is so important that they responded to Operation Just Cause in the way they did.

One final thing, Mr. Speaker: This is an appropriate time to commend the leadership of Gen. Colin Powell. He is not mentioned by name in the resolution, but certainly he deserves the gratitude of the American and Panamanian people. General Powell assumed the responsibility for planning Operation Just Cause, as well as the operational responsibilities once the action was actually under way which saved hundreds of American lives as well as hundreds and hundreds of Panamanians lives.

We mourn the dead, but we know they did not die in vain. Americans are justifiably proud of the success achieved by Operation Just Cause. This resolution here today pays proper tribute to all for whom it is due. We thank all of those involved.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield an additional 6 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished chairman for his cooperation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 mintues to the distinguished gentleman from Oregon [Mr. DEFAZIO].

Mr. DEFAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I share the Nation's grief over the loss of 23 United States soldiers in the invasion of Panama. I extend my sympathy to their families and their loved ones. I also grieve for the innocent Panamanian civilians killed or injured in this invasion, and I commend the President for his commitment to bring our troops home at the earliest opportunity.

But I cannot support a resolution that congratulates the President for invading a sovereign nation at great cost to our Nation in lives and in dollars without approval from Congress and without even prior consultation with congressional leadership. We do our institution, this institution, the U.S. Congress, a grave disservice by approving an action that was illegal under the U.S. Constitution and under international law.

We have to ask ourselves whether this action which cost the lives of 23 young Americans and will cost this Nation dearly before all is said and done was really necessary. It did wonders for the President's public approval ratings. But did it really advance the interests of the United States for all of the lives lost and the billions of dollars it will cost the American taxpayer? We got one drug-running thug locked up in a Miami jail and more than 2 million Panamanian dependents.

I cannot support the part of this resolution that states that the President acted decisively and appropriately. I would say he acted sadly and inevitably as a result of the bankrupt and short-sighted policies followed by the Reagan-Bush administration since 1981 toward Central America and their single-minded obsession with Nicaragua.

In 1984 the Reagan-Bush administration condoned Noriega and his party when they stole a national election, and in 1990 we invaded to depose the despicable dictator that we created.

I urge my colleagues to vote against this resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCDERMOTT). The gentleman yielded back 1 minute of his time.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SAVAGE].

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, I also rise in opposition to this motion, because I do not consider that might can ever be a substitute for right. One cannot impose, and should not attempt to impose, democracy at the end of a gun.

This country too long in its history has had a record of using force to impose its will upon our weaker neighbors, and I think we need an end to that gunboat diplomacy. America was wrong in invading Panama as well as would any other nation be wrong in international law in invading a neighbor. We were wrong, and it is wrong to praise those who committed that wrong whether they had any choice or not. It was wrong for America to invade Panama. It was wrong for America to invade Grenada. It was wrong for America to raid a Nicaraguan Embassy, and it was wrong for America to fire upon an unarmed Cuban vessel in international waters.

That is the road not to democracy and peace but to war and dictatorship.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTENMEIER]

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time, but I do not know that I will require all of that.

Mr. Speaker, earlier today we voted for the emergency aid legislation to Panama which authorizes economic aid including support for low-income housing construction and a small support for police training funds.

In view of the great damage brought to Panama as a result of the U.S. invasion, I think this is the least we could do, and it certainly represents a consensus of those of us 29 Members who went to Panama earlier last month at the request of the Speaker.

Later on in this session we are going to be called on to handle a much larger Panamanian aid bill which we will have to review very carefully. However, we are now considering a resolution which incorporates several matters.

I join with all of my colleagues in expressing sadness over the loss of American servicemen and conveying our condolences to their families. I certainly also support an early return of U.S. troops from Panama.

Mr. Speaker, however, I take great exception to that provision of the resolution which gratuitously commends President Bush for ordering the invasion of Panama, an independent and sovereign nation, an action which, in my view, does violate international law and which has been condemned by 20 of 21 Latin American countries.

The pretext which President Bush used to go to war with Panama was indeed stretched. I find it regrettable that the President in the latter part of the 20th century, in 1989 and 1990, found it necessary to resort to the use of gunboat diplomacy, a policy long before discredited.

Mr. Speaker, last month the House was to consider a resolution which would have appropriately expressed our sadness over the deaths of our servicemen in Panama, condolences to their families, without heaping praise on the President. I would have voted for that resolution. But today, Mr. Speaker, I will vote against this resolution and urge my colleagues to do so as well.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time, 4½ minutes, to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE].

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I just would like to reply briefly to some of the statements made by other speakers. I heard the phrase "how wrong it is to invade a sovereign nation."

I do not know what the technical or legal definition of a sovereign nation is, but if it is a country where a tyrant is running things and dignity battalions and armed to the teeth paramilitary groups of thugs are roaming the streets shooting at will, and who shot and killed an unarmed marine, who pistol whipped another marine officer and threatened his wife with sexual abuse, if they declare war on the United States, their puppet parliament and their thug of a dictator, I have difficulty looking at that as a sovereign state.

When they have a democratic election on May 7 and it is nullified by the dictator, and when the vice president who was elected in one of the most internationally observed elections in this hemisphere by 3 to 1 is beaten bloody by the dignity battalions on the streets of Panama City, it seems to me something ought to be done, unless you are totally impotent.

One phrase we heard down there from the acting director of the Panama Canal Commission, Mr. Manfredo, from the Papal Annuncio and others, this was not an invasion, it was a liberation. And if you cannot distinguish between force for subjugation and force for liberation, then I suppose it is difficult to discuss this matter with you.

The canal was under threat. We have a treaty that gives us the right to protect our national interests in the canal. The director of the Canal Commission said workers were quitting their jobs because their license plates were being revoked, their automobiles were confiscated, and they could not get to work.

There is a way to shut the canal down without bombing it or causing a landslide. It was harassment of the employees that was going on. That was one legal basis.

Article 51, section 51 of the U.N. Charter and article 21 of the OAS Charter grant the right of self-defense to a country. When that is involved, lives are at stake. Our lives were at stake, lives of American citizens, 35,000 American citizens in the Panama Canal Zone.

Now, we tried negotiation. We tried diplomacy. Nothing worked. Nothing worked. I suggest to you that if the people of Pamana count on anything, they were jubilant at the liberation that our government gave them.

I regret that this resolution, while it has the right words, it does not have them in the right place. We commend the President for getting our troops out. We ought to commend the President for sending them down there.

We sort of do that in the first paragraph, and, as long as the words are there, I will accept that. But I think we ought to find it in our political hearts to commend the President. I do not think that would violate partisanship around here.

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to my dear friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SAVAGE].

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask two quick questions: one is, is the gentleman suggesting that this Nation has the authority to determine whether or not it wishes to recognize the sovereignty of another nation, No. 1? is that right?

Mr. HYDE. No; I am saying that I have difficulty being hemmed in by the concept of sovereignty when a country is lawless and when a country violates the democratic procedure recognized, but nullifying a fair and free election, which is what Mr. Noriega did.

Mr. SAVAGE. When that happens, does the gentleman suggest that wherever that happens in the world this Nation then is justified in invading that nation militarily?

Mr HYDE. Mr. Speaker, no. Just where there is a Panama Canal. I would give that great weight, great weight. If there is a Panama Canal where half our imports and exports pass through. I would suggest the whole world has an interest in protecting that canal.

Mr. SAVAGE. Is it not true the only time the Panama Canal traffic has been interfered with, it was interfered with by this Nation and not by Panama?

Mr. HYDE. Oh, it would be too late, sir.

Mr. SAVAGE. Is that not true, what I just asked the gentleman? Historically, the only time traffic in the Panama Canal has been interfered with was by this Nation, not Panama?

Mr. HYDE. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SAVAGE] certainly has heard of preventive medicine.

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, maybe we are the ones that need to use the medicine on ourselves. We are the ones that interfered with traffic in the Panama Canal, not Panama.

Mr. HYDE. Would the gentleman tell me why he is so protective of the dictator Manuel Noriega?

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, I am protective of the sovereignty of nations and the rights of all people, no matter how weak, no matter what color, no matter how underdeveloped. I believe that all people under God are equal. All nations likewise.

Mr. HYDE. If the gentleman from Illinois would go to Panama he would find out how the people think. They welcomed us. They would even welcome him.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CARPER].

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I hate to interrupt this dialog, this lively dialog, we have going here. Let me do that if I may.

Mr. Speaker, I was privileged to join a number of colleagues in the congressional delegation led by our majority leader, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT], to Panama last month. We did meet with Panamanians from all walks of life. We met with people both high and low, people who expressed their heartfelt gratitude to us as Americans for the actions that we had taken.

I, too, recall the words of one of the religious leaders of Panama with whom we met who said, yes, indeed, that he and his countrymen regarded us as liberators and not as invaders.

I think this resolution before us today, and we can quibble about whether or not it gives the President enough credit or it doesn't, I think it is about right. I for one think that he did the right thing.

Having said that, let me say this resolution represents an effort to convey the gratitude that we as a delegation heard from the Panamanian people and an effort to convey that gratitude to American families who lost their loved ones, to our American military personnel who were willing to risk their lives, for an American President, and I think for a Congress, both of whom were willing to take some risks including political risks, in this endeavor.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that some of our colleagues and some Americans regret the use of force in this intervention. Let me just say we did not use force in the beginning. We used, I think, reasonable economic pressure to try to bring about change. We used reasonable diplomatic pressure to try to bring about change.

Finally, when literally the physical well-being of our men and women and their families in Panama was being threatened, we took the overt action we did on December 20.

Let me further add there are some in Panama who would now like to see us provide for them an enormous aid package, almost a mini-Marshall plan. The administration, I think, has provided a very generous plan, maybe not up to the expectations of some in Panama. It is not a bad proposal. I think it has merit. I believe we will want to work our will on that plan here in Congress. I think we have an obligation to help put Panama back on their feet, and we intend to meet that obligation.

Mr. Speaker, having said that, I believe we in the Congress also look forward to the Panamanian Government taking some steps to address a major concern to us, and that concern is the elimination of money laundering of drug money in that country. There are some steps that they already have taken. There is more that they need to do. In the months ahead, between now and the time that we take up the larger aid package for Panama, we in this body will be looking carefully to the Panamanian Government to see what further steps they are willing and able to take.

Mr. Speaker, I again thank the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] for yielding this time.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman would yield, I want to thank the gentleman for his comments. They are very well thought out. I agree totally with his presentation and his conclusions.

I urge my colleagues to listen to the advice of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CARPER]. It is very persuasive. I trust that Members will support this resolution.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on House Concurrent Resolution 262.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCDERMOTT). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I just want to end this very interesting debate with this point: It is patently ludicrous to think that any nation has the sacred right to invade another, independent nation, because we don't like its leader, or the actions of its government.

I wonder how we would feel if the Soviets said that they were going to take over neighboring Finland, because they do not like the way the government runs, or they're disturbed that a Russian has been killed while walking down one of the streets of a Finnish city.

I used that example the other day when someone said an American soldier was killed in Panama. Yes, he was tragically killed, but if a Canadian citizen is mugged in New York City, would the Canadians then be justified in sending into the United States a 26,000 person army?

I urge a no vote on the resolution.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise, Mr. Speaker, in opposition to the resolution before the House which proposes to authorize emergency aid to Panama.

I fully support the re-integration of Panama into the global community of nations, following President Bush's ill-advised Operation Just Cause, the military action against that nation, and I do support the concept of providing genuine humanitarian assistance to the people of Panama.

I question in particular, Mr. Speaker, the method we have arrived at to fund these expenditures. House Concurrent Resolution 262 would transfer funds from accounts containing monies appropriated for economic and development assistance to African countries. These nations are already underserved, in both absolute and relative terms, by our foreign aid programs. The diversion of $30 million, measured against a base which has, since 1984, declined in both real dollars and as a percentage of our overall foreign aid expenditures, represents a significant loss of non-military, non-food aid to sub-Saharan Africa.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that the leadership of the committees with jurisdiction over this matter have pledged to restore these funds. I think it is important to point out, however, that there may have been several other choices in this matter, and I would hope that in revisiting the issue, those with jurisdiction would be mindful of the tremendous cuts that African nations have already absorbed. We can, and should, elevate assistance levels to a level more commensurate with our national interests in the region.

In addition, this deduction further skews the proportional relationship between economic amd military assistance; globally, that proportion is already dangerously tilted toward the military side of the equation. We have for several years debated with successive administrations the question of military vs. economic aid, and have repeatedly restructured the proposals sent to us by the Executive to reflect a more humane set of priorities. I object, Mr. Speaker, to this ad-hoc means of restacking the deck. Our long-term national interests are injured by the perception that the United States is not a reliable partner in development; we foster the impression that, in order to establish a bilateral relationship with the United States, a nation must host a military base or shelter an insurgency. We will one day regret that image—the demographics of underdeveloped nations have superceded the utility of foreign extensions of our military might.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we must note that some of this aid would be targeted for balance of payments assistance to African nations, and it is truly needed. In most cases, countries south of the Sahara remit more to the United States and international lending institutions in debt repayment than they receive in export income and foreign aid. Our redirection of resources only exacerbates that situation. We will pay a global price for the invasion of Panama, and this aspect of House Concurrent Resolution 262 will be implemented at the expense of the people of sub-Saharan Africa, our lending institutions and taxpayers.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to join with my colleagues in commending the American soldiers who lost their lives or were wounded in the recent operation in Panama, and I want to express my profound condolences to the families of those who gave up their lives in the operation.

As of January 22, 1990, four soldiers based in Fort Ord, CA had died in Panama since the deployment of December 20. I want to pay highest tribute to those soldiers today: CWO Andrew P. Porter, Sgt. William D. Gibbs, Pfc Anthony J. Pettignano, and Sp. Douglas J. Duff. We are all very proud of these young men and their contributions to the operation in Panama. We remember their families, too, who have endured the loss of their loved ones in the service of the Nation. These soldiers and their families have our lasting and deepest appreciation.

I also want to honor our countrymen wounded in Panama. From Fort Ord 27 soldiers were injured before January 22. They, too, deserve the gratitude of the Nation for their tremendous courage. Today we join their families in expressing our highest commendations and pride in their services in Panama.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of measures before us today to commend the actions of United States personnel in the Panama operation and to restore normalcy to the Panamanian economy and United States-Panamanian trade relations.

Mr. Speaker, as the vice chairman of both the House Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control and the Transportation Appropriations Subcommittee, which has responsibility for funding issues relative to the Panama Canal, I have long been concerned about the situation in Panama. These concerns were heightened all the more when I traveled to Panama in May as a member of the congressional delegation appointed by the President to observe the elections there. They were further intensified when United States service personnel and their dependents were threatened and assaulted—and in one case—killed by members of the now-defunct Panama Defense Forces.

Accordingly, I was extremely supportive of President Bush's decision to send United States forces into action in Panama. We all know that no President sends our Nation's military personnel into harm's way without great regard for the risks to which those men and women will be subjected The use of military force must always be a cause of last resort, after all other possible efforts have failed. In the case at hand, I believe very strongly that the President pursued all other mean at his disposal in his efforts to bring about an end to the Noriega dictatorship through nonmilitary means. His actions were, under the circumstances, fully justified.

When it became clear that military force was required, U.S. forces rose to the occasion, performing with great distinction. Operation Just Cause was a tremendous success. The resolution before us today properly expresses the great appreciation of the Congress and of the American people for the actions undertaken by our servicemen and women; it also expresses our deepest condolences to the families of the 23 servicemen who made the ultimate sacrifice in carrying out this critical mission.

In addition, we will today be pursuing legislation to restore some normalcy to the Panamanian economy. This will be done through the lifting of trade and other sanctions imposed during the Noriega dictatorship and through the authorization of assistance to meet, in particular, Panama's most immediate humanitarian needs. These needs are great, and the legislation before us merits our strong support.

I know all of my colleagues join me in extending their fullest possible support and very best wishes to the Panamanain people as they strive to institutionalize democracy and to address their pressing economic requirements.

Mrs. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, later today, the House will be considering House Concurrent Resolution 262 to commend our military forces for their action in Panama. These brave men and women deserve our thanks for a job well done. Because of them, the drug running and dictatorial rule of Manuel Noriega are over. Our forces moved swiftly to restore democracy, ensure the safety of the canal, and close a major drug route to the United States.

As successful as the mission turned out to be, it was not without its costs. Those costs had special significance for one family in the Fourth Congressional District of South Carolina.

In the early morning hours of December 20, Marine Cpl. Garreth C. Isaak, of Greenville, SC, joined other United States soldiers taking part in the conflict in Panama. Sadly, Corporal Isaak was one of the first casualties of the operation.

I want to again express my sympathy to Corporal Isaak's family and friends. His loss will be felt deeply. Their hurt cannot easily be soothed. But, hopefuly, they can take solace that their son, their friend, truly gave his life in the cause of freedom and democracy.

Gary fought for the values that we as Americans hold near and dear. He fought to end the reign of a dictator. He fought to disrupt the flow of drugs that are besieging this country. He gave his life in Panama to save lives at home. In the finest Marine Corps tradition, Gary Isaak put his duty to his country first.

Today, we in Congress will honor the memory of Corporal Isaak, and all the others who fought and died in Panama. Their mission was a success. They deserve this commendation. I know my colleagues will join me in supporting this resolution.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues today in commending the service of U.S. troops in Panama during Operation Just Cause.

As we all know, this operation, launched last December 20, was successful in bringing to justice in the United States Gen. Manuel Antonio Noriega, wanted in this country for narcotics trafficking on a vast scale. The speedy completion of this objective in itself is worthy of our praise and gratitude.

However, more—much more, in fact—was at stake during this operation. Indeed, during those early morning hours of last December 20, elements of our Armed Forces acted to do nothing less than restore democratic government to Panama and its thousands of oppressed people.

That this was accomplished with the utmost professionalism—even at the sacrifice of 23 soldiers' lives—is worthy not only of our praise and gratitute, but of our respect and honor, as well.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, it should not go without being said that President Bush, the commander in chief of these troops and the leader of the greatest democratic nation on Earth, deserves our greatest respect and admiration, as well, for having the courage to make the difficult decision to initiate this action.

While we and the Nation express our most heartfelt sympathy to the families and friends of those killed during Operation Just Cause, we nevertheless understand that tofs was a necessary action—one forced upon us by the repeated rejection by General Noriega of a negotiated solution, whether through U.S. authorities or those of the Organization of American States.

In fact, General Noriega's declaration of a state of war with the United States and harassment of U.S. nationals in Panama—to the point of the murder of a U.S. officer and the beating of another—precluded any course but military action.

The success of this operation must be assessed not only from our point of view, of course, but of Panama's, as well. The gratitude of the legitimately elected leader of that nation, Enrique Endara, and the overwhelming support of the people of Panama testify to this success as much as the cheers of U.S. citizens.

In the days to come, as the cheers fade and the troops come home to their deserved welcome, we as a Nation must ensure that the lamp of democracy, relit through the sacrifice of both Panamanian and American lives, remains a bright beacon in Central America.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, today we have the opportunity to recognize and champion the valiant efforts of the United States servicemen and women who demonstrated their commitment to democracy and an outstanding level of expertise in Panama. These men and women gave heroically when this country asked them to give, 23 even gave their lives in the defense of democracy and freedom.

The United States has maintained a responsibility in Panama that is threefold; to protect the neutrality of the Panama Canal and to assist in the restoration of democracy. Most importantly, however, was the United States responsibility to protect the lives of the almost 50,000 American citizens in Panama. For these reasons it has been critical that the United States preserve a close and positive relationship with the Panamanian Government. Yet since the signing of the Panama Canal Treaties in the late 1970's, the political and economic stability of Panama had been an era of the past.

For the past 2 years the Panamanian people have been forced to succumb to a dictator who, through drug trafficking, has amassed and hoarded millions of dollars while his country tumbled into chaos. The lawlessness of the Noriega regime threatened the neutrality and security of the Panama Canal, the zone that surrounds it and the lives of the thousands of Americans employed by the Panama Canal Commission.

Operation Just Cause brought the end of the Noriega regime, the arrest of an international criminal and the restoration of a democratically elected government. In the course of that action, many of our friends and families met the challenge and some had to make great sacrifices. If it were not for those brave men and women in Panama who defended democracy, an international criminal would still be trafficking drugs. And the question of the security of the Panama Canal would remain unanswered. The families of those 23 brave men who sacrificed their lives to bring democracy to Panama should be proud. The American servicemen and women in Panama exhibited a level of professionalism for which they should also be proud. The American people owe a mighty debt to these men and women for the sacrifices they made to protect democracy and restore a legal government to Panama that does not rely on the profits of drugs to maintain its economy. Mr. Speaker, today I offer my most sincere condolences to the families and friends of those 23 heroic men who gave their lives for freedom and I congratulate the expertise and valor demonstrated by our armed forces. The American people should be proud of the superior caliber of men and women we have defending the freedoms on which this Nation was founded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCDERMOTT). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] that the House suspended the rules and agree to the concurrent resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 262.

The question was taken.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 389, nays 26, answered "present" 2, not voting 14, as follows:

Mrs. UNSOELD and Messrs. GUNDERSON, SKAGGS, STARK, INHOFE, and MOODY changed their vote from "nay" to "yea."

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, on the vote on House Concurrent Resolution 262, I unfortunately did not hear the buzzer and, therefore, did not respond and did not vote.

Had I been present, I would have voted aye.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE—RELATING TO THE INTEGRITY OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 330) and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 330

Whereas the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Savage, addressed the House on February 1, 1990, in the period known as Special Orders;

Whereas certain of his remarks did not appear in the body of the Congressional Record of February 1, 1990;

Whereas numerous other examples of deletions from the Congressional Record of remarks actually uttered on the floor have been mentioned in the press;

Whereas these omissions seriously threaten the integrity of the proceedings of the House;

Resolved, That the Committee on House Administration report to the House as soon as practicable its recommendations with respect to deletions from the Congressional Record pursuant to permission granted by the House to revise and extend remarks, in light of the adoption by the House of clause 9, Rule I which directs the Speaker to implement a system of complete and unedited audio and visual broadcasting and recording of the proceedings of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCDERMOTT). The Chair will rule that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] constitutes a question of the privileges of the House under rule IX since it addresses the question of the integrity of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in a generic way. The Chair would note that the remarks mentioned in the resolution were removed from the RECORD pursuant to permission of the House to revise and extend and consistent with precedent and the Parliamentarian's suggestion.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, as the Chair has just noted, the particular remarks that were removed from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that this resolution refers to were, in fact, done at the request of the Parliamentarians. Nevertheless, I think we have an issue before Members which is, clearly, one that has to be addressed at some point by this body.

We have a situation here where remarks were made that were unparliamentary in nature and where there are real questions about whether or not they should have been said on the floor. In this gentleman's opinion, they should not have been.

However, the question before Members is this: We now have two records of the proceedings of the House of Representatives. One of them is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The other is on videotape for all Members to see. One record is, in fact, the accurate presentation of what goes on in the House of Representatives. The other is a record of what we wish we would have said, if only we had said it right. The problem is that those two do not match.

It is this gentleman's contention that we ought to have a printed record which reflects what the actual proceedings of the House said and did during any legislative day. In this particular case, we have a situation where the words that were uttered were, in fact, words that are substantially changed when a person removes the offending language. In this gentleman's opinion, rather than having a situation where we substantially change the speech, what a person should have said is a situation where the Chair, in noting offensive speech, orders the Member to order, rather than have a situation where later on, offensive words are removed.

I think that we are now in a position where the House of Representatives, because of electronic media, has become a bully pulpit for all Members. All 435 Members elected to this body have an ability to come to the floor of the House of Representatives and speak to the country. Today, the only penalty that exists if a Member who does something which is just outrageous, is that someone will come along and suggest we remove the word from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. For most Members, as politicians, our reaction to that is "So what?" It has already had its impact. In this case, the words that were offensive, in fact, got reported in every newspaper, or in many newspapers across the country. The purpose was achieved. Yet, they do not appear at any point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

All this resolution is attempting to do is have the Committee on House Administration focus on the fact that we have two different CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS in existence, and try to come to some resolution as to how we match those and maintain the integrity of the proceedings of this body.

I would ask the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SENSENBRENNER].

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this resolution. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has been very articulate in pointing out that in the case of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SAVAGE] on the floor of the House of Representatives on February 1, which were widely reported in the press around the country, did not appear in the official transcript of proceedings published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the next day.

When a controversial statement is uttered on the floor of the House, that becomes a part of the House, whether the person who made that mistake wants it a part of that RECORD or not. The time has come, given the fact that we have a contemporaneous video record kept of the proceedings of this House, that we address the problem of the accuracy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in a meaningful way.

This resolution sets the wheels in motion by having the Committee on House Administration do just that.

Second, I would like to express my concern, and place it on the record that whomever happens to be occupying the chair at the time of the offensive words are stated on the floor of the House of Representatives has a duty under the rules of the House to call the Member to order who has uttered those offensive words, and to have a ruling on whether the words are, indeed, in violation of the rules of the House in parliamentary procedure in the precedents of the House.

It should not happen that in the dead of night offensive words get x-ed out of the RECORD or, as it happens, that another Member should have to jump up and demand that the speaker's words be taken down for a formal ruling of the Chair. The rules place that duty in the hands of the Member who happens to be occupying the Chair.

I have read the allegedly unparliamentary words uttered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SAVAGE], and I agree with the Parliamentarian and with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that at least insofar as they related to the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK], they were unparliamentary and should have been striken from the RECORD.

But there are procedures contained in the Rules of the House of Representatives that allow that to be done and set a precedent as to what type of debate is in order and what type of debate is not in order. It is one of the duties of the Chair to enforce those rules.

So, Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for giving me this time, and I hope this sets the House on the road to having a more accurate RECORD, as well as reminding whoever happens to be occupying the chair that one of the duties is to make sure that unparliamentary language is not put in the RECORD.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his remarks, because it does seem to me that that is one of the crucial issues here, that the Chair has tremendous power, and I for one never minimize the tremendous power the Chair wields over this body.

The Chair also has responsibilities, and one of those responsibilities is to maintain the decorum of the House. In this particular instance it would have been well for the Chair to have instructed the gentleman from Illinois that he was out of order at the point that the out-of-order remarks took place.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am very happy to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Does the gentleman think there is any hypocrisy involved in any Member who has ever asked to revise and extend his remarks to vote in favor of the gentleman's motion?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman that as far as I am personally concerned, I do not revise and extend my remarks. I do not ask for permission to revise and extend.

Mr. DURBIN. God bless you.

Mr. WALKER. I do not revise and extend my remarks because I believe my remarks should remain in the RECORD the way they were spoken on the floor. I would wish that other Members would follow the same procedure. I realize that under the rules of the House right now that is not something that is typically done, and many Members revise and extend their remarks.

Mr. DURBIN. The gentleman sees no inconsistency in Members rising for 1 minute and asking permission to revise and extend their remarks and yet supporting the gentleman in his motion?

Mr. WALKER. I would say to the gentleman that this gentleman personally does not do that. If the gentleman from Illinois will listen to this gentleman when I get up for 1 minute speeches, I always ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and I do not ask to revise and extend.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, if there are no other Members who wish to speak, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCDERMOTT). The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 373, nays 30, answered "present" 16, not voting 12, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 256. Concurrent resolution providing for the adjournment of the two Houses.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 1465, OIL POLLUTION PREVENTION, RESPONSE LIABILITY, AND COMPENSATION ACT OF 1989

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 1465) to establish limitations on liability for damages resulting from oil pollution, to establish a fund for the payment of compensation for such damages, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCDERMOTT). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not intend to object; I just want to have this opportunity to say that I do agree with the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. We need to do this, and the minority does support it.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

MOTION TO INSTRUCT OFFERED BY MR. GALLO

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to instruct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GALLO moves that the managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Senate amendment to the bill H.R. 1465 be instructed to insist upon inclusion in the conference report of a requirement for equipping new and existing tank vessels with double bottoms or double hulls.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GALLO] will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. JONES] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GALLO].

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, first let me thank members of the Merchant Marine Committee, especially my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DAVIS] for his cooperation on this motion.

Also, it is important to remember the involvement and effort of my colleagues from New Jersey and Wisconsin, Mr. TORRICELLI and Mr. GUNDERSON. I want to thank both of them for their continued commitment.

As conferees prepare to work out the differences in the House and Senate versions of the oil pollution and liability bill, H.R. 1465, I believe it is important to send a strong message to the conferees that the House will insist on requiring double hulls or double bottoms on tank vessels operating in U.S. waters.

While the bill goes a long way in responding to oilspills once they happen, the only significant measure of prevention is double hulls and double bottoms. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I seek to instruct the House conferees to insist on a provision requiring double hulls and double bottoms.

Double hulls will reduce the likelihood of a massive spill from a grounding by more than 90 percent.

When calculated over the lifetime of a tanker, the cost for this critical safety requirement is one-tenth of one cent per gallon transported.

Since we debated this bill 2 months ago, the arguments for this requirement have been strengthened.

First, the Alaskan Oil Spill Commission has concluded that the single most effective action we can take to prevent large spills is this double hull requirement.

The report also concludes that new tanker designs, including double hulls, will reduce the risk of massive spills more than all other known safety measures combined.

We can discuss at length the various proposals for further study, but I am confident that none of these so-called alternatives can be as effective as double hulls.

The Alaskan Commission report clearly recommends that double hulls be required on all tankers operating in U.S. waters, and that is what the House version of our bill also requires.

In addition, tankers with double hulls can be designed without loss of cargo capacity.

Our window of opportunity is now. Aging fleets will soon have to be replaced.

By 1992, over 40 percent of the world fleet will be more than 20 years old and another 25 percent will be 15 to 19 years old. In the Alaskan fleet alone, the average age is 18 years.

This same window of opportunity existed 15 years ago when this requirement was debated in Congress.

We ignored the opportunity then and we have seen the results. In the last 10 years, 5 major accidents have occurred in Alaskan waters, including the Valdez. Four of those spills would have been totally prevented with double hulls.

And the Valdez accident would have been reduced by 60 percent, according to a Coast Guard assessment, if double hulls were required.

Very recently, on January 21, 57,600 gallons of gasoline was spilled in the inlet passage in Alaska.

Again, that spill would not have occurred if the ship had been double hulled.

I think my colleagues would agree that a 100-percent prevention rate in four of five accidents is a proven track record that should not require additional study.

The steel shell of most tankers is only an inch and a quarter in thickness.

With double hulls, that margin of safety is increased to as much as 12 feet between the outer hull and the inner hull.

Even with the fastest and most professional emergency response available today, 80 percent of the oil spilled from a large tanker cannot be recovered once it is in the water.

In fact, double hulls are now required on all tankers carrying hazardous chemicals.

As sponsor of the double-hull requirement in the House Oil Pollution and Liability Act, I believe that the Alaskan Commission report and other new evidence shows that this requirement has been studied enough and should be mandated by Federal law this year.

Congress would be irresponsible to ignore this opportunity to protect our environment from almost certain future spills perhaps more serious than in Alaska.

This requirement is included in our version of the bill, but a similar requirement offered in the Senate was only two votes short of approval.

In conference, those two Senate votes could be the margin of victory or defeat for this recognized and affordable safety measure.

We cannot let this opportunity slip away.

Given the likelihood of another devastating tanker accident and the need to replace aging tankers, we simply cannot afford the price of further delays.

So, I urge my colleagues to vote yes on the motion to instruct and to require double hulls or double bottoms on tank vessels.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. TAUZIN].

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAUZIN. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to commend the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GALLO].

Mr. Speaker, I today to commend the gentleman from New Jersey on offering a motion to instruct the conferees for H.R. 1465 that provides greater flexibility than is contained in the House-passed bill with respect to double hulls and double bottoms.

Some confusion has an with regard to the amendments on this issue in the bill. With this motion, Mr. GALLO provides the conferees with a bit more flexibility and a better approach to the double hulls question.

As I am sure most of my colleagues are aware there has been a great deal of discussion and concern about the double hull/double bottom amendments by groups on both sides of the issue. This motion will lay the groundwork for the conferees to address these concerns. In addition, it will add more flexibility for the conferees to address serious concerns about the timing and increased cost of a double bottom or double hull requirement.

Mr. TAUZIN. Mr. Speaker, the environmental consequences of the Exxon Valdez accident shocked the Nation.

After 15 years' deliberations, with today's appointment of conferees, Congress takes an important step toward the completion of oilspill legislation. As we begin this important conference, I wish to express several concerns and offer a word of caution.

The unanswered questions about this debate remain with us. They are two: How much are these reforms going to cost the consumers of America, and what impact will the U.S. ability to compete in global markets be the result of this particular legislation?

Both the House and Senate bills place extensive new requirements on the movement of oil and petroleum products through our waterways and coastal areas. Each of these requirements, considered in isolation, may have merit, yet in combination the requirements can have significant impacts on the cost of moving our cargoes. Clearly it will cost more for marine transportation of oil. Consumer costs will, therefore, increase. We have to look at the situation in the context of how much we depend upon marine transportation.

Nearly half of the Nation's total consumption of oil is now supplied by foreign oil that comes in tankers. In addition, one-quarter of our domestic production is moved by tankers from Alaska. On top of that, a considerable portion of refined petroleum, anything from heating oil for our homes to fuel for boats and vehicles and airplanes, moves through coastal and inland waterways on barges and coastal tankers.

Whatever bill is ultimately agreed upon by the conferees will increase the cost of heating oil, gasoline, jet fuel, diesel, other petroleum products. In large measure, this increased cost will be passed along to consumers in the form of higher energy prices.

In addition, since the 5-cent-per-barrel fee is applied to every drop of oil regardless of how it is transported, that cost, too, will be paid by consumers. These factors will have an inflationary impact upon our prices, but they pale in comparison to the potential price increases that could result from the liability and financial-responsibility requirements in combination with new-vessel construction, operation, manning, response, and planning requirements of the two bills.

Without question, each has individual merit. Together, unless there is some flexibility in their implementation, these requirements could significantly limit the number of tankers that can legally move in U.S. waters. If we are not careful in this bill, we just might impose a self-imposed oil embargo upon America. Think about it.

To be sure, the marketplace is creative. It can find ways to minimize disruptions and limitations, but that raises new questions about what creative solutions will present even greater risks to our environment. For example, will supertankers, rather than meet a retrofit requirement of this double-hull requirement, merely lay off the exclusive economic zone of the United States outside of our reach in international waters and then lighten their cargoes into smaller coastal tankers to bring oil into port, increasing the congestion of our ports and our coasts and our waterways? Or by our potentially unlimited Federal-State liability system, will we encourage the creation of one-ship corporations that effectively preempt the unlimited State liability by limiting the value of assets available to clean up a spill and, therefore, placing the real burden upon the national fund?

All one has to do is read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the House and Senate debates to realize that most of the amendments, most of the arguments were framed around the Exxon Valdez model. Unfortunately, the model represents a very small portion of world tanker trade and fleets. Very few tankers are owned by huge oil companies. Very few have multimillion-dollar profit portfolios. The total value of most inland barges and their companies, lock, stock, and barrel, is less than the average week of cleanup in Prince William Sound.

To some extent, the House bill recognizes this problematic situation with secondary liability for cargo owners. But that liability has limits, too.

All we have to do is recognize those limits. After all, the cargo owner often enough will be a public utility, a small business manufacturer, a heating oil distributor, or even a Government agency like the Department of Defense or the Department of Environment, when it is formed. They, too, will have to buy insurance from our bill.

They, too, will have to buy insurance under our bill. They, too, will pass that cost on to consumers. But maybe the horror stories we have heard about the improbability of insuring our shipments will turn out to be exaggerated. I hope so. But the question will be will there be enough tankers that qualify to bring oil to America when we cannot do anything but depend upon foreign shipments?

Let me say a word about this double bottom issue. While I understand this is not a binding instruction to conferees and the instructions give us room to work a compromise hopefully with the Senate, let me make a couple of points.

Had the Exxon Valdez had a double bottom, two skins, experts tell us it would have only saved 15 percent of that spill; 200,000 gallons would have still spilled in the Prince William Sound. We would have still had the biggest spill in U.S. history.

Double bottoms is not the answer. Double bottoms is only part of the answer. In some cases double bottoms may cause us problems.

In the last decade two big Norwegian tankers experienced explosions because they had double bottoms. Leaks in the ship created oil in the double bottom, which then exploded and caused an incident that should not have been caused.

Let me point out again there are better ways. Simple hydrostatic balancing would have prevented the Valdez spill. Most of the oil that spilled out of the Valdez incident came out of oil that was stacked above the waterline in the cargo holds of the ship. A simple reloading of that vessel would have prevented most of that oil from spilling.

We can make those agreements in conference. I hope we will. We can find better ways.

Keep in mind the point I made. We could double hull the Exxon Valdez and you would still have lost 200,000 gallons of oil in Prince William Sound. Let us work to find a better way.

I will work with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GALLO]. I will work with the conferees. I realize the gentleman's instruction is not binding. Let us find a constructive way to prevent what happened in Prince William Sound. Then I think we will be better off.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TORRICELLI].

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, March 24 will be the first anniversary of the Valdez oilspill. On that day we will have either acted to prevent future tragedies or we will still be talking, still debating about potential solutions, alternate technologies. But we will have taken a stand with the one technology that we know is available today, with the provision that can be approved now to prevent future spills.

Last November this House took that stand. It voted to require, to mandate, double bottoms and double hulls on oil tankers. Double bottoms in 7 years, double hulls in 15 years.

Now we are told we should wait, as we were told in the 1970's, as we were told in the 1960's, that the issue should be studied, as it has been studied so many times for so long.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, as far back as 1975 the Coast Guard was asked to study groundings in the previous years and concluded that double bottoms on tankers would have prevented 96 percent of oilspills in all groundings. That study was made, it was received, it was debated, and we did not take action.

Now the question is whether we wait again. In 1975 the Office of Technology Assessment looked at the same question again and once again concluded that the best available technology to prevent the loss of oil into the ocean was a double hull or a double bottom. We failed to act in each of those instances.

Now again, in the wake of the Valdez incident, the Alaska Oil Spill Commission was asked to make a report, to study the same question for a third time.

On December 8 they issued their report. They recommended double hulls for tankers and several other design changes, all of which if implemented would increase the cost of ships only 10 percent. But nevertheless those changes as envisioned by these instructions for the actions that we took last year are the best available technology.

Mr. Speaker, simply put, 14 years of study is enough. It is time to face the reality that for whatever technologies may develop in the future, whatever other things we can devise, the best thing that we can do today is to require the construction in the future of double bottoms and double hulls.

Mr. Speaker, if we fail to act we have only ourselves to blame. The next time it could be the Pacific Coast, it could be the Atlantic Coast.

I do not argue that costs will be imposed. There is an inevitable cost. Oil spills, or oilspill prevention. In either case the cost will be high. But in what we are envisioning in double hulls and double bottoms, a potential cost of $2 billion, it would be less than the cost of the Valdez spill alone. A single oilspill is more expensive than the entire 15-year effort to have double hulls and double bottoms on our ships.

Mr. Speaker, for the sake of wildlife, for the sake of our beaches and our coastline, for the sake of fishermen and all people who depend upon the sea for their livelihood, it is time to act. The single best vehicle for doing so today is this instruction to the conferees, to say enough studies, enough time, it is time to act.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the membership to cast a yea vote in favor of the instruction of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GALLO], and to take a stand today.

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT].

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GALLO] for working with the committees of jurisdiction in drafting his motion to instruct the conferees.

At the outset, let me state that I have had a number of reservations about the language which was adopted on the House floor dealing with double hulls and double bottoms.

Part of my concern stems from drafting problems with the House provision owing to the different floor amendments that were adopted by different sponsors addressing slightly different aspects of the same issue. The result of these amendments is a somewhat confusing and inconsistent approach to the double hull/double bottom question.

Recognizing this, the gentleman from New Jersey has drafted a motion instructing the conferees to adhere to the principles embodied in the House bill while providing flexibility to depart from its exact language.

For example, while the House bill calls for retrofitting existing vessels with double hulls and double bottoms over specified periods of time, the motion to instruct conferees is silent as to timing. This will allow consideration of information on shipbuilding capacity and industry rate structure to arrive at a retrofitting requirement that ensures a conversion of our existing fleet as quickly as is possible without a complete disruption of oil transportation capability.

Also, the motion instructs the conferees to develop language requiring double hulls or double bottoms rather than both if the evidence indicates that both would not be needed.

In addition, the motion provides some flexibility to allow conferees to evaluate the scope of coverage in the industry. It may be that only vessels over a certain size need be included in the provision's sweep. There are also a number of other concerns that have been raised about the impact of the double hull/double bottom requirement on various aspects of the oil transportation industry.

For example, there is some concern that by requiring all vessels to be equipped with double hulls or double bottoms we may be encouraging the practice of lightering from single hulled vessels on to double hulled vessels 200 miles beyond the U.S. coastline rather than encouraging the use of environmentally-preferable modes of transportation. This motion provides the conferees with the flexibility to address these and other concerns which have been raised.

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GALLO] yielding me this time.

As all Members are well aware, this is an extremely important bill that we are going to be going to conference on. It is a bill that we need to pass. We need to get the President to sign it.

It is not going to be easy to work out all the differences between the Senate and the House. Certainly, the issue of double bottoms is going to be a conscientious issue.

Mr. Speaker, I do congratulate the two gentlemen from New Jersey. We worked with them to see if we could come up with something on double bottoms that would not bind us to anything specific, which would leave us in conference committee the ability to be able to separate retrofitting from new ships.

We recognized that the issue of double-bottom hulls, when one looks at the vote that was cast here on the House side, it strongly supports doing something. I believe that that is what we have agreed to here.

Again I congratulate the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GALLO]. This is something that is reasonable. It gives us the flexibility that we need.

We also need to recognize that whatever we do in the way of protecting the environment, in passing this legislation, and it will pass, we must recognize that we have to be able to continue to haul oil on the waterways, the rivers, and the oceans in this country.

We again have to make sure that we give the ability to these companies and still protect the environment.

There is also a difference in ships, the ships on the high seas that haul oil. There is a difference in the barges that haul oil on the rivers, and there are many of them, and we may have to come up with some type of compromise that will differentiate the two.

Again, it is important that we work something out that does the job. What this specific motion does is preserve the will of the House and tells our conferees that we want them to come up with something that will give us double bottom or double hulls, and also give us the flexibility to be able to negotiate that agreement.

A lot of the things that my chairman of the Coast Guard Subcommittee says, of course, are things that we have to consider. He is going to be one of the conferees. The chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. JONES], is also very cognizant of the issues we have to deal with, and I would guess the double-bottom, double-hull issue is going to be one of the chief bones of contention.

So I would hope Members would support this motion because it is a reasonable, responsible motion, and it gives us the flexibility we need in conference.

Again, I appreciate the gentleman from New Jersey taking the lead on this issue. It was his amendment originally that passed the House on double bottoms, and he negotiated with us to come up with what I consider to be a very fair proposal that we are voting on now.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of the motion to instruct the conferees on the Oil Pollution Act of 1989 to include in the conference report a requirement for new and existing tank vessels to be equipped with double bottoms or double hulls.

Simply put, this instruction will allow the conferees to do their job and produce a workable double-hull or double-bottom requirement for tank vessels. We have a proven track record for pollution-prevention construction requirements. The last major vessel construction requirement imposed by Congress was enacted as part of the Port and Tanker Safety Act of 1978. That approach worked well then, and will serve us well now.

Many factors must be considered in crafting a vessel-construction requirement of this type, including the type of vessel concerned, the age of the vessel, the trade in which the vessel is employed, as well as a myriad of others. Our goal is to ensure transportation of oil in U.S. waters in a safe and environmentally sound manner. The conferees must have the authority to work out the details of the double-bottom or double-hull requirement to ensure that our goal is met.

The motion to instruct by my colleague from New Jersey, Mr. GALLO, gives the conferees this authority, and I commend the gentleman for his diligent efforts on this issue.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all of my colleagues to support this motion without any reservation.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MCDERMOTT].

Mr. McDERMOTT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Last fall, this House made history. Not only did we enact the strongest oilspill legislation in many years, but we adopted an amendment that will do more to protect our coasts and marine waters from oilspills than any other single safety measure—requiring that the tankers and barges that carry oil on American waters be built for safety, with double hulls and double bottoms.

This historic amendment is based on the bill Senator ADAMS, Congressman DICKS, Congressman SWIFT, and I introduced last spring, the Puget Sound Tanker Safety Act. But it applies to all American waters—Narragansett Bay, the Delaware Bay, the Galveston ship channel, Prince William Sound, and all the rest—those which have suffered oil spills in the last year and those which remain at risk every day.

Forty-eight Members of the Senate voted for a double-hull amendment, but a majority of the Senate chose to require only a study by the Coast Guard. So the choice for the conferees will be between a study and a firm requirement of double hulls.

Now, there is nothing wrong with another study. We should learn more about how to make tankers safer and prevent major oil spills. The studies done in the 1970's, which clearly showed that double hulls work, should be updated. The Coast Guard study of the Exxon Valdez spill, which showed that a double hull would have reduced oil outflow by 25 to 60 percent, should be extended to other cases.

But history tells us that the oil industry and the Coast Guard will never turn to double hulls unless we make them do it. As our colleague NORM DICKS said on this floor when we were debating this amendment last November, the Coast Guard will always find a reason not to require double hulls. They cost money. The oil industry does not like them.

The Alaska Governor's Oil Spill Commission put it this way in its report:

> Industry tends to measure success as operating the biggest vessel with the thinnest hull and the smallest crew at the highest speed with the quickest port turnaround consistent with meeting minimum government requirements.

This bill does a lot to improve the requirements on the oil transport industry to prevent spills and clean them up when they happen. But nothing will work better than double hulls to keep the oil out of our water. And nothing short of legislation, in my view, will make double hulls happen.

To best reflect the will of this House on double hulls, our conferees will need the direction this motion provides. It will help them show the Senate that double hulls must be required in the conference report. I urge my colleagues to vote yes on the motion to instruct.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CARPER].

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, there are several questions on this issue that I would like for Members to consider during the time that I have. The first question is is it realistic to expect overnight the construction or the conversion of significant numbers of tankers bringing oil to our shores? Clearly it is not. This is a process, to the extent that this instruction carries, and to the extent that the conferees carry it out, that would simply begin a process, and it is a process that frankly is going to take years, perhaps as many as 10 or even 15 years to accomplish.

How about the cost of the changes that are envisioned by this motion? Will the cost be small; will the cost be large; or will the cost be somewhere in between? Let us not kid ourselves. The cost of doing this will not be cheap.

Is it realistic to expect the shippers, those people bringing oil to our shores, is it realistic to expect them to absorb all of those costs that might relate to conversion? I for one do not believe that it is realistic to expect the shippers to absorb all of the costs. They will not, and they will pass along not an inconsiderable amount of the cost to the consumer.

Finally, I would ask is it reasonable to ask that those shippers, and consumers and our constituents be expected or asked to pay the incremental costs that will be created or caused by this legislation? I think the answer is yes, it is reasonable to expect all of us to absorb those additional costs.

Why is that? This legislation to which this motion speaks to, just one part of, is designed to do a number of things. One of the things we hope to do is to reduce the incidence of oilspills. A second thing we want to do is to increase the rapidity, the quickness, if you will, of our response to those oilspills, and to clean them up. The last thing we want to do is to ensure that those people or those businesses that are damaged by these spills are fairly and adequatly compensated, frankly, for the damages that they have incurred.

Having said that, despite the best of intentions with this oilspill legislation, oilspills will occur, just as they have for as long as people have been shipping oil. There will be maybe not another Exxon Valdez, but there will be another oilspill. It may be in Alaskan waters or it may be on the west coast, or there will be another Exxon Valdez. There will be another Presidente Rivera, the kind of spill we had in the Delaware River last fall.

To the extent that the next Exxon Valdez that runs ashore or to the extent that the next Presidente Rivera that runs ashore in Alaskan waters or the Delaware River, to the extent that ship is double hulled or double bottomed, we will ensure that the cleanup costs that result from that accident are diminished. We will ensure that those cleanup costs are brought down. We will ensure that the damage to the marine environment is reduced as well. In fact, in some instances, in the majority of instances we will ensure that there is no damage to the environment as a result of a ship with a double hull or a double bottom running aground.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join the gentleman from New Jersey who has offered this motion to instruct and myself in voting for the motion. I believe it is the right thing to do, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON].

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, let me begin by thanking my friend and colleague, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GALLO] for his leadership on this particular issue.

What we are talking about today, ladies and gentlemen, is not a cure to a problem. It is prevention of that problem from ever occurring.

People ask should we not study the issue of double hulls. I guess this motion to instruct reaffirms the decision made last fall, and that is that we have had the studies. We have had four studies on this issue, and the most recent study will suggest that double hulls are effective in 88 percent of groundings and 90 percent of collisons.

Now as we move forth we look at the language in the House bill versus the Senate bill, and the motion to instruct becomes so important because we are not only dealing with coastal collisions, we are also dealing with American inland waterways. I, of course, come at this from a very parochial perspective, that of the Mississippi River running down the center of our Nation. The fact is since 1985 we have had one or two major spills of oil and gas every year. If we look at that spill in 1985, ice chunks penetrated.

Now I cannot guarantee that double hull would have prevented that, but I doubt there are any of us who would bet money against a double hull preventing ice chunks from causing an oilspill.

When you move back even further in 1979 over 100,000 gallons of jet fuel were disposed in a spill on the Mississippi River.

When you take a small inland waterway, spills become even more serious by virtue of the concentration.

Today we have a change, not to cure, but to prevent a problem. Double hulls is the way to go.

We do it in a reasonable fashion; all new, 15 years within the retrofit. From that perspective I think we are not here in the business of putting anyone out of business, we are in the business of protecting the environment in a fair and reasonable manner.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman for his motion. I commend the gentleman for his amendment last fall. I ask every one of our members on the committee to work the will of the House in conference on this issue.

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from the State of Washington [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Washington. I want to thank my colleague from New Jersey, Mr. GALLO, for his distinguished work on this issue in bringing this important motion to instruct conferees to the floor.

I had originally intended to speak at great length on this issue, but I think the issue has been exhausted.

The oilspill bill which we passed in the House, which has been worked on for years, does many good things, not the least of which is to require some sorely needed planning in key water areas of the United States.

But in addition to planning, we need some specific measures. We want to be double sure, we want to be double safe, and that is why we need double hulls.

Mr. Speaker, I urge support of the gentleman's motion to instruct conferees.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in favor of the Gallo amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to provide some background on the appointment of conferees from the Committee on Energy and Commerce to title VIII of H.R. 1465.

After the bill was passed, Chairman DINGELL expressed concern that some provisions of title VIII might affect matters under the jurisdiction of his committee. Therefore, he requested that the Energy and Commerce Committee be appointed conferees.

I would like to take this opportunity to place in the RECORD, letters from Chairmen UDALL and DINGELL concerning this request.

In his letter, Chairman UDALL points out that he has no objection to the appointment of Energy and Commerce conferees provided that this action not be construed as diminishing or expanding the jurisdiction of any committee.

The appointment of conferees in this instance is solely for the purpose of dealing with pipeline safety issues, and matters related to rates and economics of the trans-Alaska pipeline or tariffs at the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. These matters are currently under the jurisdiction of the Energy and Commerce Committee.

Chairman DINGELL agrees with this interpretation.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the letters be included at this point in the RECORD.

FEBRUARY 6, 1990.

Hon. THOMAS S. FOLEY,
U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: This is to clarify my letter of January 29, 1990 requesting that Energy and Commerce Committee conferees be appointed for several sections of H.R. 1465, the "Oil Pollution Act of 1989."

My request was prompted by a concern that the conferees address mattters which are presently under the jurisdiction of this committee when they consider sections 8103, 8201 and 8202 of the House bill. Specifically, issues relating to:

Pipeline safety for the trans-Alaska pipeline system, and particularly matters related to the Hazardous Liquid Pipeline Safety Act, and Civil penalties as they might affect the rates and economics of the pipeline or tariffs at the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

Appointment of Energy and Commerce conferees for these issues should not be construed as diminishing the jurisdiction of any other committee, or expanding the jurisdiction of this committee. My request is being made solely to address those matters presently under the jurisdiction of this committee.

Thank you for your consideration of this request.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN D. DINGELL,
Chairman.

FEBRUARY 6, 1990.

Hon. THOMAS S. FOLEY,
U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I am writing concerning a request you have received from Chairman John D. Dingell of the Committee on Energy and Commerce concerning the appointment of conferees on several sections of H.R. 1465, the "Oil Pollution Act of 1989."

Chairman Dingell has requested that conferees be appointed for sections 8103, 8201 and 8202 for matters which are presently under the jurisdiction of his committee. These include issues relating to pipeline safety for the trans-Alaska pipeline system, and civil penalties as they might affect the rates and economics of the pipeline or tariffs at the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

I would have no objection to Chairman Dingell's request with the understanding that the appointment of Energy and Commerce conferees for these issues should not be construed as diminishing the jurisdiction of any other committee, or expanding the jurisdiction of his committee. Chairman Dingell's request is being made solely to address only those matters presently under the jurisdiction of his committee.

Sincerely yours,

MORRIS K. UDALL,
Chairman.

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from New York [Ms. SLAUGHTER].

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the motion to instruct conferees being offered by my friend from New Jersey, Mr. GALLO.

When the House passed this comprehensive oilspill prevention and compensation bill last November, it marked the culmination of years of hearings, debate, and planning on how best to protect our natural resources from devastating oilspills. I believe the final bill is a good one.

One of the more important provisions is the Gallo amendment to require double hulls on all new tankers and barges using American ports.

This will be expensive, as will be the cost of retrofitting old tankers after a 15-year phase-in period. But compare the $20 million cost of a double hull with the almost $2 billion Exxon has already spent simply to rinse oil from slimy beaches in Prince William Sound and to skim it from the surface of the sea. The true cost of such an oilspill can never be reckoned.

The price of the double hull is truly a cost-effective investment in the environment.

We don't need to study this issue; we need to require this protective measure on boats. The Coast Guard has said that a double hull on the Exxon Valdez would have contained much of the 11 million gallons that spilled.

We already require double hulls on tankers carrying certain extremely dangerous chemicals. We know a double hull will prevent future spills of hazardous materials that pollute our waters. Prevention is far better than cleanup.

I urge my collegeues to vote for the Gallo motion to instruct conferees to require double hulls on tankers.

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCDERMOTT). Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to instruct.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GALLO].

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device and there were—yeas 376, nays 37, not voting 18, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. AuCoin for, with Mr. Montgomery against.

Mr. ANDREWS and Mr. EMERSON changed their vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. KASTENMEIER changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the motion to instruct was agreed to.

The result of the votes was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following conferees, and without objection, reserves the authority to make additional appointments of conferees and to specify particular portions of the House bill and Senate amendment as the subject of the various appointments:

From the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, for consideration of the House bill (except title VIII), and the Senate amendment (except sections 601 and 602), and modifications committed to conference:

Messrs. JONES of North Carolina, STUDDS, TAUZIN, CARPER, HUGHES, DAVIS, YOUNG of Alaska, and LENT.

Provided, Mr. SHUMWAY is appointed in place of Mr. YOUNG of Alaska for consideration of title I and section 2004 of the House bill, and title I and section 405 of the Senate amendment.

From the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, for consideration of the House bill (except title VIII), and the Senate amendment (except sections 601 and 602), and modification committed to conference:

Messrs. ANDERSON, ROE, MINETA, OBERSTAR, NOWAK, HAMMERSCHMIDT, SHUSTER, and STANGELAND.

Provided, Mr. KOLTER is appointed in place of Mr. ANDERSON for consideration of section 4114 of the House bill; Mr. RAHALL is appointed in place of Mr. ROE for consideration of title VII of the House bill, and sections 205, 309, 354 and 356 of the Senate amendment; Mr. LAUGHLIN is appointed in place of Mr. ROE for consideration of sections 1002 and 1004 of the House bill, and corresponding portions of section 102 of the Senate amendment; Mr. BORSKI is appointed in place of Mr. ROE for consideration of sections 4101 through 4205 of the House bill, and corresponding portions of the Senate amendment; and Mr. UPTON is appointed in place of Mr. SHUSTER for consideration of section 4203 of the House bill and section 203 of the Senate amendment.

From the Committee on Foreign Affairs, for consideration of title III of the House bill, and sections 603 and 604 of the Senate amendment, and modifications committed to conference:

Messrs. FASCELL, YATRON, OWENS of Utah, LANTOS, FEIGHAN, BROOMFIELD, BEREUTER, and MILLER of Washington.

From the Committee on Science, Space and Technology, for consideration of title VII of the House bill, and sections 205, 309, 354, and 506 of the Senate amendment, and modifications committed to conference:

Messrs. ROE, SCHEUER, BROWN of California, Mrs. LLOYD, Mr. WALGREN, Mr. WALKER, Ms. SCHNEIDER, and Mr. MORRISON of Washington.

From the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, for consideration of title I and section 2004 of the House bill, and title I and section 405 of the Senate amendment, and modifications committed to conference:

Messrs. UDALL, MILLER of California, SHARP, YOUNG of Alaska, and CRAIG.

From the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, for consideration of title VIII of the House bill, and sections 601 and 602 of the Senate amendment, and modifications committed to conference:

Messrs. UDALL, MILLER of California, SHARP, VENTO, DEFAZIO, YOUNG of Alaska, MARLENEE, and CRAIG.

From the Committee on Energy and Commerce, for consideration of sections 8103, 8201 and 8202 of the House bill, and section 601 of the Senate amendment, and modifications committed to conference:

Messrs. DINGELL, HALL of Texas, and LENT.

From the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, for consideration of title VIII of the House bill, and sections 601 and 602 of the Senate amendment, and modifications committed to conference:

Messrs. JONES of North Carolina, TAUZIN, CARPER, DAVIS, and FIELDS.

From the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, for consideration of title VIII of the House bill, and sections 601 and 602 of the Senate amendment, and modifications committed to conference:

Messrs. ANDERSON, MINETA, NOWAK, HAMMERSCHMIDT, and STANGELAND.

AUTHORIZING THE SPEAKER TO DECLARE RECESSES ON WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1990

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order at any time on Wednesday, February 21, 1990, for the Speaker to declare recesses, subject to the call of the Chair, for the purpose of receiving in joint meeting His Excellency Vaclav Havel, President of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAYES of Illinois). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING THE SPEAKER AND THE MINORITY LEADER TO ACCEPT RESIGNATIONS AND TO APPOINT COMMISSIONS, BOARDS, AND COMMITTEES, NOTWITHSTANDING ADJOURNMENT

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding any adjournment of the House until Tuesday, February 20, 1990, the Speaker and the minority leader be authorized to accept resignations and to appoint commissions, boards, and committees authorized by law or by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING ON WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1990

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Tuesday, February 20, 1990, it adjourns to meet at 10 a.m. on Wednesday, February 21, 1990.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1990

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule on Wednesday, February 21, 1990.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

IT WOULD BE TRAGIC TO LEGALIZE DRUGS NOW

(Mr. GALLEGLY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. GALLEGLY. Mr. Speaker, Members of this Chamber don't always agree on the exact methods to be used in fighting the scourge of drugs. But there is one area where we do agree—drug abuse harms everyone in our society, and must remain illegal.

It's amazing that this basic element of our antidrug strategy is even being contested. Yet it seems that every week there are more people who say legalization is the miracle cure for our drug problems.

If we in Congress remain silent on this issue, it will undermine the great progress that's been made in the war on drugs.

Mr. Speaker, it would be tragic to legalize drugs now. Drug use would increase dramatically, and so would the suffering and misery drugs cause. Simply stated, legalization would be the unilateral surrender of our country, our neighborhoods, our schools, and our children to the evils of drugs.

Therefore, I am introducing today a concurrent resolution to reaffirm our opposition to legalization. I urge my colleagues to support the resolution, which I ask to be made a part of the record.

H. CON. RES. —

Whereas ending drug abuse is a top priority of Americans from every region and locality of the country;

Whereas antidrug efforts between 1985 and 1988 have succeeded in decreasing the annual use of illicit drugs among Americans signficiantly;

Whereas an estimated 28,000,000 Americans nonetheless continue to consume drugs and to suffer the debilitating effects of drug abuse, including permanent health damage, severed personal and familial relationships, a decline in productivity, an increase in severe accidents, and a loss in dignity and autonomy;

Whereas addiction to illegal drugs is still a significant problem with over half a million Americans in drug treatment requiring the commitment of valuable resources and personnel, and with drug-related deaths and hospital emergencies shown to be increasing;

Whereas the abuse of drugs has been shown to be linked to an increase in human suffering, among users and nonusers, because of resulting crimes against people and property, including a rampant level of drug-related homicides in the poorest urban areas;

Whereas the legalization of drugs, which has been proposed as an alternative to current policies, would represent an unacceptable threat to the institutions and citizens of the States;

Whereas the legalization of drugs would remove the stigma of illegality and the moral authority of law, and would thus encourage new experimentation with drugs;

Whereas the legalization of drugs would increase the abuse of drugs, by both adults and minors, and the numbers of drug addicts due to the greater availability and lower prices of such substances; and

Whereas according to public opinion polls, the American people overwhelmingly and forcefully oppose drug legalization: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That all levels of government should fully continue efforts to enforce antidrug laws and to discourage the use of illegal drugs, and that such controlled substances should in no manner or form be legalized.

HEADS SHOULD ROLL AT MARAD

(Mr. BROOMFIELD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks, and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I received a letter from the head of the Maritime Administration, Capt. Warren G. Leback. This letter really raised my hackles.

In a typical example of bureaucratic stonewalling, Captain Leback refuses to even consider allowing a private study on alternatives to the National Defense Reserve Fleet. Many of these ships haven't been to sea for over 15 years and are literally rotting away.

"Citizens Against Government Waste," formerly the Grace Commission, believes that these vessels can do more than rust at anchor. They can be turned into an important source of Government revenue rather than a continuing expense.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me some heads should roll at MarAd. Transportation Secretary Skinner should take a personal interest in this classic case of Government waste mismanagement.

I include the most recent letter I received from MarAd in the RECORD. It demonstrates the height of rudeness and in flexibility by a Federal official.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION,
MARITIME ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, DC, February 2, 1990.

Hon. WILLIAM S. BROOMFIELD,
House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. BROOMFIELD: Thank you for your letter of January 17, 1990, which appears to have crossed with my letter of the same date regarding a study of the National Defense Reserve Fleet (NDRF) and its subset Ready Reserve Force (RRF) proposed by a nonprofit organization called "Citizens Against Government Waste."

Both the NDRF and RRF are subject to continuing investigation by the General Accounting Office and Department of Transportation Inspector General, and more recently were part of the study done by the presidentially appointed Commission on Merchant Marine and Defense established by Public Law 98-525, as amended. In view of the thoroughness of each of these examinations, I fail to see the relevance nor requirement for an inquiry conducted by metal scrapping and salvaging entrepreneurs to examine the necessity of retaining the NDRF and the RRF.

Absent a more detailed proposal of objectives and methodology of this group, together with the lack of credentials presented for the proposed team members, I regret once again having to say that I am unable to commit this agency's resources to accommodate the study team's request.

Should you need specific data relative to particular vessels in either the NDRF or RRF, please advise me of your requirements and I will be pleased to assist you.

Sincerely,

Capt. Warren G. Leback,
Maritime Administrator.

THE IDENTIFICATION OF FELONS PURCHASING FIREARMS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MCCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker, when I offered my amendment to the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 concerning the identification of felons purchasing firearms, I had one goal in mind. I wanted to find a way to keep firearms out of the hands of dangerous criminals without infringing upon the rights of law-abiding Americans. It appeared that the most logical balance of these two interests would be achieved by equipping firearms dealers to screen out felons attempting to buy guns. Thus, the amendment was intended to serve as the first step in developing a point-of-purchase identification system. Such a system would reduce gun-related violence by restricting predatory felons from having access to firearms.

Of course no one disputes the fact that the Federal Government is incapable of eliminating all firearm violence. The only question is to what extent can we do anything about this problem. New criminal penalties are one response to the problem of firearm violence. In recent years, we have established several tough penalties, including some for convicted felons who simply possess firearms and some for those who carry firearms while committing violent felonies or drug trafficking offenses.

While we know that passing a law against a particular criminal act does not stop such an act from occurring, I believe that the gun possession offenses could dramatically reduce violent crime if they were more frequently used. Most Americans are unaware that the Federal law contains a mandatory 5-year prison sentence—no parole—for carrying a firearm in the course of most crimes, and that a second conviction for such an act is punishable by a mandatory 20 years in prison. They also are unaware that after three felony convictions, the mere possession of a firearm carries a penalty of 15 years in prison, no parole. Given the obvious limitations of gun control to stop violence, these penalties should be our first priority of any anticrime strategy. A major initiative by the Justice Department using these statutes against career gun criminals would create a changed attitude on the streets.

In addition to these penalties, we have attempted, and continue to consider ways, to reduce violence by imposing restrictions on the sale of firearms. Here it should be noted that the limited effectiveness of this type of gun control is well documented. A frequently cited study, which was sponsored by the National Institute of Justice and entitled "The Armed Criminal in America," reports that only about one out of six gun-owning felons obtained their most recent handguns through a customary retail transaction involving a licensed firearms dealer. The study concludes:

> Controls imposed at the point of retail sale would not be effective in preventing the acquisition of guns by serious adult felons because these felons rarely obtain their guns through customary retail outlets.

Nevertheless, the passage of my felon identification amendment during the last Congress represented the ongoing desire of Congress to do something about the small minority of predatory felons who buy guns from licensed dealers. Even though the potential results of this effort are clearly limited, it is a goal worth pursuing in an effort to reduce violence.

OVERVIEW OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S PLAN

On November 20, 1989, the Attorney General submitted to Congress, pursuant to the language of my amendment, his plan for establishing a system to identify felons purchasing firearms. This plan is a clear affirmation of the point-of-purchase identification policy established by my amendment. It recognizes the fact that such a policy is the fairest and most effective way of reducing firearm violence through the screening of gun buyers. For example, the Attorney General states:

> While a comprehensive, accurate system for identifying felons at the point-of-sale simply cannot be fully accomplished in the near term, we must recognize it as a worthwhile goal to be accomplished over time.

The Attorney General recommends that a point-of-sale telephone verification system be established for firearms dealers across the country. This would be an interim system. It would be replaced when a more accurate, biometric identification system can be established. The report also indicates that certain improvements must be achieved before any identification system would be effective. First, there is a need to fully automate all of the FBI's criminal records—only 40 to 60 percent are currently automated—and to merge the computerized index of 8.8 million manual records into the FBI's automated identification system.

The Attorney General also concludes that the quality of these records must be improved, particularly with regard to case disposition. This would be accomplished through further study, the establishment of reporting standards for State and local law enforcement agencies, and the issuance of grants to assist the States. Finally, the Department of Justice will continue to monitor the changing state of technology in the area of biometric identification so that such a system may be established in the foreseeable future.

On the issue of record quality, the report by the Task Force on Felon Identification in Firearm Sales, which provided the information from which the Attorney General established his plan, includes startling information. The report explains that FBI opens an individual criminal history file upon receipt of information regarding such individual's arrest. Convictions or acquittals in these cases are often not reported to the State central repository or to the FBI. The task force found that approximately one-half of the arrest charges in the FBI's records do not show a final disposition. Some States have even higher amounts of incomplete records.

REACTION TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S REPORT

In my opinion, the most significant aspect of the Attorney General's study and report concerns this issue of the quality of the criminal history records. As it now stands, one out of every two inquiries to the FBI's records could be inconclusive with regard to felony convictions. No screening program, either point-of-purchase or as part of a waiting period, will succeed with this state of affairs. In the debate concerning the waiting period and my substitute amendment from the last Congress, I suppose you could say that "what is bad for the goose, is bad for the gander."

With regard to other aspects of the Attorney General's report, there is much that could be said. While the Attorney General has adopted a reasonable plan of action, I believe that the specific steps to be taken in the immediate future fall short of what is needed. Reference is made to the touch-tone telephone system, but no details are provided for how and when such a system will be established. With regard to biometric identification, the Attorney General has not proposed a system that realistically could be established in any satisfactory period of time.

It appears to me that the Attorney General did not propose another plan for biometric identification because the task force did not identify all of the options available. My amendment only requires that a system capable of immediate and accurate identification be established. While this language clearly suggests, and the legislative history supports, that Congress expected this system to involve biometric identification, there are more methods for such identification than reported by the task force.

The aim of any biometric identification system is to achieve positive identification for the purpose of avoiding firearms sales to dangerous felons. The task force asserts that this can only be accomplished at the point of sale with 10-print fingerprint scanners located at the dealer's place of business. These scanners would interface with a central data base of over 20 million felon fingerprints. This concept is extremely expensive and time consuming. My concern is that this is not the only way to fulfill the legislative mandate. I regret that the task force did not propose other methods for biometrically screening felons at the point of purchase.

A MODIFIED PLAN

When I offered my amendment on the House floor in 1988, I realized there could be a number of different ways to immediately and accurately identify felons attempting to buy firearms. I was aware that some States were developing automated fingerprint identification systems [AFIS] to access criminal justice records. I suspected that the AFIS technology could work on a national level, but that the expense would be great, particularly for fingerprint digitizing technology. In order to explore all the possibilities, the amendment instructs the Attorney General to study this issue and to establish a plan for felon identification.

Much more information on this issue has become available since the passage of my amendment. Based on this information, I now believe that the goal of immediate and accurate identification can be reached without digitizing fingerprints at the point-of-purchase and then electronically comparing them with millions of fingerprints in a centralized data base. A criminal records check at the point of purchase could be conducted using just a name and other identifying information if the firearms dealer was certain about the identity of the buyer. Thus, if identification was presented by the buyer that could be biometrically verified, the dealer could rely on the accuracy of a name check.

Therefore, while I support the Attorney General's plan with regard to improving criminal justice records, I believe that a modified approach to the portions involving biometric identification should be adopted. This modified plan consists of three phases:

Phase I: Establish a telephone identification system.

Like the Attorney General's plan, this phase would require the FBI to setup a telephone response system for firearms dealers. Dealers could be required to call FBI personnel stationed at NCIC terminals as a condition for a Federal license, or the States where the dealers are located could be given some incentive by the Federal Government to establish such a requirement. Of course, the major flaws to this system are the quality of the records and that it would be a name identification system. This allows for false identification to foil the system. That is why this is only phase I.

In its testimony before the Subcommittee on Crime, SEARCH Group, Inc., reports that the Attorney General's proposed touchtone identification system currently is technically unfeasible. SEARCH states:

To the best of our knowledge it is not possible, for instance, to enter the alphanumeric data required for a name search into a standard touchtone telephone. Modifications are required, including a new tone-coding format, a view-before-send display and a response display.

Therefore, this is why I am proposing that this first phase consist of a telephone request to a live computer operator.

Phase II: Develop an identification system using drivers' licenses that can be biometrically verified at the point of purchase.

Rather than focusing primarily on an identification system that requires the electronic transmission of fingerprints from the dealer's location, a system utilizing identifying documentation should be considered. The latter system would achieve the same results as the former if there could be safeguards minimizing the possibility that the purchaser is not the same person named in the identifying document. If we rely on identification documentation, there are three questions that must be answered by a firearms dealer who is attempting to avoid selling a gun to a felon. These three questions, and the system's solution to them, are as follows:

First. Is the document presented by the buyer genuine or counterfeit?

There are at least two days that a driver's license or other document can be designed to protect against counterfeiting or tampering. It could be made with a magnetic strip that would be run through a scanner just like a credit card. This scanner would indicate to the dealer whether the license was genuine and unexpired. Another method would be to place a hologram on the face of the card. An inspection of the hologram would assist the dealer in determining whether any tampering had occurred.

Second. Is the individual presenting the identification document the same person to whom the document was lawfully issued?

This is the stage where biometric identification is necessary. One way to compare the card against the person presenting it would be to affix biometric data on the card. A biometric pattern recognition device can be used to compare the presenter's fingerprint with the print on the card. Such a device would be far less expensive than the high cost of the fingerprint digitizer described in the task force's report.

Of course, this method requires that the State government issuing the card take special precautions to insure that the card is not fraudulently obtained. Using biometric identification with drivers' licenses has many advantages. The State of California already is moving in this direction. Imagine the benefit this identification standard would be to immigration authorities. Studies have shown that driver's license fraud is a serious problem.

Third. Is the prospective buyer eligible under Federal law to possess a firearm?

Once the dealer has positively identified the buyer, he can conduct an on-the-spot check of the name by way of the telephone. The speed of these telephone checks will improve as the available technology is applied to this task. Again, criminal justice records must be dramatically improved before this check is fully reliable.

If a dealer can answer these three questions, he will have achieved all of the goals of an immediate and accurate point-of-purchase identification system. When fingerprint digitizing technology becomes more affordable, we may wish to move in that direction. However, in light of the fact that felons rarely obtain firearms from licensed dealers, large expenditures may not be justified.

Phase III: Develop a one-print biometric identification system that interfaces the firearms dealer with a pool of violent felons.

The task force notes that the cost of machines that digitize a single print for communication to an external data base are much less expensive than the ten-print machines. These single-print machines range from $3,000 to $6,000 in cost, compared with $35,000 to $100,000 for the ten-print technology. We also know that the felons most likely to commit an act of violence with a gun are those who have been convicted of a violent felony within the last 5 years. It is my understanding that the FBI is in the process of developing an automated system that would check one fingerprint with a somewhat limited group of prints.

This third phase, which would run concurrently with the first and second phases, would involve establishing some pilot projects in this type of biometric identification. The effectiveness and efficiency of this approach would then be compared with the driver's license system to determine which best served the interests of the public.

CONCLUSION

If we are to ever have a reliable, time-sensitive and cost-effective way to identify felons who attempted to purchase guns, criminal justice records must be improved. The Attorney General is clear in his support of this assertion. At the same time, a point-of-purchase telephone system of screening out those felons who can be identified by name using existing records should be developed and put in place nationwide. However, it should be recognized that the biggest problem with this or any other felon screening system is the lack of a way to know whether the person attempting to buy a gun is who he says he is. For this reason, a biometric identification system must be developed and put in place.

In the long run, a point-of-purchase fingerprint system that automatically verifies whether or not the prints of the buyer are those of a felon would be the best and most effective method of screening out felons. While the technology exists to do this now, the costs are prohibitive. An alternative, much less expensive system could be created using a single fingerprint on a driver's license to simply verify at the point-of-purchase that the buyer is the person whose name and other data are on the face of the license. Then the telephone could be used to check the name against existing felon records with much more reliability. I hope the administration and Congress work quickly to establish such a system. Waiting periods will not work, but a point-of-purchase system like this will.

THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF NATIONAL SLOVAK SOCIETY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COYNE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, on February 17, a very special event will take place in my hometown of Pittsburgh. The National Slovak Society—under the able leadership of its national president, Joseph Stefka—will be celebrating its 100th anniversary with a banquet at the Sheraton Hotel.

This anniversary is a milestone, not only for the society but for all Americans of Slovak descent. It is a good time to pause and recall some of the history and contributions of Slovaks in America.

The great migration of Slovaks to the United States began in the 1800's, largely because the system of land ownership in their native country left many Slovak peasants landless and unable to survive. Many emigrated here, and our Nation has been richer as a result.

The list of Americans of Slovak descent who have distinguished themselves is long and impressive. It includes the great inventor Jozef Murgas, the internationally recognized historian Jaroslav Pelikan, the astronaut Eugene Cernan—and our good friend and colleague Representative JOSEPH GAYDOS.

But just as important are the thousands of Slovak men and women who have worked hard, built homes, raised their families, contributed to community organizations like the National Slovak Society, and been a part of the American dream. We may not know their names, but they represent a vital strand in the fabric of American life.

For 100 years, the National Slovak Society has played an important role in the cultural and social life of Slovaks in America. The society has accomplished a great deal. On this occasion, I know my colleagues join me in saluting the National Slovak Society as they celebrate their first century on February 17 and look forward to their second hundred years.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA DOES NOT NEED SHADOW SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PARRIS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, one of the interesting proposals proffered by proponents of statehood for the District of Columbia is the election of so-called shadow Senators and Representatives. Proponents of statehood say that these shadow congressional officials are needed to help lobby the statehood bill through Congress and to provide an increased form and level of congressional representation for the residents of the District of Columbia.

While this proposal is supported by some, whatever one thinks of statehood, closer examination suggests that it may well be illegal, it is definitely very expensive, and it denigrates the representation authorized by Congress in the District of Columbia Delegate Act. For all of this, it may well be nothing more than an employment opportunity for those politicians and their friends who can't give the citizens of the city ample justification to elect them to positions of real authority. Once fully analyzed, one will find that shadow Senators and Representatives are, in short, a bad idea.

Why? Why may the provision be illegal? While the citizens may have voted for the idea of statehood, the Constitution they voted upon is the not the one which is presently before Congress. Who is to say that the citizens want anyone to lobby for passage of statehood based on the present, city council and District of Columbia Committee passed, Constitution? As a minimum, the citizens ought to have had their views respected. Equally important, however, is the fact that these members-in-waiting—which is what they are properly called—are lobbyists. Use of appropriated funds to lobby Congress is prohibited by law. So, if these persons are to lobby for statehood, it must be done with funds that are raised outside of the appropriations process. The Federal Government, which contributes more than one-half billion dollars to the city, should not have to pay to have itself lobbied or its funds shuffled in a bookkeeping morass of fungibility.

The proponents of statehood have also been anything but parsimonious with the appropriated funds for these officials. Depending on which set of numbers you choose to use, the cost will be exactly equal to that which Senators and Representatives currently receive or maybe something less if some of the proposals to reduce the salaries of these shadow members is followed. Whatever number is used, it's a lot of money; it's money the city can ill afford at a time when schools are in distress, when homelessness continues to be rampant, and medical and public safety services are taxed from murders and drug abuse.

The District of Columbia already has a federally supported and paid representative on Capitol Hill. The nonvoting Delegate, as he is known, possesses all the rights and privileges of the House, its committees and its floor. He also has the privileges of the floor in the Senate if he chooses to avail himself of it. Whether he, as the individual serving in that office, is effective or not, of course, is for the citizens of the District of Columbia to decide. Congress has, however, provided for this position and has a right to expect that it will not be diminished by the establishment of competing offices.

In fairness, there has been some suggestion that perhaps this proposal would be more palatable if the shadow members served without pay. I would simply note that such a proposal does not speak to the question of whether the citizens want anyone to lobby for them on this particular constitution and statehood proposal. If the local citizenry raised the funds and paid the bills which the lobbyists would incur, it would, at least, have some credibility. The facts are that there is no evidence that the local citizenry has demonstrated any interest in or capacity for raising the resources necessary to achieve any greater level of home rule, congressional representation, or statehood except when the Federal Government provides the resources and pays the bill.

The questions of statehood, congressional representation, and greater levels of home rule are serious issues. They should not be taken lightly; they are not the private preserves of a few people who are paid from Government funds or self-styled activists who may or may not be representing anyone except themselves and their cronies. For those who think that using these positions and this serious issue as a way to pay political debts and to keep people out of other races, they need to understand that Congress will not fail to react to such a scheme.

SUPPLEMENTAL SECURITY INCOME FOR AMERICAN SAMOA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from American Samoa [Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which will provide basic assistance for the 1,600 aged, blind, or disabled individuals residing in American Samoa.

The elderly who live in American Samoa are without resources which are available to other Americans who reside in other parts of the United States. Those programs available to their brothers and sisters in Puerto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands, and other Pacific territories are not available to the elderly in American Samoa. To receive benefits under the supplemental security income [SSI] program at this time, an aged, blind, or disabled individual must be living in 1 of the 50 States, the District of Columbia, or be a resident of the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands [CNMI].

The Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands was included under the supplementary security income program in 1976. This has been fortunate for their handicapped and needy elderly. In 1988 there were 590 recipients in CNMI who benefited from the program.

The men and women I seek to help with this legislation have been caught between two systems. When Social Security went into effect in American Samoa, this group of people were too old to contribute long enough to qualify for minimum benefits. The territorial retirement system did not begin until 1971. By that time, many of these people had already left the work force or had so little time remaining that they were also excluded from benefits under this system.

Mr. Speaker, the elderly and severely handicapped individuals—some 1,600 of them—have nowhere to turn—no personal resources or Federal support programs. Even the territorial government is severely strained financially at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, American Samoa currently does not receive aid for dependent children or food stamp benefits, and it does not want these programs. I do believe, however, SSI benefits should be extended to relieve the more critical needs of our severely handicapped and elderly who do not qualify for any other assistance.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. EXTENSION OF SUPPLEMENTAL SECURITY INCOME BENEFITS PROGRAM TO AMERICAN SAMOA.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The 7th sentence of section 1101(a)(1) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1301(a)(1)) is amended by inserting "and title XVI (as in effect pursuant to the amendment made by section 301 of the Social Security Amendments of 1972)" before "also".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) Section 1614(e) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 1282c(e)) is amended by inserting ", American Samoa," before "and".

(2) Section 1614(a)(1)(B)(ii) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 1382c(a)(1)(B)(ii)) is amended by inserting "or national" after "citizen".

SEC. 2. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by section 1 shall take effect on January 1, 1991.

THE 125TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE AMERICAN SOKOL ORGANIZATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call to the attention of my colleagues in the House of Representatives that February 14 will mark the 125th anniversary of the founding of the first American Sokol unit by Czech immigrants, Karel Prochazka, Jaroslav Vostrovsky, and E.B. Erben, meeting in St. Louis, MO, in 1865.

During the ensuring 50 years, many Sokols were formed throughout the United States, and all of these units were incorporated into the American Sokol Organization on January 1, 1917.

Sokol is the Czechoslovak word for falcon, and it is an appropriate symbol, since the falcon is a bird that has a great love for freedom, as well as strength, courage, and agility. The Sokol philosophy strives for physical fitness for their members, believing that to maintain a free nation, its people must be physically and morally strong.

This Sokol ideal was originally created in Czechoslovakia in 1862 by Dr. Miroslav Tyrs, a professor of history and aesthetics at Charles University in Prague, and Jindrich Fuegner, a businessman with a special love for the arts and music. These two individuals perfected a system of physical fitness through a series of calisthenics and other activities, based on the notion that each individual is important and could progress to an ultimate peak of physical fitness. Their well-known motto was "A sound mind in a healthy body."

Sokol festivals, called Slets are held every 4 years, and last for 4 days featuring competitions in gymnastics, volleyball, basketball, and rhythmics. In addition to physical fitness, Americans of Czech and Slovak descent, who are Sokol members, emphasize spiritual, moral, and cultural enlightenment. Educational lectures and films are given at the organization's workshops and competitions, teaching the values of hard work, determination, and physical stamina are essential to personal achievement in everyday life. The American Sokol Organization also maintains camps for youngsters, libraries, and statistics on gymnasts, and provides scholarships to members on the basis of their attainment and achievement.

Sokol members range from preschool age to retirement age, enabling the older members to pass on the benefit of their wisdom and experience to the young people in a personal way. In combining Czechoslovak culture, the American heritage, and Sokol ideals, this organization has contributed greatly to the welfare of the United States. Many Sokol members have served their country with distinction, in World War I, World War II, the Korean war and the Vietnam conflict.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join with Sokol members in the 11th Congressional District of Illinois, which I am honored to represent, and members of American Sokol Organization in the city of Chicago and all over the United States, as they celebrate their 125th year of excellence, achievement, and contributions to the greatness of the United States.

THE LAST FRONTIER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. BENTLEY] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, in 1957 when the Soviet Union launched Sputnik, Americans were justifiably concerned as an enemy satellite circled the globe without an adequate American response. It appeared that the Soviets had leapfrogged over us right into space and we were left kneeling in the dust.

From the streets of New York to corporate boardrooms, Americans demanded better education, they said, we must catch up. Americans knew that Edmund Burke was right when he said, "Education is the cheap defense of nations."

In response, the education initiatives of Presidents Eisenhower and Kennedy fueled the technological explosion of the sixties and seventies. Not only were Americans on the way to the Moon, but they were also taking the lead in every major economic sector in the world. Education and good old-fashioned elbow grease spurred innovation and created growth and prosperity.

Americans knew then, as they know now, what was ailing the Nation. They have common sense; they know that our position in the world has slipped; and they know what is going on.

Thirty years ago, Americans purchased cars from General Motors, Chrysler, and Ford and televisions from Magnavox, RCA, and Zenith. Today our constituents see friends and neighbors driving Japanese and German cars and they see them purchasing Japanese televisions, radios, and VCR's—all evidence of a new economic order. They cannot even buy a U.S.A.-made VCR even though it was invented here.

These daily reminders are not only seen, but, more importantly, they also are felt—Americans can feel the mantle of economic leadership and prosperity slipping away.

When IMB cuts 10,000 jobs, it is not just computers that are lost. When GM and Ford close production plants, it is not just cars and trucks that are lost. And when Lowell, MA, the high-technology bastion of the East, faces a recession, it is not just computer chips that are lost.

It is jobs, families, and communities that are lost—and believe me, these losses are felt like no other. Couple these losses with recent Japanese purchases of signature American assets like Rockefeller Center and Columbia Pictures, and you can understand why yesterday's New York Times poll "detected an erosion of positive attitudes toward Japan among Americans."

The New York Times article by Michael Oreskes points out that Americans are voicing fear over Japanese investments in this country. They watch as their dollars pile up overseas and they blame both America and Japan for this growing phenomenon.

Of course America is not blameless—we have been active participants in our own decline. Whether it is the CEO who can't compete or the Government official who turns a blind eye on our economic problems, we all share the blame.

Removing our blinders is a good first step. Rather than watching our bottom line, we should be watching our front line. You might not remember that Boeing manufactures much of the world's supply of airplanes or that Lotus and MicroSoft create much of the world's supply of software.

Both the aerospace and software industries create export surpluses; and, without them, our balance would sink to the bottom of a sea of red ink, already in the red—it would be much worse. However, success is often fleet-footed—now you see it now you don't—may become our next national anthem.

An article in Northeast International Business entitled, "The One Who Controls the Software Controls the War," discusses the possibility of losing the software market to the Japanese.

The author poses an interesting question. He asks:

Over the last two decades, Japan's Ministry of International Trade and Industry [MITI] has targeted industry after industry for priority development, with blinding success at home and devastating repercussions abroad. Now that MITI has finished with electronics and autos, could software be its next target?

This question requires examination. To date, the only comprehensive study on this issue comes from the Computer Software and Services Industry Association or [ADAPSO]. Their study, entitled, "Japanese Software, The Next Competitive Challenge" outlines the industry's fear of obsolescence in the face of Japanese competition.

Their concern is valid—it is difficult to be No. 1 and it is even more difficult to remain No. 1. The world software market was "roughly $50 billion in 1988 and is expected to burgeon to an estimated $1 trillion by the year 2000." Quite a market—everything from A to Z will be operated by high-tech software.

Currently, the United States consumes 52 percent of the world software and produces approximately 70 percent of the total world market in software. This figure is probably a bit low considering the high incidence of software piracy.

Seventy percent of the market share is impressive—but the question we should be asking ourselves is not "How well we are doing now?" It is "How well we will be doing in the future?"

Mr. Reade also quotes Joseph Garber, a consultant at A.T. Kearney Technology Consulting, as saying:

In Japan, software is a strategic national imperative or a flag issue . . . and they have the will to be material players in the software industry as they have in just about every other major industry.

The U.S. software association notes that MITI has targeted the software industry for growth. A knowledge-based industry, Mr. Reade reports that "MITI has identified software as a national deficiency so great that it is regarded as a national threat."

This might explain why Japan's Nomura Securities Co., the world's largest brokerage house, recently commissioned a study of 10,000 American software companies.

Mr. Garber, who oversaw the study for Nomura, thinks that their stated objective was to identify American software companies that could plug gaps in the Japanese market with their products."

But then he admits that there were probably unstated objectives for the study. He says:

I think there unstated objective was threefold: first, to look for United States distributors for Japanese software, second, to find people with expertise in the American market for their companies and three, they were probably looking for some good ideas.

A concerted Japanese effort to gain market share in the software industry should be taken seriously. The software industry is profitable and innovative—the Japanese recognize this—but resting on our laurels is oftentimes a dangerous policy.

Take the example given in the January 24 Journal of Commerce. The article, entitled, "Software Mart in EC at Stake," details Japanese lobbying efforts to weaken an EC policy directive. To give the full effect of what is going on Mr. Speaker, I would like to read a few paragraphs from Mr. Lawrence's article and submit the text for the record.

In reading the article, it says:

The Alliance has filed its warning about the proposed EC directive with the U.S. Trade Representative's office. Nine other U.S. computer software firms added their names to the Alliance's statement. The directive is part of the EC's 1992 plan to create free markets in goods, capital and people among its 12-member nations. The directive is due to be voted by the ED's Council of Ministers by June. At issue is a proposal in the European Parliament to modify the proposed directive by allowing an exception to software copyright protection, the Alliance says. The exception, it contends, would allow software firms to engage in reverse engineering, the act of decompiling another firm's software for the purpose of developing a competing product. The Alliance argues that the exception would significantly weaken the EC directive. It says the exception would allow firms, especially big Japanese companies, to copy successful computer programs built on the research and development of others. The chief lobbyist for this exception, Alliance sources say, is Japan's Fujitsu, although a few West European firms, notably France's Bull, have supported the Japanese effort in part. The Alliance says the Japanese would benefit most from the exception even though they have so far been relatively unsuccessful in computer software.

Software makers beware—Japan would like to know how you create software—whether they reverse engineer the product or purchase a software vendor outright, Mr. Lawrence's article is telling us that the Japanese are ready to compete.

Layoffs throughout the high-tech sector, declining profits, and product delays have been a very real part of the recent software industry picture. Last spring another Journal of Commerce article by James Mitchell predicted that software makers would face problems in the near and the long term. He says:

The big three of the personal computer software industry, Microsoft Corp., Lotus Development Corp., and Ashton-Tate Corp., are all struggling, with varying degrees.

Mr. Mitchell fears that "countless companies will be forced to shrink, be acquired or go out of business because of fierce Japanese competition. High technology companies are particularly vulnerable because this industry has been targeted by the Japanese."

The bottom line—high tech companies are vulnerable because of the inherent nature of their products—constant technological improvements require large amounts of capital—and capital is in short supply in the United States.

This alone could wipe out the software industry if a strong challenge was mounted by the Japanese. I don't think any U.S. software manufacturer could match the Japanese dollar for dollar on capital expenditures.

Not only do the Japanese consider software to threaten its national sovereignty, but they also have the large amount of capital it would take to start a competitive software industry. Considering the excellent performance of U.S. software exports, industry losses would be devastating to our already weak export balance.

Consider what happened last November when exports tumbled, causing a deficit of $10.5 billion for the month.

Richard Lawrence of the Journal of Commerce explained it this way:

Exports have been stagnating since early last spring, and some analysts said that does not bode well for the year ahead.

He then says,

Almost all of the export decline in November can be laid to the recent Boeing Co. strike. U.S. aircraft exports plunged to $537 million, down almost $900 million from October and $1.4 billion less than in September.

The Boeing strike did not do our economy any favors, but it did expose the frailty of our export base. An industry dispute brought down the entire U.S. export balance and I am sure we have not seen the last of this phenomenon. Our Nation depends on industries like software and aerospace to pull it through the 1990's—but I fear this may be just another pipe dream.

Last year, the administration, the Congress and the aerospace industry inked a deal with Japan for the coproduction and codevelopment of an FSX fighter plane.

Japan is building an aerospace industry and the United States will be providing technology in exchange for a few billion dollars. In the long run we lose. Once the Japanese are able to produce planes at home, why would they want to purchase planes from General Dynamics?

And now we have decided to help South Korea build their aerospace industry by agreeing to coproduce the F/A-18 Hornet fighter jet. The agreement includes direct purchase of only 12 complete planes, with 36 kits to be assembled in Korea and a licensing agreement between McDonnel Douglas and Samsung Aerospace Industries of Seoul to coproduce 72 planes. What a bargain.

As if these developments were not enough, Boeing has decided to build a widebody jet in partnership with the Japanese aircraft industry which "will probably lay the groundwork for a Japanese bid for some other United States aerospace company," one publication read.

Our aerospace industry is vital to our economy—yet we give away technology and agree to offsets that drain the Treasury. The Boeing deal is just another example of the greedy corporation chasing the short-term profit.

Today's CEO will not, in all probability, be held accountable 10 to 15 years down the road when Boeing and Lockheed plants are bought by British, Korean, or Japanese interests. He will take his golden parachute and land safely—no problem in his world.

Who will be accountable? It is not a question we have put to our domestic industries. Instead, we have allowed the market to ask all of the questions and I cannot recall the last time the market asked a displaced worker how he liked being unemployed.

No, I don't think we look very far ahead, but it is time that we started. The Boeing venture with Japan may cost jobs and future revenues while the fighter plane deals with Japan and Korea may cost the industry its life.

In another deal, Pratt & Whitney and General Electric have agreed to assist Japan's Ministry of International Trade and Industry [MITI] with the development of a jet engine to power a plane capable of flying at approximately five times the speed of sound.

These deals have come amid reports that the aerospace sector will soar in the 1990's. With a trade surplus of $18 billion in 1988, the aerospace industry and the jobs it provides must not be lost to foreign producers.

John Anderson, chief of Washington's Department of Trade and Economic Development says:

> An analogy with Michigan's automotive industry, which shrank as the Japanese enlarged their role, would be misleading.

He believes that—

> Boeing's global experience and use of brainpower to meet world standards will prevent what happened in Detroit from happening in Seattle.

Well, I'd like to add another dimension to this assumption. Although I do not doubt Boeing's global skills and use of brainpower, I do doubt Mr. Anderson's knowledge of Japanese plans for a domestic aerospace industry.

In 1988, Business Tokyo published an article entitled, "America's Quality Crisis, subtitled, Lessons from the Boeing-JAL affair, Can U.S. Workers Learn How To Do Things Properly?" The author, Murray Sayle, reminds us that Boeing owes its success to Japan. He says:

> Japanese Air Lines is arguably America's biggest foreign corporate customer. Seattle has reciprocated graciously with "Japan Airlines Day," where the streets are decked with intertwined Stars and Stripes and Rising Sun flags.

However, America's largest aerospace customer is getting restless. Mr. Sayles' article is a warning—the Japanese will be moving away from American-made commercial jets and defense-related aircraft. Whether they cite quality concerns or other reasons, Japan would prefer a domestic aerospace industry. As the cover story of Tokyo Business, the article is meant to familiarize readers with this inevitable development.

An article by Takayuki Kamada and Takehiko Koyanagi in the Japanese Economic Journal underscores this intent. Entitled, "Boeing May Be Ticket To Aerospace Big League," the article states:

> If core members of Japan's aerospace industry can successfully take part in the [Boeing] project as codesigners, the industry will be closer to breaking into the international aircraft market, which is now dominated by a small number of American and European companies.

In addition, the article which I include clearly points to the shortage of investment capital as the reason for the Boeing/Japan joint venture. The authors say:

> Boeing's desire for the three Japanese firms to be involved in developing the 767X could also be due to the fact that even the biggest aerospace companies are finding it too expensive to develop new planes on their own.

It is ironic to say the least. Boeing decides to team up with its future competition so it won't go out of business today. In effect, they are either ensuring their own destruction or their own dependence. However you look at it, I guess they are living by the old motto, "Live now, pay later." All this when there are available Grumman and Lockheed facilities in their country.

Like the software industry, defense related aerospace sales are extremely profitable—and this includes both commercial and defense related aerospace ventures.

U.S. industry seriously must consider the threat of obsolescence at the hands of their Japanese competitors. Little by little, Japan is preparing for its debut of both aerospace and software.

Rather than selling-out to the highest bidder, American industry should work to preserve itself. Joint ventures and off-shore production are not viable solutions. Domestic industry must invest in America—employ Americans; improve quality; build new plants.

As U.S. News and World Report concludes: "Long the teacher, America now must learn to compete." It is not only industry which must adjust to a fiercely competitive world, but the American Government and the American people also must learn to adjust.

Education and research and development projects are well worth the return on investment. If we refuse to invest in our future today, we may get what we paid for—absolutely nothing.

America always has had a venturesome spirit; and Americans always have yearned to go to places no-one has gone before. The quest to explore frontiers has taken us from the Mariana's Trench to the Moon.

Americans need this same spirit again—in the days of technological wonderment, the future approaches ever so quickly. Others, impressed with our past accomplishments, have followed our example, but these others no longer wait for us to lead.

We may soon find that these others—Japan for example—have gone ahead and staked out their claims in this last frontier—technology. And when we show up at our future—the frontier may be posted with keep out and no treaspassing signs. We'll be on the outside looking in at what was to be our frontier.

SOFTWARE MART IN EC AT STAKE

(By Richard Lawrence)

WASHINGTON.—Japanese computer software manufacturers are threatening to turn a proposed European Community software directive against U.S. manufacturers, a U.S. group contents.

If the Japanese succeed, says the Business Software Alliance, it would "seriously jeopardize" the U.S. trade surplus in packaged software of almost $9 billion a year.

How the EC directive evolves has even larger implications, according to the alliance, which comprises six U.S. software makers, including Microsoft, Lotus Development and WordPerfect.

If the EC computer software directive is shaped to Japanese suggestions, an alliance spokesman said, it could disrupt the Uruguay Round intellectual property rights negotiations at the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in Geneva.

The alliance has filed its warning about the proposed EC directive with the U.S. Trade Representative's Office. Nine other U.S. computer software firms added their names to the alliance's statement.

The software group wants the trade representative to emphasize U.S. concern to the EC about the Japanese attempt to alter the proposed directive for the legal protection of computer programs.

The directive is part of the EC's 1992 plan to create free markets in goods, capital and people among its 12 member nations. The directive is due to be voted by the EC's Council of Ministers by June.

At issue is a proposal in the European Parliament to modify the proposed directive by allowing an "exception" to software copyright protection, the alliance says.

The exception, it contends, would allow software firms to engage in "reverse engineering, the act of decompiling another firm's software for the purpose of developing a competing product."

The alliance argues that the exception would "significantly weaken" the EC directive. It says the exception would allow firms, especially big Japanese companies, to copy successful computer programs built on the research and development of others.

The chief lobbyist for this exception, alliance sources say, is Japan's Fujitsu, although a few West European firms, notably France's Bull, have supported the Japanese effort in part.

The alliance says the Japanese would benefit most from the exception, even though they have so far been "relatively unsuccessful" in computer software.

The debate over the EC directive has even broader implications, says Brad Smith, a Covington and Burling attorney in London for the alliance.

He maintains that Fujitsu and other Japanese software makers have been pressing the Japanese government to push for a reverse engineering exception in a prospective GATT agreement this year on intellectual property rights protection.

BOEING MAY BE TICKET TO AEROSPACE BIG LEAGUE

(By Takayuki Kamada and Takehiko Koyanagi)

After years of working as hired help in the international aerospace business, three Japanese companies look set to become full partners with one of the industry's major players.

Boeing Co. officially invited three Japanese companies to be co-developers of its twin-engine, 300-seat 767X passenger jet at the four companies' regular top-level meeting in Seattle, Washington, Oct. 20, Kawasaki Heavy Industries Ltd. Chairman Kenko Hasegawa told The Nihon Keizai Shimbun last week.

The two other firms attending the meeting were Mitsubishi Heavy Industries Ltd. and Fuji Heavy Industries Ltd. All three Japanese makers have served as subcontractors on Boeing's 767-300 jet.

INTO THE GLOBAL MARKET

If these core members of Japan's aerospace industry can successfully take part in the project as co-designers, the industry will be closer to breaking into the international aircraft market, which is now dominated by a small number of American and European companies.

The new plane will be based roughly on Boeing's 200-seat 767, with revamped body and wings and modified engines.

The Japanese makers are particularly interested in designing the 767X's wing-body fairings and tail parts, sources close to the three firms said.

"Their quality and production control techniques may have led Boeing to choose them as co-developers of its newest aircraft," said Yoshihiro Sakamoto, deputy director general of the Ministry of International Trade and Industry's machinery and information industries bureau.

This development has come at a time when the Japanese aerospace industry is expanding its activities from plane assembling to development of various aerospace technologies, including an advanced wing composition method, Japanese industrial analysts say.

However, Sakamoto does not think Boeing is deepening its ties with these Japanese companies merely to take advantage of their advanced technology.

"The move instead reflects the fact that we are now in an era of international cooperation in aircraft development," Sakamoto said. He cited as an example the Airbus Industrie joint venture by European countries.

Japanese companies should be competitive within the framework of international aircraft development cooperation, Sakamoto added.

The most recent example of Japan-U.S. cooperation in the aircraft development field was the November 1988 FSX accord between the two nations.

General Dynamics Corp. of the U.S. and Mitsubishi Heavy Industries, along with Kawasaki Heavy Industries and Fuji Heavy Industries, cooperate in developing Japan's new FSX fighter, which is based on the American F-16 aircraft.

Boeing's desire for the three Japanese firms to be involved in developing the 767X could also be due to the fact that even the biggest aerospace companies are finding it too expensive to develop new planes on their own, analysts say.

PROJECTS AND STUDIES

The Japanese aerospace industry and MITI are involved in various international joint commercial aircraft development projects and studies, such as 75- and 150-seat aircraft bodies, a commercial jet engine, avionics equipment and components, as well as the supersonic transport development initiative.

The 767X project, however, faces one major hurdle: money. Its total development cost is estimated at $4 billion. The three Japanese firms are expected to bear some 20% of that amount, but they cannot afford to provide all of it themselves.

Boeing and the three Japanese aerospace companies have worked together since 1984, when MITI initiated the 7J7 150-seat passenger plane project.

However, the recent trend toward stable oil prices and the shift in airlines' needs from smaller to larger planes have made the fuel-saving, small-sized 7J7 less of a priority. As a result, the program is unlikely to enter the full-fledged development stage for the time being.

But MITI, which has already provided the 7J7 project with Y10 billion in research money, cannot drop the project just because of the 767X. MITI plans to spend another Y10 billion on the 7J7 project in fiscal 1960 alone.

MITI SUPPORT

Meanwhile, MITI appears to be basically supportive of the 767X plan, although ministry officials refuse to discuss their approach to the project before official consultation with the companies involved.

"We won't turn a deaf ear to the 767X story when they ask us to do something," said Shinichiro Ota, director of MITI's aircraft and ordnance division. "It is good for Japan's aerospace industry to have some variety in their development programs."

Both Boeing and its three Japanese partners have specific reasons for going ahead with the 767X joint venture.

The Seattle-based giant needs to bridge the gap between its 200-seat 767 and 430-seat 747 jets to compete in the increasingly lucrative 300-seat market. That market is now dominated by Airbus industries's A330-300 and McDonnell Douglas Corp.'s MD-11.

For their part, the Japanese partners also need to secure orders in the new field before fiscal 1995, when their contracts with the Defense Agency end. Defense-related deals are said to account for some 80% of the Japanese aircraft industry's orders.

According to Boeing's timetable, it hopes to start 767X shipments sometime during 1994, an airline source said.

Because the development of new wings and body for the 767X will take about five years, MITI will be urged to decide on its assistance before too long.

"It will be acted upon next year," MITI's Sakamoto said, which suggests that the ministry will make its decision sometime before the compilation of the fiscal 1991 budget in the middle of 1990.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 876 AND H.R. 3751

Mr. CAMPBELL of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be deleted from cosponsorship of H.R. 876, and H.R. 3751.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAYES of Illinois). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAYES of Illinois). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

PEACE DIVIDEND

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAYES of Illinois). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FEIGHAN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I requested today's special order to focus attention on the issue of the "peace dividend." During the 9-week recess of Congress, we witnessed a dramatic change in the world order. Between November 1989 and February 1990, six governments in Eastern Europe fell. Yugoslavia and Albania may be next.

And on Monday, President Gorbachev announced an historic proposal—to allow multiparty rule in the Soviet Union for the first time since 1917.

These are events few of us expected to witness in our lifetimes. Revolutionary events that must change the way we look at the world—and America's role in it.

Rightly, the changes in Eastern Europe have ignited a debate here about America's budget priorities in a post-cold war world. As we set the agenda for the 1990's, it centers on questions such as what should we spend on national defense? Should our allies shoulder more of the burden for our collective defense? What should we spend on foreign aid? And how much do we commit to meet our domestic needs?

In early December, Defense Secretary Richard Cheney provided the first reference point for the peace dividend debate. Secretary Cheney announced that almost $180 billion in U.S. defense savings could be achieved over the next 5 years.

Members of the House and Senate responded by issuing wishlists, showing how the extra $180 billion could be spent. Some have argued for spending the windfall on crucial domestic programs such as education, housing and infrastructure. Others say that the dividend should go exclusively to paying off the budget deficit. Others contend that any savings should be used to offset a tax cut.

The administration moved swiftly to qualify Secretary Cheney's announcement. The original estimates were said to be based on outdated and exaggerated projections of future defense spending. Office of Management and Budget Director Richard Darman called the peace dividend a fantasy. In the words of President Bush, "what peace dividend?"

I can understand President Bush's caution. There's no way to be sure that all of the changes in Eastern Europe are permanent. But we have a pretty good idea. The INF Treaty, signed by President Reagan and Chairman Gorbachev, began destroying nuclear weapons on both sides for the first time ever. Conclusion of the Convention Forces in Europe Treaty [CFE] will bring drastic troop reductions across Europe. The Warsaw Pact is in shambles.

It is time for us to shift our focus to other pressing national security issues such as—increasing U.S. productivity to regain our top spot in the world economy and making the American people the most educated society in the world. We cannot accomplish this without the administration's help.

For the past 40 years, we have heard over and over again that "the Russians are coming, the Russians are coming." Well, if the Russians are coming, they are going to be a little late. They must first end the civil war in Azerbaijan. Then they must deal with the Baltics and the Ukraine. This is before they even begin to look at Eastern Europe.

In the meantime, Japan is becoming the dominant world economic power. West Germany and the European Community are staring us in the face waiting to take us on in 1992. What kind of planning is being done by the administration? What steps have been taken to fight the economic and competitive war in the global marketplace? And why can't the peace dividend fit into these plans?

It is all well and good to say what peace dividend? Or call it a fantasy. But I do know that if the administration cannot find the peace dividend, Congress will. I am certain the administration does not relish that prospect. And I honestly believe that many of us here in the House do not relish that prospect either.

This special order is the beginning of the congressional debate on this issue. It is clear to me that the American people expect Congress to find the peace dividend and to allocate it.

A recent New York Times poll indicated that 75 percent of all Americans believe the warming of relations between the United States and the Soviet Union provides an opportunity to cut military spending.

In my hometown of Cleveland, anticipation of a peace dividend is also running high. In December, Cleveland's Mayor-elect Michael White set forth an ambitious agenda for a reallocation of military spending.

At this time, I insert into the RECORD an article written by Mayor White. The article appeared in the Plain Dealer, and is entitled "Now Let Us End the Cold War at Home.

[From the Plain Dealer, Dec. 19, 1989]

NOW LET US END THE COLD WAR AT HOME

(By Mike White)

Every holiday season we hear a lot about good will and peace on Earth. But this year these words hold a special promise. Not long ago few would have believed that 1989 would see a Polish government led by Solidarity activists, Hungary's Communist Party embracing multiparty politics, or the Berlin Wall—the ultimate symbol of Cold War division—becoming a passageway to freedom.

For those of us who grew up in the shadow of superpower conflict, the remarkable growth and success of the democracy movements in Eastern Europe has been as astonishing as it has been inspiring. After all, who could have imagined that by 1990 Western Europe would face a siege not by Soviet tanks, but by East German tourists?

This grass-roots uprising against communism reminds all of us that the hunger for liberty, whether it be in Cracow, Cape Town or Cleveland, remains one of the greatest forces on Earth. In the wake of this peaceful revolution few can doubt that we now face the most significant opportunity for real peace in Europe since World War II.

For Americans the events in Europe have meant something else, too: new prospects for reduced tensions with the Soviet Union and, with it, a return to a peacetime economy. And for us the impact of that second "revolution," while hardly as dramatic, may be almost as far reaching.

Defense Secretary Richard Cheney's plan to trim $180 billion from the 1992-94 military budget—through representing only a minor poke at Pentagon fat—opens a long-awaited dialogue over how defense spending should be trimmed in the wake of our changing relationship with the Soviets. But, more than that, it raises the issue of how those savings should be reallocated.

According to our city's own Finance Department more than $35 billion will leave Cuyahoga County to help pay for military-related spending for fiscal year 1990. That comes to more than $2,300 per person. With Pentagon spending averaging $34 million an hour, its not hard to understand how we came to be paying so much.

What isn't as clear is why, as we enter what President Bush has described as a new era in U.S.-Soviet relations, we cannot redirect some of those dollars to meet our needs here at home. For Cleveland families joblessness, drugs, crime and overcrowded classrooms loom as a far greater danger than the prospect of a Soviet invasion.

The choice is not whether we can afford to bankrupt our cities and public services for the sake of unlimited military expansion. Clearly we cannot. Instead the issue is where military budget cuts are made—how deep they will go—and whether the savings will be applied to rebuilding our communities. If anyone doubts the impact that defense budget savings could have on urban life he should just consider what we could buy with the $1 trillion the Star Wars system would cost us.

According to Sane-Freeze, America's most prestigious peace activist organization, for the cost of one Star Wars system we could afford to give every family in Ohio a $75,000 house, place it on $5,000 worth of land, furnish it with $10,000 worth of furniture and put a $10,000 car in each garage.

We'd still have enough money left to do the same for every family in Indiana and West Virginia while having still enough to build a $10 million hospital and a $10 million library in 250 other cities and towns.

Of course, most in government would argue that the idea of spending so much on civilian needs is inconceivable. And perhaps that's part of the problem, too.

Too many in government have come to accept that it is impossible to address the fact that every year at least 10,000 people in Cleveland have no place to live, but are unwilling to question the propriety of spending $100 billion for the Trident II submarine and F-18 jet fighter programs. Too many accept our government's refusal to adequately fund child care and its willingness to spend $4 billion on nuclear warheads during one six-month period—while in 1987, 13,000 children of parents on welfare in Cleveland needed child care in order for their parents to work.

While Rich DeColibus of the Cleveland Teachers Union and other community leaders rightly point out the necessity of bringing more educators into our public school system, federal spending for education was slashed by 14% between 1982 and 1986, while dollars for the military increased by a rate almost three times as great.

In the 1990s, we can't tolerate federal spending priorities that place more value on developing military technology than on safeguarding the very human resources our nation will depend on for the next century. True, the $1 billion we invest in new military hardware can create 48,000 defense industry jobs, but that same $1 billion once invested in housing could generate jobs for 76,000 unemployed workers. If invested in public schools, it could pay the salaries of 100,000 new teachers.

Though a modernized steel industry and an expanded U.S. capability in electronics and machine tools may not fit some conventional definitions of national security, we also know that we cannot build America's future on fast-food jobs and foreign imports. By redirecting some of the 70% of federal research dollars now dedicated to the military to the civilian sector, we can begin to strengthen our ability to compete once again in the world marketplace.

The events in Eastern Europe and the redefinition of our relationship with the Soviets provide us with a historic opportunity to address priorities that have been on our national back burner for too long.

Whether it is finding a cure for AIDS, expanding mass transit or rescuing our public schools from neglect, we must begin to bring our tax dollars home, now, to defend America's cities. Because while we may be winning the Cold War in Europe, we still face a life and death struggle against drugs, joblessness and disease within our own borders.

America's children deserve a better future from us than poverty-ridden cities and high-tech weaponry.

That's why the cry for freedom that today is heard from the Baltic to Bulgaria can become our rallying cry, too, as we speak out for new spending priorities and a productive peacetime economy.

Just as we have shown ourselves strong enough to fight any war, let us be wise enough to plan for peace.

Mayor White's essay begins by saying "For Americans, the events in Europe have meant * * * new prospects for reduced tensions with the Soviet Union and, with it, a return to a peacetime economy." Mayor White goes on to list several pressing needs faced by the city of Cleveland, such as—housing the more than 10,000 homeless people, helping the 13,000 children of parents on welfare get quality child care, training and sending back to work the 76,000 unemployed Clevelanders. He sums up by saying, "Just as we have shown ourselves strong enough to fight any war, let us be wise enough to plan for peace." I'm sure that mayors of our other great cities would agree.

Today, I call on President Bush to appoint a bipartisan Presidential Commission to address the issue of the peace dividend. Just as we have had the Kerner Commission and the Grace Commission to bring important issues before the public, I am recommending that the President take a similar path to move this issue away from the partisan political arena and into the public arena.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the many Members who have submitted statements for the RECORD and yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SANGMEISTER].

Mr. SANGMEISTER. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Ohio for inviting me to participate in his special order, where I share many of the concerns he has just spoken about.

Mr. Speaker, there has been much debate recently over a term that has reentered our political vocabulary. I am referring to the phrase "peace dividend." The peace dividend is the payback to the American people for the end of the cold war. In considering this issue, we must face squarely the question of whether or not the cold war is over.

Before I go further in my remarks, I would like to applaud the President for his bold proposal for a bilateral reduction of American and Soviet troops in Europe to 195,000 on each side. I would hope the President continues this kind of leadership by reconsidering some of the priorities he has set in his fiscal year 1991 budget proposal.

Can anyone credibly argue that the Soviet Union poses the same threat now as it did even 1 year ago? Keeping in mind that the Soviet Union still must be considered our greatest military adversary, I would like to briefly highlight some of the dramatic changes that have taken place this past year.

For me, the most important symbol signaling an end to the cold war occurred last year on November 9. On this date, for the first time since 1961, East Germany allowed free travel from East to West Berlin. An estimated 3 million East Germans visited West Berlin over that weekend. This was especially significant for me because I can vividly remember the construction of the Berlin wall and the historical visit by President Kennedy to West Berlin pledging American resolve, to not only contain the spread of communism, but to eventually prevail over it.

Who could forget the day, August 24, when the Polish Parliament approved a non-Communist as prime minister—the first non-Communist ever to lead a Soviet-bloc nation.

Poland, Hungary, East Germany, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, and Romania are all working toward creating strong pluralist democracies. All of these nations have expressed their desire for the complete withdrawal of Soviet military forces from their soil. What makes all of the changes equally amazing is that the Soviet Union under Gorbachev has promoted them. In fact, as I speak now, there is lively discussion going on among Soviet citizens in response to a vote taken yesterday by the Communist Party approving Secretary Gorbachev's plan calling for an end to the Communist Party's monopoly and the establishment of a multiparty system in the Soviet Union.

Despite these important changes, the President has submitted a defense budget with large spending increases in programs that were questionable even before these events took place. For example, the B-2 stealth bomber program the strategic defense initiative, and the MX Rail-Garrison program all received substantial increases in funding.

For argument's sake, let's suppose Congress approves the President's fiscal year 1991 budget in its entirety. On an average day of spending, the Government will spend $15,167,000 a day on the Stealth bomber program, a 29 percent increase over fiscal year 1990. This is compared to $1,336,000 a day for State grants to combat the abuse of drugs and alcohol by this Nation's youth or $1,088,000 a day for cancer research. Assuming that the cost of one bomber doesn't increase, which we know always does, this will build us only five planes in an era where bombers are considered, by numerous military experts, to be minimal strategic value.

Under the President's plan, the star wars program will receive a 23-percent increase to $4 billion plus. I understand most of this funding increase goes to an early deployment of a project known as brilliant pebbles. I believe instead of worrying about producing a brilliant pebbles program, we should begin to worry about educating brilliant children so that America can face the next challenge which has more to do with Marshall Fields than it does with battlefields. It has more to do with engineers than it does with bombardiers. Improving education and healthcare, winning the drug war, creating jobs, and eliminating the deficit, are goals that we cannot continue to put off reaching any longer because of a bloated defense budget. Having served in the U.S. Army myself, I strongly believe that national security should be a top priority of the Federal Government. But national security includes having a strong economy and a healthy, well-educated work force. I believe we have tipped the balance toward military hardware, while we should be paying more attention to computer software.

The last program I will bring up is the MX Rail-Garrison program, The President calls for a 118 percent increase to $2 billion. At the same time, we are continuing research on another land based missile system—the Midgetman. Instead of putting nuclear weapons on trains, which would be just as vulnerable during a surprise attack as our present silo-based missiles, we should be filling those trains with American made automobiles, tractors, steel, soybeans, and other goods to be distributed to markets throughout the Nation and the world. If we don't reach a reasonable level of military spending and stop the contribution of subsidizing outdated and wasteful programs, eventually, the only things we will be able to put on our trains will be nuclear missiles, since the Japanese and the West Germans, and who knows who else will be beating us out in the marketplace.

At a time when we have an overwhelming nuclear strike capability and the Soviet military budget is decreasing for the first time in many years, The American public deserves to see a peace dividend. Either we have a military budget that bends with the new breeze that is blowing across the world, or we must accept the risk of getting blown away in the marketplace by neglecting America's most important resources—her people.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my very distinguished colleague from Ohio [Mr. DON PEASE] a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, someone who has been, I think, one of the finest thinkers in this institution on the allocation of Federal resources.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman very much for yielding.

My colleague from Ohio, ED FEIGHAN, I appreciate his kind words. Let me reciprocate them by way of commending him for asking for this special order today on a very, very important subject about which creative thinking is sorely needed in this House and in this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, last December, the Joint Economic Committee held a very useful set of hearings on U.S. defense spending and its implications for our national economy. Those hearings set the stage for a comprehensive review of U.S. defense strategies and alternative defense spending options by the Congress this year. This top-down reexamination of the defense budget has been made possible largely by astonishing changes that have occurred in eastern Europe and the Soviet Union during the past year. Even as we speak, President Mikhail Gorbachev boldly is striving to transfer responsibility and power from the entrenched Communist Party to the presidency and the elected parliament in the Soviet Union.

For purposes of this discussion, let me underscore that I have always supported a strong national defense. I believe very strongly that we need a strong defense to preserve our freedom and to conduct an effective foreign policy.

At the same time, our goal should be to spend whatever is needed for our defense and not to simply outspend our potential adversaries, be they in the Soviet Union or elsewhere. I am very encouraged that trends toward real cuts in Soviet defense spending and toward greater freedom in much of Eastern Europe are now opening historic opportunities for major cutbacks in conventional forces in Europe and for major reductions in the Soviet and United States nuclear arsenals. For the first time in decades, we can honestly debate and achieve sizable cuts in U.S. defense spending in the next few years.

I expect to devote a great deal of time this year to identifying what changes in United States defense spending make sense given movement toward a more peaceful, stable order in Europe and given rapidly improving United States-Soviet relations. Will there be a "peace dividend" now that President Bush has declared our entry into the post cold war era? If so, what should be done with this "peace dividend?"

To me, now there are several arguments for substantial U.S. military budget cuts. First, events in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union have dramatically lessened the military threat to the United States. Second, with approximately half the Pentagon budget devoted to possible warfare in the European theater, that part of the budget in particular should begin to decline. Third, the excessive Federal budget deficit, and the further cutbacks in the deficit compelled by the Gramm-Rudman law, require deep cuts in military spending. Fourth, the Pentagon remains beguiled by costly and unnecessary weapons systems that could be substantially trimmed or eliminated altogether with no threat to U.S. national security, such as the $530 million-per-copy B-2 Stealth bomber, the rail mobile MX system, and the inflated Star Wars program. Fifth, several arms control agreements now entering the closing phases of negotiation will reduce the production of nuclear, conventional, and chemical weapons and will make many of the current weapons programs and personnel deployments unnecessary. Sixth, the U.S. need to divert resources to other critical national security needs, including economic competitiveness, rebuilding the infrastructure, encouraging technologies of the future, strengthening the health care and educational systems and protecting the environment. Seventh, overdue reforms of the weapons procurement process could also save billions of dollars every year.

In spite of these arguments, President Bush has proposed a fiscal year 1991 defense budget of $5.3 billion [1.8 percent] in budget authority over the fiscal year 1990 level of $301.6 billion. The Bush administration 5-year defense plan also proposes increases for each of the remaining 4 years.

Clearly, this Congress can and must do better. We need to confront the military-industrial complex in America and force it to come to terms with what we have reason to believe is the dawning of a more stable, peaceful world. Most economists believe that reduced defense spending will benefit our national economy. Resources that would have gone into defense eventually can be devoted to investments that more directly raise the American standard of living. But there are difficult choices to be made about the best way for this to be done.

Some Americans want to use the "peace dividend" to reduce the budget deficit, thereby reducing interest rates and encouraging private investment. Others want to spend the money for needed public investment in physical infrastructure and human capital. Still others suggest using defense savings to cut taxes.

For my part, I think we should do all these. The Federal Government must achieve real reductions in our massive budget deficit. The Federal Government must do more to help Americans compete more effectively in the global economy. And the Federal Government must assume a more active, supportive role in improving and financing our educational system.

Toward these ends, I will soon introduce legislation calling for a $20 billion cut in U.S. defense spending in each of the next 5 years. The resulting $100 billion in savings will be dedicated to three purposes under my legislation: One-third of the savings will go for deficit reduction; one-third will go for public expenditures to enhance American competitiveness; and one-third will be distributed for property tax relief in those States that are willing to improve their schools and make certain that their students meet specific national performance standards for educational excellence.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Ohio [Mr. PEASE] for his worthwhile presentation.

I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. JOHNSTON].

Mr. JOHNSTON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, history is being made in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe this week. In fact, today. A short time ago we could have scarcely envisoned a multiparty system and a freely elected President. However, that possibility exists, and along with it the potential for closing the books, finally, once and for all, on the cold war. However, I ask the President, who is our enemy?

In light of the dramatic changes that is sweeping across Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, it is unfortunate that here in the United States we continue to fight the same predictable, irresponsible budget war. There were 55 armored divisions in the Warsaw Pact that were facing Members this time last year, and they no longer exist. In fact, if they did exist, they would, in all likelihood, fight with Members this year. Again I ask, Mr. President, who is our enemy?

Here we find that once again the politics of the budget has overshadowed the substance of the budget. The budget talk of Gramm-Rudman and of the cookie monster and of the peace dividend blur the reality. There is a stark failure of commitment to our country's greatest needs. Mr. President, who is our enemy?

Arguably, our greatest challenge is fighting the epidemic of drug use and drug-related crime in the United States. The President celebrated a $1.1-billion increase in spending on the drug war, yet the allocation of $10.6 billion is only eight-tenths of 1 percent of the overall budget. Mr. President, who is our enemy?

In the same budget, the President earmarked over $300 billion for the Pentagon to defend against an enemy which seems to be fading with each passing day. Members could not help but feel that we are fighting the wrong war.

Mr. President, we cannot meet your education goals that were established in this Chamber last Wednesday night, if we cut $460 million from the school lunch program. Who is our enemy, Mr. President? Quoting Walt Kelly's Pogo, "We have met the enemy and they is us."

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank again the gentleman from Florida for his participation and his meaningful presentation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK], who I am pleased to have participating in this special order, one of our brightest colleagues, who has spent a great deal of time and effort in formulating an alternative budget to the President's proposal of last week.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I think we should note how appropriate it is that the Speaker pro tempore at this time is a Member who has been a leader in trying to redirect spending of this country into the right places, and who has recognized early on the importance of educational spending.

I was delighted to learn that our colleague from Ohio was taking this initiative. Clearly, the Members of the House have got to take the lead if we are going to bring fiscal sanity to the country. Fiscal sanity at the current moment, requires that we stop spending unneeded tens of billions of dollars on a military threat which has diminished. No one is suggesting that the threat to our security has entirely disappeared. Therefore, no one is suggesting that the military budget entirely disappear. What we are saying is simple: For 40 years and more we have directed a large part of our national budget toward protecting ourselves and allies and others against a threat of an aggressive and hostile unified Communist bloc.

There is still a need for a nuclear deterrent on the part of the United States and for the United States to maintain forces that can vindicate our interest against nations like Iran and Libya that can threaten them. However, the fact is undeniable: The threat that came from this hostile and aggressive and unified Communist bloc has substantially diminished. They would like the question to be, the administration and its allies argue, will there be a peace dividend, as if that were a phenomenon of nature over which mortals have no control, kind of like, "Will it snow tomorrow." What will the world be like 20 years from now? The question is not will there be a peace dividend, but the question is, do we have the wit and determination to say, with a substantial dimunition in the threat to our security, there can be a corresponding dimunition in our spending.

The administration has given a couple of reasons not to do that. Let me talk briefly about three of them. One, they say, events in the Soviet Union and elsewhere are not irreversible. Not everything that happens is irreversible, of course. Gorbachev might be overthrown. We hope he will not be, by someone who is right, in terms of being a harder line individual. However, I think it is very clear as Members look at what is going on in the Soviet Union, and I see we have a former chairman of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence here, who I believe is well-suited to speak on this. Given the tremendous economic pressures they face, if one did replace Gorbachev, it would be virtually impossible for that group of individuals to reemphasize an aggressive military posture on the Soviet Union. They do not have the resources. Anyone who overthrew Gorbachev would have done so in part by promising the Russian people a better standard of living. There is no way that anyone can conceive of doing that in the Soviet Union without substantial military reductions.

The movement out of Afghanistan, the movement away from funding of Vietnamese troops in Kampuchea, the cutbacks elsewhere, are matters of economic necessity, and the case for irreversibility is stronger talking about Eastern Europe.

No one, no one believes today there is still any military threat, on the ground, from the land forces of Bulgaria, East Germany, Hungary, Poland, and Czechoslovakia, against the West. Yet President Bush's budget contains far more money to prevent Hungary and Poland from invading France than it does to help them with the transition to democracy and freedom. That is what we mean by a peace dividend, that we begin to scale down now, that we recognize reductions that are coming.

I believe that we could easily reduce the military budget $22 billion below the $307 billion baseline. We can retain the Trident submarine, we can retain the B-1 bomber with nuclear missiles, we can retain an accurate and secure land-based missile, we could keep 200,000 troops in Europe for the next year, we could keep troops elsewhere, and still cut the budget by $22 billion.

The second argument we get is, "But we cannot reduce the troops, even if there is no more need for them, because it will upset our allies." Mr. Speaker, can we not at some point ask our allies about upsetting the United States? Having, for many, many years, kind of selflessly as a nation, protected them when they were poor, now that our European and Asian allies and friends are equals in many ways economically, or are competitors, do they have a right to insist we continue to spend far more of our gross national product on military than they do? The United States now spends 6 percent of its GNP on military, and President Bush's budget does not change that in any significant way. The European NATO members average 3 percent. I do not think that our allies have a right to insist we waste money that they themselves do not want to spend.

I think in fact it is important for us to say to them, "We will be your friends, but we are not going to buy your friendship," and I do not think we have to.

The final argument is: What about the economy? Overwhelmingly people recognize that in the macroeconomic sense this would be very good for the econony. For a long time we have been in two competitions, a military competition with the Russians and a civilian competition with our allies whom we have been protecting from the Russians. To the extent we can shift some of our resources, beginning now and building and building on that, out of the military into the civilian area, we will enhance the ability of this country to grow, and we will enhance our ability to make America strong.

Yes, there will be some difficulty for individuals. There will be decent, hardworking people who may face a loss of work in some areas, and a sensible, compassionate government will act on legislation in that area. Our colleagues, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GEJDENSON], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MAVROULES], the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS], and others have put forward legislation to deal with that. The majority leader, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT], has indicated an interest in working with Members in that area. The two gentleman here now, including our colleague, the gentleman from Cleveland, OH, and the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR], who chairs a subcommittee on that subject, have indicated an interest in that field.

We have the ability to provide assistance to those who will be unfairly hurt by this, but we should recognize that overall it will be good for this econony to the extent that we can shift resources out of military spending and into the kind of civilian goods where competition exists.

The budget decisions this House will make within a couple of months will be enormously important. We can rejoice that the American policy has been successful. The threat to freedom has receded substantially. We should not unilaterally disarm, but we can begin to scale down the extent to which we have spent on our defense and on the defense of our allies and in recognition of their greater capacity to contribute, with the diminished threat, and we can begin to put the money where it will do a lot of us more good.

Mr. Speaker, for giving us the opportunity to make this point and to prepare the House for that decision, I am very grateful to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FEIGHAN], and I look forward to working with him in the months to come to accomplish that.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, again I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] for his typically eloquent presentation, and particularly for outlining specific actions we can take in order to find the resources to meet the very pressing domestic demands first and at the same time maintain a responsible program of expenditures to insure the protection of American interests both at home and abroad.

Mr. Speaker, I am delighted at this point to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STOKES] the former chairman of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. The gentleman from Ohio is a man who for the 7 years I have been in this institution has struggled to bring a more rational and sane debate to the allocation of Federal dollars, one whose voice perhaps this year given the changing circumstances globally, will be heard with even greater attention by not only his colleagues in this Chamber but also by this Nation.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Congressman EDWARD FEIGHAN, for taking out this special order and providing us with the opportunity to address a burning issue—the peace dividend.

Now that the walls of oppression have come tumbling down all over the world, the United States no longer needs to carry the burden of protecting the entire world. We should now be able to direct our efforts inward to ensure that this country has the resources to meet the challenges of the 21st century. Unfortunately, President Bush and his administration do not seem interested in preparing America for these challenges.

President Bush recently presented the Congress with a $1.23 trillion budget plan for fiscal year 1991. For those of us who were hoping for a windfall or dividend resulting from a decrease in defense spending, and who believed that this President might be in touch with the needs of this country, the President's budget is a bitter disappointment. According to the President, there is no dividend for peace.

The President's budget does not reflect the dramatic events in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. The President's request for the Defense Departement totals $295.1 billion in budget authority. It does not propose canceling or reducing any of the new generation of strategic weapons. In fact, large increases are included in the budget for the Stealth bomber, star wars and the MX missile. If we continue to support all of these weapons systems and not choose among them, we will see expenditures for these already expensive weapons increase significantly in a few years, when they will reach full production stage. Yet, OMB Director Richard Darman did not include these out-year costs among the "pacmen" that threaten to gobble up our budgetary resources.

I, too, am concerned about the magnitude of the Federal deficit. If the President's budget were adopted, the deficit would be reduced to $61.4 billion, under the Gramm-Rudman target of $64 billion. The military, however is not being asked to assume a fair share of spending reductions that must be made in order to reduce the deficit. The budget includes over $16.1 billion in spending reductions. Four-fifths of this amount is expected to come from domestic programs. Defense contributes only one-fifth of the total amount of the reduction package. A large portion of these cuts would come from entitlement programs, such as Medicare and child nutrition programs.

I question the priorities expressed in the President's budget. Under the President's plan, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration would receive the largest increase in the budget—$2.9 billion. This represents an increase of nearly 24 percent for this agency. The program being asked to absorb the largest cut is the Medicare Program, which provides health care to some 35 million elderly and handicapped Americans. A cut of nearly $5.5 billion could result in reduction of services to this vulnerable population and would exacerbate the health care crisis facing this Nation.

Apparently, the President feels that we should use the peace dividend to support space exploration. Here in America, on planet Earth, we have 3 million homeless people. Their needs are not addressed in this budget. The President states that he is increasing funding to combat homelessness by 66 percent in fiscal year 1991. At the same time, he declined to request funds to develop new public housing units. The waiting list nationwide for public housing now includes nearly 1 million people.

Cuts in important domestic spending programs have been justified by the administration as necessary to reduce the budget deficit. Reduction of the budget deficit, however, only seems to be a priority when the administration considers programs that affect certain populations—the poor, the elderly, and minorities. This policy is embodied in the resurrected capital gains tax cut proposal. A report of the Joint Economic Committee indicates that this type of tax cut will result in a loss of revenue to the Government in the long run.

The budget proposal that the President has asked us to consider demonstrates that despite the outbreak of peace, his administration is still functioning in a military mode. It does not devote enough resources to vital domestic programs, such as health care, and education. The 1990's symbolize the gateway to the 21st century. This is the time to ensure that as we face the challenges of this new century, we go forward with a healthy and well-educated citizenry, and that our cities provide a safe and enriching environment for our children. This is the ideal that America has always stood for. We must fulfill it, if we expect to prosper in the 21st century. We cannot move forward unless we reorder our priorities.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I just once again want to commend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FEIGHAN] for taking time out of his busy schedule to provide all of us an opportunity to address this very important subject for the American people.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I particularly want to thank my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STOKES] for joining us in this special order. I think that the vision of America that he outlined in his remarks is the vision that is shared by the overwhelming majority of the people of this Nation. It is clearly the vision that would most benefit future generations to whom we have the greatest obligation.

Mr. Speaker, I simply want to conclude my remarks today on the isue of a peace dividend by reminding Members of this House that just a few weeks ago former Defense Secretary Robert McNamara testified before one of our committees, and he testified that by the year 2000, only 10 years away, $300 billion could be saved by cutting only 5 percent, or $15 billion annually after adjusting for inflation from our defense budget. Only 5 percent nets us a savings of $300 billion over the next 10 years. That is a savings that is achieved by various troop reductions, some of which the President has already called for, and other reductions in various strategic weapons purchases.

Mr. Speaker, the proposal offered by Secretary McNamara I think is a sensible one; it is one that clearly can be absorbed without in any way straining our defense capability. It is an alternative that has been endorsed by Lawrence Korb, who was the Assistant Defense Secretary during President Reagan's first term, demonstrating, I think, that the proposal has a bipartisan appeal and clearly is not something that brings jeopardy to our defense posture.

There have been other proposals. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] has proposed an alternative, shorter timetable than that offered by Secretary McNamara, a timetable that would save us substantial amounts of money, almost $170 billion by 1995.

I think it is particularly important, Mr. Speaker, to note the results of an analysis that was done for Business Week, which was an analysis of the 5 percent annual cut proposed by former Secretary McNamara; the study showed that cuts of that nature could, in fact, result in a stronger economy, a more vibrant economy. Such cuts, "would energize U.S. investment producing lower inflation, lower interest rates, and cutting the deficit and boosting the gross national product."

So, Mr. Speaker, the consequences seem to be all positive by having a sensible reduction of that nature.

I find myself also on this issue in agreement with the former Assistant Secretary of State, Richard Perle, who stated, "For the foreseeable future I believe we can safely reduce the investment we make in protecting against a massive Soviet nuclear attack." I would hope as he contemplated that statement that Mr. Perle was endorsing at least the concept of a reduction in the range somewhat beyond the President's proposal of 2 percent, more akin to the proposal that has been supported by Mr. Korb and offered by Secretary McNamara that gives us a range of a least a 5-percent cut.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I would like to conclude this special order. I appreciate the assistance and patience today of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES] in presiding over this special order.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, the dramatic changes that have come about in Eastern Europe and in the Soviet Union during the past year have caught the attention of people around the globe. The end of the cold war has finally arrived. The gradual breakdown and disintegration of the communist system has created fresh, new political opportunities that are being implemented by daring, new political faces. All this has resulted from the cries of the ordinary man for democracy. While we welcome these extraordinary geopolitical developments with open arms, we must also take this time to reexamine the historical views, policies, and attitudes that we have developed regarding the Soviet Union and the defense of our own nation.

Yes, the time has come for us to reconsider our defense budget priorities. Our main focus needs to include an examination of how the military budget is being spent, and where the money will go. We must take full advantage of the inevitable defense cuts to convert them into opportunities to reinvest in America's future. There will be a peace dividend. And we must be ready to redirect that surplus peace dividend and incorporate it into a civilian economy.

During the past 10 years the United States has accumulated the largest peacetime military buildup in our Nation's history. At the same time there has been a decline in housing, in health and in educational opportunities. This military buildup has robbed the United States of its competitive edge. While we spend $300 billion on national defense, one-third of which is used to defend NATO in Europe, we are watching the Nation's infrastructure deteriorate. Spending one third of our national defense budget on NATO is no longer necessary nor defensible. The Warsaw Pact nations are no longer the threat we once knew. So, without jeopardizing our military security in Europe, we must slowly begin to alter and reduce our presence there. Of course these changes must be strategically planned in order to maintain the American military presence in Europe as a stabilizing force during an unpredictable period in political history. There is time to orderly and safely reduce our strength there and the President has agreed that we will do so. So what about the cuts in our defense budget? We can save billions of dollars by terminating the antiquated MX missile program. We can reduce funding for the Strategic Defense Initiative. We can eliminate the costly B-2 Bomber. We can streamline procurement procedures. I maintain that we can make these cuts and not lose one bit of our ability to deter aggression.

The peace dividend—the actual budgetary savings from the impending builddown in U.S. defense spending—can be used in two ways: first, to reduce the national deficit, and second, to address our domestic problems which, in fact, present the greatest threat to our own national security.

In a recent poll—the New York Times/CBS News Poll January 13 to January 15—10 percent of the American people stated that a peace dividend should be used to cut taxes, 21 percent believed that a peace dividend should be used to tackle the deficit, and the majority of the American people (68 percent) believed that a peace dividend should be used to combat serious domestic problems, specific problems such as homelessness, education, health issues, poverty, and the Nation's drug epidemic. These are just a few of the major domestic issues that face us today. I ask, what are our priorities? We must support a peace dividend that allows us to reinvest in our own economy and to reduce the Federal deficit—our best defense of our national interests. This is the true meaning of a peace dividend, and this is where that dividend shall show its greatest return.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, as we witness the changes that have been occurring in Eastern Europe, it is clear that the United States no longer needs to spend as much money on defense programs. This decrease in defense spending will lead to what some have called the "peace dividend". The money that is no longer needed for military buildup can now be used for programs that will help the citizens of the United States who have been overlooked in the past by overemphasis on defense spending.

I believe in a peace dividend. I believe that the money that might once have been used for the improvement of weapons to defeat our enemies should now be concentrated to improve the quality of life in America. This is a positive step forward—a true step toward the kinder and gentler nation we were promised throughout the Bush campaign.

I believe that a good portion of this money should go toward expanding the quality and access to health care in the United States. There are currently 37 million Americans under age 65 who do not have adequate coverage. It is alarming to think that in such a wealthy and advanced country as the United States, there are millions of citizens who must face the possibility of going without medical treatment because they cannot afford to pay for it.

More importantly, we need the help of our President. The only way the health care crisis can be solved is through Presidential leadership. It is clear that voluntary efforts do not work.

I was extremely pleased to hear President Bush, in his State of the Union address, acknowledge that he has an important role to play in this area. The President assigned Dr. Louis W. Sullivan, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, to lead to review of recommendations on the quality, accessibility and cost of health care in the country. This was a major step forward since the health care crisis had previously been dealt with only at lower levels of the Department of Health and Human Services. Mr. Bush has elevated the issue, and I commend him for that. But his encouraging words must be followed by deeds.

There are currently a number of legislative proposals to deal with expanding health insurance. I am proud to be an original cosponsor of H.R. 1845, the Basic Health Benefits for All Americans Act. This is a comprehensive legislative package designed to assure that by the year 2000, all Americans will enjoy access to health insurance either through an employer-sponsored benefit plan or a Government-sponsored public program.

Building on the already existing coverage provided by most employers, H.R. 1845 combines the requirement that all employers provide basic health insurance to employees and their families with the recognition that for low-income families, particularly those in which no family member is employed, the Government has a critical role to play in providing a mechanism to assure access to health care. The benefit package required under both the public and private plans would generally be the same; no employer would be required to provide a benefit to its employees that was not also required under the Government-sponsored program. The Basic Health Benefits for All Americans Act is an ambitious, yet in my opinion necessary, proposal designed to forge a strong partnership between the private sector and Government to meet the challenge of extending health coverage to the 37 million Americans who today lack health insurance.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations, I held hearings on H.R. 1845. Although there are differing views on this legislation, I feel it is appropriate. I also, however, realize the importance of exploring all options and working together with those of differing views to craft the most effective proposal.

I, once again, applaud President Bush for recognizing that America's health care delivery system is in crisis. It is true that costs are out of control and consumers are incapable of making rational market choices because they lack fundamental information necessary to assess the quality of care that is available. It is not enough, however, for the President to order yet another study of this issue. The problem has been studies to deal with. We need leadership not additional study.

I hope that President Bush and Congress can work together on this one. Also, I hope that the impending decrease in defense spending will lead to an increase in Federal dollars going toward this problem. It is going to take a sincere commitment from all parties involved in the health care arena to work together to finally solve America's health care crisis.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I would first like to thank Congressman FEIGHAN for taking the time for this special order on the important issue of the peace dividend. I think the other Members have aptly described the opportunity we have to reorient our budget priorities in a more rational, fair, and compassionate direction.

I would like to focus on one aspect of a budget transfer which I believe to be an intrinsic part. It is the missing link between cutting the defense budget and avoiding economic dislocation. The issue is economic conversion.

I have introduced legislation, which has 64 cosponsors, to help communities adjust to defense spending reductions. H.R. 101 would establish local alternative use committees at every defense facility which employs more than 100 employees. These committees, comprised of equal numbers of representatives of management and labor, would be responsible for developing alternative use plans for the facility in the event that its contract is substantially reduced or eliminated.

The detailed plans developed by the alternative use committee would provide the community and the employees of the defense facility with a viable and workable blueprint for successful conversion. If this process is completed in a timely manner—that is, before the announced contract reduction, the community would be able to implement the transition of the facility. The defense plant could retrain its workers, and start production without the massive employee layoffs and community disruption which often occurs with contract cancellations.

Mr. Speaker, we are only at the beginning of what will ultimately become an avalanche of defense budget reductions. Defense experts representing all political persuasions agree that hundreds of billions of dollars of current defense programming must be cut in the next 5 years just to stay within projected levels of defense spending. Without conversion planning, the economic dislocation caused by this type of reorientation within our defense budget will be devastating.

At this point, I'd like to give you some examples of what the peace dividend could bring. The B-1B bomber program would—at $27.3 billion—pay for the cost of reducing acid rain for the next 5 years. The cost of the C-17A heavy transport plane—at $35.4 billion—could fund 7 years of pre-natal care for the poorest mothers in our country. I could keep going but I think the message is clear.

The comprehensive plan for economic conversion contained in the Defense Economic Adjustment Act would assure that the approval of military contracts would be on the merits rather than on the very legitimate concern about economic hardship.

It will allow us to pursue a lasting peace without sacrificing our commitment to increasing employment. Moreover, it would contribute to a national economic renewal by providing resources necessary for the revitalization of basic industries and the repair of our infrastructure.

Indeed, economic conversion offers a way of rethinking the meaning of security and provides the hope that humanity will manage to survive into a peaceful and prosperous future.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in discussing the need for a reordering of our spending priorities in light of the developments in Eastern Europe. I wish to thank my distinguished colleague from Ohio, ED FEIGHAN, for arranging this special order on an important and timely subject.

Last fall, we all watched events occur in Eastern Europe which only a year ago were thought impossible. The evening news brought us daily reports of how the citizens of each Warsaw Pact nation were demanding democratic reforms, and how the Communist governments of those nations crumbled under such pressures. Perhaps the most moving event from last fall was the tearing down of the Berlin Wall, an event often wished for, but rarely seriously considered.

It is not an understatement to say that the international picture has changed virtually overnight. After over four decades of cold war, our country now has to prepare for survival in a world where the balance of power is no longer based on military hardware, but on economic performance.

In looking at his budget proposal for fiscal year 1991, it seems this is a lesson President Bush has yet to learn. After a decade in which military spending increased over 50 percent, the President is asking for an additional $5 billion for the Pentagon. The President's budget continues the trend of spending exorbitant amounts of money on such big-ticket items as Star Wars, the B-2 Stealth bomber, and the Midgetman missile.

This is a budget which reflects a continuing cold war mentality, and which does little to address the real international challenges facing our country. We are a first-rate military power in many ways unprepared for a world in which economic strength will determine international standing. While the Bush and Reagan administrations spent the last decade stockpiling weapons, we have seen the national debt triple, making us beholden to foreign investors to finance our excesses.

The previous and current administrations have also dramatically shortchanged those areas of Federal spending which have the most direct impact on our competitiveness. Over the last decade, funding for educaton is down by 11 percent. Spending on transportation was reduced by 18 percent and energy development programs were cut 81 percent. These policies have put us at an extreme disadvantage as we try to compete with nations which have long recognized the need for government investment in these areas.

Both the Bush administration and Congress have to realize our competitors are no longer on the other side of the Iron Curtain. Rather, they are economic powers such as West Germany and Japan, as well as emerging industrial nations like South Korea. These countries will not wait for us to adapt our budget priorities to the new challenges we face abroad.

The battle we now confront is not for territory, but for market shares, and more missiles and fighter planes will not help us in that task. I urge the administration and my colleagues to begin this year to channel our resources away from an outdated military spending plan and into areas like deficit reduction, education, rebuilding our infrastructure, and drafting a national plan for economic conversion. The events in Eastern Europe provide us with an invaluable opportunity to eliminate the burden excessive military spending places on our economy. We must take advantage of that opportunity.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 23, 1990)

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As we reverence God, the Senate will be led in prayer by the Chaplain, Dr. Richard C. Halverson.

Dr. Halverson.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

 * * he that is greatest among you shall be your servant.*—Matthew 23:11.

 * * Let the Lord be magnified, which hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servant.*—Psalm 35:37.

Loving Father in Heaven, with gratitude to Thee we pray for the many unsung heroes who labor tirelessly and faithfully behind the scenes. However hard and long the Senators work, they work harder and longer on duty before the Senate comes in and continue after the Senate recesses. Often they go about their tasks unnoticed and unheralded, yet, without them, the Senate could not function.

Thank Thee for those who counsel the Senators and provide the mountains of information they require. Thank Thee for those who are always busy about the most menial tasks. Thank Thee for those who provide security, for those who maintain buildings and grounds. Thank Thee, Father, for this multitude of dedicated women and men who provide efficient, dependable, indispensable service, day in, day out. May Thy blessing rest upon them and their loved ones, and may they be aware of our appreciation, even when unspoken.

In the name of Jesus, the Servant of servants. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, following the time for the two leaders this morning there will be a period for morning business until 10 a.m. with Senators permitted to speak therein up to 5 minutes each. At 10 the Senate will resume consideration of S. 695, the excellence in education bill.

Last night, a unanimous-consent agreement was entered into relative to this bill. The agreement limits the amendments in order to the bill and further provides time limitations on each of the amendments. The list of amendments and time limits can be found on page 2 of the Senate Legislative Calendar.

I alert Senators to the possibility that rollcall votes will occur throughout the day on these remaining amendments to S. 695. There is a possibility of as many as four votes occurring before action is completed on the bill. Those votes could begin as early as midmorning today.

Once action is completed on S. 695, it is my intention to call up the urgent Panama assistance legislation, either Senate S. 2073 or the House companion bill.

Mr. President, I also remind Senators that at 2 p.m. today, in room S-207, former President Carter will provide a briefing for Senators only on the Nicaraguan election process. I urge all Senators to attend what I know will be an informative briefing by President Carter.

RESERVATION OF LEADERS' TIME

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my leader time and I reserve all of the leader time for the distinguished Republican leader.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the unused portions of both leaders' time will be reserved.

MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order the Senate will proceed to the consideration of morning business with Senators permitted to speak for not to exceed 5 minutes each with the period to end at 10 a.m.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BREAUX].

NEGOTIATIONS ON THE CLEAN AIR BILL

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. President, I take this time to tell the Members of the Senate about the negotiations that are currently underway with regard to the clean air bill which the Senate is getting ready to consider in the near future once again on the Senate floor.

I think one thing is very clear. The lobbyists in Washington will not be satisfied with the product that we produce. That is not particularly unusual.

When I say the lobbyists will not be completely in agreement with the product that we ultimately produce, I mean the lobbyists for both industry and plants and industries around America that will be affected as well as those who lobby for environmental organizations and environmental concerns in America. Many in the environmental world will think we will not do enough, that we have not been stringent enough nor tight enough in the standards. While at the same time, those who represent, legitimately, industry's concerns in America, will also probably say we have gone too far; that we have required them to do too much and that it is going to be too costly.

I think the truth lies somewhere between the wishes of both organizations in the sense that we as a Congress have to do what is best for all Americans. Our primary, driving, concern is to do what is needed to improve the quality of health in this country. We have seen the statistics that are very frightening with regard to the amount of cancer that is being caused in this country. Many of these cancers are associated with the pollutants that we are discharging into the atmosphere, not to mention the legitimate concerns that we have with regard to global warming, all caused by the products that we produce in this country.

We need those products. We need to keep the industries that produce them open. We need the jobs they produce.

My State of Louisiana is particularly affected from both sides, from an environmental perspective as well as from an industry perspective. So, to do what is right is sometimes very difficult, but we are not trying to please the lobbyists who represent the interest groups on both sides. We are really trying to do what is best for all Americans. And that will require a balanced approach.

I think we can achieve that balanced approach. It is not going to be easy but indeed that is our charge with regard to the reauthorization of the Clean Air Act.

I will mention one aspect which I have worked to put into the clean air bill, and that is to try to clean up the automobiles that we use that are producing vast quantities of pollution every day. In some of the more polluted areas of our country, the nonattainment areas, like Los Angeles, where we literally have millions of automobiles on the highways at one time, it is clear that automobiles are indeed a very major cause of pollution.

One way we can help clean up pollution from automobiles is to change the type of fuel they use. There are many innovative ideas. Natural gas vehicles are one of those which I am advocating to be used in a program which ultimately will produce more natural-gas-powered vehicles in use on the highways of America.

My amendment to the clean air bill will do that by requiring, by the year 1993, that we be required to produce a certain amount of natural-gas-powered vehicles for those Federal vehicles, fleet vehicles. We all know the Federal Government has large fleets of vehicles that produce a great deal of pollution right now. My amendment, requiring they be gradually converted to natural gas vehicles, or to ethanol-powered vehicles that meet the standards, indeed would be a major step in cleaning up the atmosphere.

My legislation simply requires beginning in September 1993, that 30 percent of all Federal fleet vehilces that are purchased in that year be required to meet a very high standard of being free of pollution. Those of the cities that are the most polluted in America would have to come up to this requirement with my amendment.

Then the percentage of vehicles would increase to 60 percent beginning in September 1996, and 90 percent beginning in September 1999. This would be for federally owned vehicles. So the Federal Government, and Government vehicles, should set the standard and be the incentive to encourage that private vehicles do the same thing.

My amendment also requires that for private fleet vehicles, for companies that own 10 or more vehicles in their fleet—there are many of these; the type of vehicles that deliver the mail for private companies; the type of private vehicles that service our telephones and our gas facilities that are large numbers of vehicles in our large cities—that they be brought into the program a little bit later.

With private fleet vehicles, we are trying to make it easy for their vehicles to comply, so we require the privately owned vehicle fleets, vehicles of 10 or more, that are centrally fueled, go to a central location to get gas and use the vehicles in the cities, that these privately owned fleet vehicles that are centrally fueled at a central location be required to convert 30 percent of their vehicles in September 1996 to alternate fuel automobiles. Then it goes up to a higher requirement, an additional percentage in 1999.

What my amendment will do, Mr. President, is to encourage, through a market-oriented program, that fleet-owned vehicles of the Federal Government, as well as privately owned vehicles, would, in fact, use ultraclean fuel. It would be a major ingredient in helping us produce a clean air bill that is going to be acceptable and one that works.

The health concerns of Americans in the 1990's are legitimate. This is the one chance, the best chance, certainly, that we, as a Congress, have to address this national and, indeed, international problem that is affecting every American and every citizen of the world.

I urge my colleagues to keep close track of what we are doing in our meetings now so that the product, when we bring it to the floor, will be well understood and I think accepted by a majority of the Members of the House and the Senate and ultimately signed by the President of the United States.

I yield back my time.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BREAUX). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for not to exceed 10 minutes.

AMERICAN FOREIGN ASSISTANCE IN THE 1990'S

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, none of us can help but be struck and even stunned by the momentous political changes that have swept through Eastern Europe over the last several months. In the 9 weeks since the first session of this Congress adjourned, Communist political authorities have been removed from power throughout Eastern Europe. The fragility of these new developments, the early stages of building new resilient political institutions, provides historic opportunities for the West. The shredding of the Iron Curtain prompts us to accelerate and solidify the pace of political change and the reformation of economic institutions that will engrave the values of democracy, human rights, and political and economic pluralism into lasting new institutional arrangements.

America cannot control the pace and nature of these changes, but we can help. A central mechanism of assistance is through a reformation of our foreign assistance programs, with an emphasis on multilateral cooperation with our Western European allies, in particular. A new debate in these halls has commenced over how we can redistribute the limited foreign assistance pie so as to help meet the tremendous new challenges, new opportunities, and needs of these emerging new systems.

The distinguished minority leader, my good friend, Mr. DOLE has made a proposal on reallocating foreign assistance to reflect new priorities to help begin to respond to the call for help from the East. In doing so, Mr. DOLE has done this body a service, and he has raised the issues publicly. He has taken criticism from many sides. He has sat out on the edge, so to speak, with his legs dangling over the side. While I do not necessarily subscribe to every detail of his proposal, I congratulate him for beginning the debate. In addition, our distinguished colleague from Vermont, who chairs the appropriations subcommittee which will be conducting the surgery on the foreign assistance budget, Mr. LEAHY, has also contributed a thoughtful exposition on this difficult matter.

I join my colleagues from Kansas and Vermont on the central point—our foreign aid budget has taken on a new and suddenly enhanced importance as an instrument of our goals and policies in the world. It no longer can be viewed as a kind of well-heeled junior varsity lobbyist sport, with a limited number of traditional client States vying for advantage on the margins of the spending accounts. Important new stakes have emerged for the United States, and foreign assistance is one of the major tools that we have with which to help channel the changes coursing through Europe.

I join my two colleagues in the proposition, as Mr. LEAHY has put it, that "every program in the fiscal 1991 foreign aid appropriations will be reviewed. No program will be exempt from scrutiny." Everything should be on the table, and a thorough review of our priorities is demanded. The administration will be presenting its budget request, of course, and the administration's request deserves our careful consideration and consultation. We need to review the size of the aid request in the light of not only the potential recipients countries' needs, but also the needs of our own Nation. Czechoslovakia needs a new road system, as a casual glance of the map of that country's road system makes obvious, but the United States needs a lot of work done on its roads as well. Our highways and bridges are deteriorating. Our infrastructure is going to pot. So we have to approach this matter with a balanced view with respect to our own needs and concerns, as well as those of other countries.

I do not feel that a detailed recitation of each account, each country's legitimate share of these limited funds, is appropriate here. The appropriations subcommittees will be giving this a thorough examination.

At this point, however, I will make several observations. First, regarding the debate over so-called earmarking of funds by individual country. This is a priority setting exercise, which is conducted routinely by the Congress in fashioning the budget throughout the Federal Government. No one can seriously presume that we are going to hand over some $15 billion, whatever it may be, to the administration and say, have at it, let us know to whom you gave it to and for what purpose. The Congress has a legitimate and responsible job of setting our priorities. The size and nature of the items are what the debate will be over, and the size of the foreign aid pie should not grow as the result of the so-called peace dividend by cutting the defense budget. The foreign aid budget is going to remain limited. It certainly cannot grow out of proportion to our own domestic needs. Foreign aid is not going to be a pie in the sky. It is going to be limited, and the priority setting will consist of reallocating the funds within that pie, and that is the way it should be. If the administration wants to increase the size of the pie, then it should tell us which taxes it wishes to raise in order to increase that pie.

Third, rather than an across-the-board reduction, it may be wiser to look at each country on its merits. I am not saying it necessarily should be that. Perhaps it ought to be an across-the-board reduction with some special consideration given to countries that deserve priority. Some countries, certainly the largest of our historic aid recipients, could probably take cuts substantially larger than 5 percent. Probably between 10 and 20 percent would be more realistic. Some recipients might not take any cut at all. These precise figures are the job of the committees of jurisdiction. But there is one thing for certain. No foreign country has earned the right to our money or our resources, and no foreign country can assume that it has an American entitlement program.

Fourth, we need to reallocate aid not only among recipients, but also between military aid and economic aid, with a renewed emphasis on economic aid, since that will pay the biggest dividends in the long run. In doing so, particularly in the economic aid that we provide Eastern Europe, I would support aid aimed at long-term substantial development help, which builds infrastructures, which emphasizes the growth of free market institutions, and which helps to get U.S. business into joint ventures and partnerships with Eastern European entrepreneurs so that the American private sector can roll up its sleeves and be involved early. Our aid should avoid flashy projects and short-term glitz, which would quickly be wasted. The emphasis should be on less glamorous infrastructure development yet tailored to provide wide opportunity for the participation of all sectors of Eastern European populations in free market enterprises. Let us provide momentum for economic opportunity and pluralism, and break the long stagnation of failed socialistic, burdensome, command economic methods.

Fifth, there are apparently substantial backlogs of U.S. aid in the pipelines of some recipients. These ought to be carefully examined. I think we ought to free up those backlogs and put that money on the table as well.

Mr. President, the landscape of Europe is changing, and America can rightfully participate in the opportunities and fruits of that emerging landscape. Having held the course for Western values in Europe for over four decades, as the leader of the West, America can and should continue to participate in the evolution of the European continent. Many fear the resurgence of nationalism in Europe, nationalism which brought two devastating wars in this century. The strongest bulwark against such dangers is cooperation with our allies in building transnational institutions. We should continue to support the pan-European movement, free trans-European markets in goods and services, and promote an extension of those transnational institutions into Eastern Europe.

Europe is asking us to be a general partner in the future of its continent, and we ought to accept the invitation. In this light, we ought to nurture the development of the new Eastern European development bank, which is an ambitious undertaking for regional assistance. We need to help Eastern Europe, but America should not have to do it alone. We have healthy, close allies in Western Europe with which to work together. I hope that we will do everything possible to foster the multinational institutions needed to create economic momentum throughout the States of Eastern Europe, and to influence the characteristics of those multinational institutions firmly in the direction of free market enterprises.

The leadership of the Foreign Relations Committee, under the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PELL] and the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. BIDEN] has put forth a proposal to provide new assistance to the countries of Eastern Europe. They are to be congratulated for this initiative; it is a contribution to the debate. Any such proposal can be criticized for emphasizing some tools for assistance over others, but no one can deny that new assistance is needed now in those nations. No proposal can be perfect, but all proposals should be viewed positively. Certainly the administration should have some flexibility to respond to events as they unfold, but the emphasis should be on the development of strong democratic institutions, market economies, links to the West of all kinds, and prosperous stable growth.

So, Mr. President, as the second session of this 101st Congress begins, new challenges confront us. The debate has already begun. With hard work, we ought to be able to make the tough reallocation decisions. I hope the administration is ready to consult closely with us to reorder our priorities to take maximum advantage of the opportunities available.

I again congratulate Mr. DOLE and Mr. LEAHY and others who have initiated a debate that has long been needed.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I salute the Senator from West Virginia for his outstanding comments as always.

(The remarks of Mr. RIEGLE pertaining to the introduction of Senate Joint Resolution 251 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I note the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONGRESSMEN PENNY AND WEBER: RISING STARS

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise with great pride to draw attention to the cover article in this week's National Journal, entitled "Congress' Rising Stars." Among the 11 Members of Congress selected as rising stars by the Journal are 2 Minnesotans: VIN WEBER and TIM PENNY.

I know both men and consider them not only very good friends, but extremely good legislators who represent their constituents and the Nation very well. Thus, in many respects, the article tells us what Minnesotans already know. It is no mistake that of the 11 Members profiled as "Rising Stars" of the 535 Members of Congress, 2 were Minnesotans. Nor is it unusual that they are of different parties. Minnesota has a tradition of good, innovative, and responsible government. VIN WEBER and TIM PENNY are just the most recent such leaders. And we are very proud of their accomplishments and leadership.

VIN WEBER, as secretary of the Republican Conference, is the fifth-ranking Member of the House Republican leadership. In his fifth term representing southwestern Minnesota, VIN is a respected Republican strategist working behind the scenes to solve problems and mediate disputes. He has a vision of what the country can and should be and works very hard pushing the Congress toward that vision, but he does so in a pragmatic and innovative way earning the deserved accolades from both sides of the aisle. In this respect he is indeed a rising star.

Although TIM PENNY sits across the aisle, we have joined together in many efforts because of our similar views of the Nation's problems and ways to solve them. Most recently he chaired Americans for Generational Equity with me. As the profile indicates, he keeps a close eye on the Federal deficit because he knows the threat it poses to the future. Serving southeastern Minnesota, TIM combines fiscal toughness with social compassion and therefore sits on the cutting edge of Democratic thinking. I agree he is a star rising in Congress.

I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I referred be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WEBER: POLICY MAVEN

(By Christopher Madison)

The hottest Republican property on Capitol Hill in 1989 was Newt Gingrich, the brash Georgian who helped topple House Speaker Jim Wright, D-Texas, and got himself elected minority whip by narrowly defeating the favored veteran and moderate, Edward R. Madigan of Illinois.

But as House Republicans gear up for the 1990 and 1992 elections with modest expectations that they will reverse their fortunes of the past decade by picking up seats, the focus may turn to a quieter presence: Minnesota's Vin Weber.

Weber, first elected to the House in 1980 at the age of 28, is the fifth-ranking member of the House Republican leadership as secretary of the Republican Conference. But many Republicans and even some Democrats suggest that he may be a good deal more important than that, especially where the House GOP's future is concerned.

If Gingrich slips, some congressional handicappers say, Weber even stands a chance to succeed Minority Leader Robert H. Michel of Illinois when Michel decides to retire. At the moment, that is a long shot. Gingrich, in his first year in the leadership, has won high marks and surprised some skeptics.

Nevertheless, Weber is a popular figure in the House among members of both parties, and his influence only stands to increase.

For Republicans, gaining influence in the House is no easy matter, and Weber has chosen an appropriately quirky path. He is not a legislative tactician. Although he is a member of the Appropriations Committee, he considers that post chiefly a means of serving his district.

"You get taught early on that there are these little pigeonholes that you have to fit into. . . . I really have resisted that, and taken a holistic approach to the job. . . . I want to impact on legislation, but I'm not a policy wonk."

Instead, Weber is a behind-the-scenes problem solver. Late last year, for example, he mediated a dispute between Housing and Urban Development Secretary Jack F. Kemp and Appropriations Committee members Bob Traxler, D-Mich., and Bill Green, R-N.Y., over some important details in the spending bill for Kemp's department. Because he knew all the parties involved, Weber was able to arrange a compromise before the issue came to a floor fight. "They all trusted me," he said.

"He's one of the better policy guys in the House, and he also has good political skills," said Daniel P. Meyer, a former Weber aide who now works for Gingrich. "If he weren't in Congress, he could make lots of money as a political consultant."

Weber managed Gingrich's whip campaign last year—in fact, some House observers give him the lion's share of credit for the victory. And when he was only 26, he managed Sen. Rudy Boschwitz's 1978 Minnesota Senate campaign.

"There is a part of me that I learned from Jack Kemp, which is that ideas rule the world, and the party of ideas is the party that's going to dominate," Weber said. "I also think we need leadership that thinks seriously about political strategy and tries to help other Members with that."

To that end, Weber is serving, along with Rep. William M. Thomas of California, as co-chairman of a task force on Republican redistricting efforts.

Weber's relationship to Gingrich may be one of the more complex aspects of his political character. There is much that binds the two together. They are joint founders of the Conservative Opportunity Society, the conservative caucus that blossomed during the Reagan years as a means of challenging both the Democratic and Republican establishments in the House. And, after Gingrich's election as whip, Weber helped to redesign the whip structure over which Gingrich now presides.

So it's no surprise that the two men are viewed as close. "They believe the same things," someone who knows both said. At the same time, another source said, Weber keeps a slight distance from Gingrich because "he does not want to be tied to everything Newt does."

Though some Democrats still bristle at Gingrich's style and methods, they find Weber easier to work with. In fact, because they view him as a likable conservative, some Democrats (as well as Gingrich himself) have begun referring to Weber as "the new Cheney," a reference to the Wyoming Republican who resigned as House whip last year to become Defense Secretary. A Democratic staffer said of Weber: "He's very clever, very formidable, just as cunning and cutthroat as Gingrich. But he's much more likable and reasonable."

"He's a hard worker and an easy guy to work with," said Rep. Mel Levine, D-Calif., who has teamed with Weber on U.S. aid to Israel.

Weber, in an interview, said: "Obviously, the most important thing to effectiveness in the House of Representatives is your personal relationships with your colleagues. There are 435 big egos in the House, and you don't want to come across as arrogant. You want a certain amount of genuine affection from your colleagues. On the other hand, they have to know that there's a certain toughness to you."

Weber said he has become more restrained in his criticism of other Members. "Back in 1984, when we formed the Conservative Opportunity Society, we engaged in quite a few tough attacks on our Democratic friends, and I did a little bit of that myself," he said. "A year later, you realize you're still working with those same people long after the issue of the moment has faded. I learned through that process not that you back down, and not that you aren't willing to occasionally play some hardball politics, but that your long-term relationships with people around here are really the key to your success."

PENNY: BUDGET SCOLD

(By Christopher Madison)

When it comes to the issue of budget deficits, Rep. Timothy J. Penny, D-Minn., is in no danger of winning any popularity contests. Many fellow Democrats consider him to be a bit of a scold on the issue, if not a pain in the neck.

But Penny believes that nagging the leadership is one way to have an impact in the House.

"You have to be persistent, you have to remain visible," he said in an interview. "In a sense, you have to stay in their face. The most important thing is to be your own person, because it is easy in Congress to be driven by somebody else's agenda."

But can an outsider be effective in an institution that seems to reward those who play by the rules? Yes, if your definition of effective is something short of winning outright—such as keeping your issue on the agenda.

Penny has done that, and he also hints that he's edging closer to the inside of the Democratic tent. "The new crop of [House] leadership makes the legislative process a bit different than it was for a number of years around here," he said, "and I fit into this new leadership style much better."

But Penny remains a man with a mission. "My fundamental goal is to give the Democratic Party a better image on budget issues," he said. "It was the most important issue to me and remains the most important issue to me—not only reducing the deficit, but setting the right kind of priorities within that budget."

Like most crusaders, Penny, who is 38, is single-minded about his cause. He campaigned on the budget issue when he first ran for the House in 1982, and he helped found a budget task force for members of his freshman class. The task force survives as the Democratic Budget Group, which meets weekly to hear speakers on budget issues and tries to educate Members on those issues.

"We had hoped from the beginning that once [Members] know the facts, once they hear an objective analysis of these issues, they'll come to similar conclusions," Penny said.

So far, Penny has chosen the House floor for his activist assault on the budget, focusing largely on efforts to amend annual appropriations and supplemental spending bills.

In 1987, he and Rep. Thomas J. Tauke, R-Iowa, formalized the process through their Truth in Budgeting Task Force, a vehicle for proposing percentage reductions in every appropriations bill that came to the floor.

They won a few, but lost more. Even so, Penny said, "It makes everybody a little leery of coming forward with appropriations bills that are above the budget in the future."

But if the budget deficit is his overriding concern, why not try for a seat on the Budget Committee? "I'm content with my committee assignments," Penny said. His membership on the Agriculture Committee is important to his district, and on Veterans' Affairs, he is the chairman of the Education, Training and Enforcement Subcommittee, a post he doesn't want to give up. Besides, he added, "I don't know that I would achieve as much by being on the Budget Committee. Frankly, I've got more freedom to agitate by being on the outside."

Agitate, perhaps, but House budgeters don't yet consider Penny a player. That's partly because he is too much of a budget "hawk" for mainstream Democrats, but also, some say, because it took him a few years to get the budget process down, and he didn't always know what he was talking about.

There also is the matter of partisanship. Conservative Democrats who vote with Republicans—as Penny has done from time to time—are not popular in the Democratic Caucus, especially when they are as vocal as Penny is. And some Democrats complain that his tone suggests that he knows better than most where the House should go.

Penny acknowledged that "there are a lot of rewards that come your way if you play the game. . . . But, personally, I don't believe those rewards are as important as balancing the budget. We were elected to deal with the big issues."

At the same time, Penny said, he has become more cooperative under the new team of House leaders. He is, for example, close to Democratic Whip William H. Gray III of Pennsylvania and serves as an at-large assistant whip.

That role came into play last summer. As a Democrat who supported President Bush early in the fight over minimum-wage legislation, Penny signaled to the White House that he was going back to the Democratic fold and helped round up other Democratic rebels in the process. The Bush Administration quickly cut a compromise deal. He and other Democrats, Penny said, "didn't want to be put through the wringer again on essentially the same vote as occurred six months earlier." And he also felt, he said, that House Democratic leaders were listening to him for a change. "There was more trust that they had made the effort, that they tried to accommodate our concerns," he said.

That was not alway true, he added. "For the first several years I was here, almost every time that a deal was cut between the more-conservative Democrats and the leadership, we were rolled," he said. "There has to be a level of honesty and trust that runs both ways, and that exists now. Consequently, I think there's a possibility I may become less of a pain."

U.S. FOREIGN AID AND POPE'S TRIP TO AFRICA

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, Pope John Paul's recently completed tour of several west African nations draws our attention to a region of the world that is often forgotten and certainly little noticed. A primary message expressed by the Pope before and during his travels is that the wealthy countries of the North "cannot abandon their common responsibility for the South, for the problems of the Third World."

This is an important message for us in the United States to consider, especially at a time when we face increasing pressure to reassess our foreign assistance program and to provide greater aid to newly emerging democracies around the world. Senator DOLE recently highlighted this issue when he called for the United States to reconsider its foreign aid programs, in an effort to support the East European and Latin American democracies.

As I stated last year during the foreign assistance appropriations debate, "as we witness remarkable changes taking place throughout the world, I believe that the time is ripe for us to reconsider the objectives and goals of U.S. foreign assistance."

Furthermore, it is important to recognize that in the past, much of our aid has been related in some way to the East-West struggle—the political, military, ideological, and philosophical conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union. But that justification is no longer as certain or valid as it once was.

Senator DOLE, to his credit, has prominently initiated an important debate. In my opinion, however, it is essential that we take heed of the Pope's admonition to assist the lesser known countries of the Third World. Without question, it is important philosophically and diplomatically for us to assist in the promotion of democracy, establishment of democratic freedoms and institutions, and creation of free and open markets. We must also recognize, however, that there are many countries throughout the Third World that, although they may not make the headlines, they do require and warrant U.S. financial assistance.

The Pope toured several of the same countries in west Africa that I visited last summer. Many of the countries in Africa and Asia to which I traveled are among the most destitute and impoverished lands in the world, where profound deprivation persists unabated. I believe strongly that even small amounts of U.S. foreign assistance to these countries can make an enormous difference.

When a country basically has nothing, the smallest amounts of assistance, while maybe not solving their long-term problems, can certainly alleviate much of the human suffering and misery that I witnessed last summer, and the Pope has reminded us of this week.

Even in a period of budget constraints, I believe it is possible to restructure the U.S. aid program in such a way as to provide meaningful support to a larger number of countries than we currently do. There will be considerable debate about cuts in foreign aid to various countries. But it is clear to this Senator that we in this country have both an obligation and the resources to provide more assistance to more countries around the world that have desperate needs for food, health care, and economic development. I think the Pope's recent trip reminds us that in an era of bold new realities in the international arena, we should not ignore our obligation to do what we can to alleviate suffering and deprivation in some of the world's most impoverished countries.

TERRY ANDERSON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to inform my colleagues that today marks the 1,789th day that Terry Anderson has been held in captivity in Beirut.

THE UNITED STATES, PANAMA, AND THE NICARAGUA ELECTIONS

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, Elizabeth Dore, an assistant professor of Latin American history at Middlebury College, recently visited Nicaragua to observe the preparations for the February 25 elections there. She was in Nicaragua shortly after the United States invasion of Panama, and she noticed an unintended side effect of the United States action—it caused an upsurge of anti-Americanism and support for the Sandinistas, and undermined the campaign of UNO candidate Violeta Chamorro. According to Professor Dore, an increasing number of Nicaraguan voters are critical of UNO and its close association with the United States. For many Nicaraguans, the United States intervention in nearby Panama makes the possibility of another United States invasion of their country all the more real.

Mr. President, Professor Dore makes several very valid points which I would like to share with other Senators. I ask unanimous consent that her January 30 op-ed piece in the New York Times be printed in the RECORD in full.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 30, 1990]

PANAMA, KEY TO ORTEGA'S CAMPAIGN

(By Elizabeth Dore)

MIDDLEBURY, VT.—The U.S. Invasion of Panama produced an unintended side-effect:

It turned the Feb. 25 elections in Nicaragua into a referendum on whether the U.S. will once again dominate the country. Ironically, at a time when George Bush least wanted to help the Sandinistas, he may have decisively strengthened President Daniel Ortega Saavedra's hand.

In January, I was in Nicaragua as a member of a delegation organized by Hemisphere Initiatives, a nonpartisan group created to observe the coming elections I saw that the U.S. invasion of Panama had increased support for the Sandinistas and undermined their strongest rival, the National Opposition Union, a tenuous coalition of 14 parties laboriously forged by the U.S. Embassy and funded by Congress.

Several months ago, two issues promised to dominate the campaign: the economy and national sovereignty. The Sandinistas say that the economic crisis devastating their country is caused by the U.S. attempt to overthrow them; they remind voters that, over the past five years, their Government had to spend more than 60 percent of its budget to defend the country against the contras. In addition, the U.S. commercial and financial blockade of Nicaragua impeded reconstruction.

Most Nicaraguans accept these explanations and hold the U.S. responsible for their poverty. Still, the standard of living has plummeted and people are impatient with the hardships of daily life. The opposition parties try to fan and focus this discontent, accusing the Sandinistas of incompetence and blaming them for the economic crisis. So far, they have had limited success. Election polls—now all the rage in Nicaragua—indicate that less than 20 percent of the voters think the economy is the major problem facing the next president.

Instead, they think that national sovereignty is paramount and, on this issue, most voters believe that the Sandinistas' record is impeccable. In the wake of the invasion of Panama, January polls indicated that a growing number of voters were critical of the opposition coalition for its association with the U.S.; almost two-thirds of the electorate believes that the sending of U.S. troops to Panama and the removal of Gen. Manuel Antonio Noriega was "bad" or "very bad."

The invasion provoked major pronouncements by all of the presidential candidates. President Ortega unequivocally denounced the invasion and declared a state of alert. On Jan. 7, as a somber interlude to a large festive campaign rally, he delievered a foreign policy address analyzing events in Panama. Careful not to express support for General Noriega, Mr. Ortega concentrated on reaffirming the principle of nonintervention.

He said that the Panamanians should have been left alone to resolve their own problems. Recalling numerous U.S. invasions and occupations of Central America and the Caribbean, Mr. Ortega declared that the invasion demonstrated that U.S. policy had not changed. To cheering crowds, he spoke of the valiant and successful resistance led by Augusto Cesar Sandino to the series of U.S. military occupations of Nicaragua from 1911 to 1933, and pledged that, if necessary, Nicaraguans will take up arms against another U.S. invasion.

In contrast, Violeta Barrios de Chamorro, the opposition's presidential candidate, equivocated. Her statement both supported her U.S. backers and offered a gesture to nationalism—a dangerous political maneuver.

Mrs. Chamorro said that "events in Panama, although very painful, should be evaluated in the context of the all-out war that is being waged by the civilized world against the drug trafficking empire that had seized control of Panama." Although "lamenting the North American military action in Panama that violated the principle of nonintervention," she was "reassured that the representative Government of President Endara [in Panama] has assumed power." In the U.S., this statement may seem reasonable. In Nicaragua, it was interpreted as waffling and it may cost her the election.

As seen through the eyes of Nicaraguans, the U.S. military intervention in Panama makes the possibility of another U.S. invasion of their country frighteningly real. In light of the history of Nicaragua in this century, this cannot be dismissed as paranoia.

After President José Santos Zelaya refused to give the U.S. complete sovereignty over a proposed canal zone, the U.S. orchestrated a coup that ousted him in 1909. Unable to govern without a U.S. presence, his successor invited in the Marines. From then until 1979, when the Sandinistas overthrew Anastasio Somoza Debayle, no president ruled without the express support of Washington.

In blatant violation of international law, the U.S. overthrew General Noriega. With equal disregard for law and world opinion, U.S. troops invaded the residence of the Nicaraguan Ambassador in Panama. Both of these acts greatly magnified tensions in Nicaragua. People had believed that the political struggle in their country had shifted from the battlefield to the ballot box.

Now, with the U.S. occupation of Panama, many Nicaraguans fear that their hopes for peace are unfounded. The invasion of Panama jeopardizes the demilitarization of Nicaragua—and it may well hand a stunning electoral victory to the Sandinistas, and secure the presidency for Daniel Ortega until 1996.

JOHN HARTY, JR.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, I would like to take a moment to note the death of John Harty, Jr., recently killed in a plane crash while on a mission for the Food and Drug Administration, and to remind our colleagues of the important work carried out by the FDA.

John Harty, a constituent of mine from Silver Spring, was employed by the FDA for over 25 years and until his death headed the Agency's international affairs staff. He died earlier this month while in Chile on an important mission for the Government.

This was Mr. Harty's second visit to Chile in less than 1 year. In 1989, he served as the principal liaison with Chilean Government officials at the height of the public crisis involving contaminated fruit, and his involvement was pivotal to the successful management of this frightening incident. After the crisis was contained, Mr. Harty played a key role in negotiating a working agreement between the two governments aimed at ensuring the future safety of Chilean-produced fruit products exported to the United States.

His return trip to Chile this month included an inspection of security measures in cultivation areas and processing centers. Joined by an FDA investigator and two Chilean officials, Mr. Harty was en route to Santiago when the plane they were traveling on crashed, killing all four men and the pilot.

I know that our colleagues join me in extending our sympathy to the families of the victims.

I also want to commend the Chilean Government, the Chilean Ambassador, Mr. Errazuriz, and United States Ambassador Gillespie for their extraordinary efforts to return the victims' bodies to their families and for their thoughtful assistance to Mrs. Harty.

LITERACY ACT AND EDUCATION EXCELLENCE ACT

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, I rise in support of the two bills under consideration this week, S. 1310, the National Literacy Act, and S. 695, the Excellence in Education Act.

As we enter the 21st century, we face serious challenges in our education system. America's economic growth and social progress depend on high quality education.

As you know, many studies have been conducted, reports issued, and proposals made on how to improve our school systems. But, one thing we can agree on is that, we need national goals for educating our kids and we have to stick to them.

We need a national agenda for education to promote high standards in education. We need to expand our ideas for innovative and effective teaching by supporting the best and brightest in our education system. We need to increase our expectations, of schools, of students, and parents.

Mr. President, we need to highlight the positive and drive the mediocre out of the system and I believe that the Excellence in Education Act will do just that.

S. 695 will promote excellence in American education by recognizing and rewarding schools, teachers, and students for outstanding achievement. This bill will also encourage school systems to establish alternative certification plans for teachers and school principals.

I especially like the alternative certification proposals. Mr. President, as a U.S. Senator, I would not be able to teach American history in a high school in some States. In fact, the astronaut, Dr. Sally Ride, would not be qualified to teach physics in most junior high schools in this country. Alternative certification is a logical step to increase the number of qualified teachers in our school systems for specialized subjects, such as math and science.

Mr. President, the Excellence in Education Act is a bipartisan effort to invest in our future. We must do all we can to make sure that only our best efforts in education will be acceptable. Our kid's futures, and America's future, depend on it.

Second, I'd like to address the National Literacy Act because I think it is very important.

The act will be the framework for our country's future. There are at least 30 million adult Americans who cannot read. Not only is that a tragedy for them, but it is a productivity issue. We cannot afford 30 million people who are not ready and fit for duty for the 21st century. This bill provides the opportunity to mobilize primarily voluntary organizations in this important battle against illiteracy.

What I like about the act is that it mobilizes student volunteers and volunteer organizations such as Vista to do the work of teaching people to read. The bill does not call for a heck of a lot more money, but it says, we'll use our money smarter to help our people become better.

Mr. President, America's progress in academic, social, and economic development in the 21st century will depend on eliminating adult illiteracy, and on raising standards for educational achievement in our Nation's schools. The National Literacy Act, and the Excellence in Education Act are our best opportunity to make sure that our education system is America's strengths and not our weakness.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order, the time for morning business has expired.

EDUCATIONAL EXCELLENCE ACT OF 1989

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume consideration of the pending business, Calendar Order No. 250, S. 695, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 695) to promote excellence in American education by recognizing and rewarding schools, teachers, and students for their outstanding achievements, enhancing parental choice, encouraging the study of science, mathematics, and engineering, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this bill there are certain amendments which are enumerated and which appear on page 2 in the Calendar of Business.

There is a time limitation on each of those amendments. There is no limitation for debate on the bill.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, may I request of the Chair as to what the time limits are on the pending legislation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time limits are as set forth on page 2 of the Calendar of Business. On an amendment by Mr. WILSON relating to Dollars for Dare, 40 minutes equally divided and controlled; an amendment by Mr. WILSON relating to the "Healthy Start," 2 hours equally divided and controlled; an amendment by Mr. HELMS relating to title X, 90 minutes equally divided; a possible second-degree amendment to the Helms amendment relating to the same subject to be offered by Senator PELL or his designee, under which there will be 1 hour equally divided. There is no time limit on the bill itself or on the committee substitute.

Mr. DODD. I thank the Chair for that information.

I understand my colleague from California will now proceed to the Dare amendment, is that correct?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California [Mr. WILSON].

AMENDMENT NO. 1244

(Purpose: To establish a Drug Abuse Resistance Education program)

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. COATS, Mr. GRAHAM of Florida, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. REID, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. WIRTH, Mr. MCCONNELL and Mr. BAUCUS, I offer an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California [Mr. WILSON], for himself, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. COATS, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. REID, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. WIRTH, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. MCCONNELL, and Mr. BAUCUS proposes an amendment numbered 1244.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill insert the following new section:

SEC. . (a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of Education is authorized to award grants to local educational agencies in consortium with entities which have experience in assisting school districts to provide instruction to students grades kindergarten through six to recognize and resist pressures that influence such students to use controlled substances, as defined in schedules I and II of section 202 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 812), the possession or distribution of which is unlawful under such Act, or beverage alcohol, such as Project Drug Abuse Resistance Education, that meet the requirements of subsection (b).

(b) REQUIREMENTS.—A local education agency in consortium with an entity shall not be eligible for a grant under subsection (a) unless such local education agency in consortium with an entity will use assistance provided under such grant to provide or arrange for the provisions of services that shall include—

(1) drug abuse resistance education instruction for students grades kindergarten through six to recognize and resist pressures to experiment that influence such children to use controlled substances, as defined under subsection (a), or beverage alcohol, including instruction in the following areas—

(A) drug use and misuse;

(B) resistance techniques;

(C) assertive response styles;

(D) managing stress without taking drugs;

(E) decisionmaking and risk taking;

(F) media influences on drug use;

(G) positive alternatives to drug abuse behavior;

(H) interpersonal and communication skills;

(I) self-esteem building activities; and

(J) resistance to gang pressure;

(2) classroom instruction by uniformed law enforcement officials;

(3) the use of positive student leaders to influence younger students not to use drugs; and

(4) an emphasis on activity-oriented techniques designed to encourage student-generated responses to problem-solving situations; and

(c) APPLICATION.—The Secretary shall not make a grant under subsection (a) unless—

(1) an application for the grant is submitted to the Secretary;

(2) with respect to carrying out the purpose for which the grant is to be made, the application provides assurances of compliance satisfactory to the Secretary;

(3) the application otherwise is in such form, agreements, assurances, and information as the Secretary determines to be necessary to carry out this section; and

(4) the application contains an assurance that the applicant will provide funds, either in cash or in kind that are not less than 10 percent of the amount of the grant under subsection (a);

(d) SUPPLEMENTAL FUNDS.—Amounts received under subsection (a) by the entity shall be used only to supplement, not to supplant, the amount of Federal, State, and local funds expended for the support of projects of the type described in subsection (b); and

(e) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out this section, $10,000,000 in fiscal year 1990, and such sums as may be necessary for each of the 3 succeeding fiscal years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair inquires, Is this the so-called DARE amendment?

Mr. WILSON. It is, Mr. President. It is my understanding that it is acceptable to both sides.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a time limitation of 40 minutes to be equally divided. Who yields time?

Mr. DODD. I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I want to commend our colleagues from California for this amendment.

The DARE Program is a very well-established drug education program. I can speak from firsthand knowledge. In my own State of Connecticut we have a very successful DARE Program in some of our major cities. The police officers are trained to go to elementary schools and work with children as early as kindergarten through sixth grade. It has been very, very effective in drug education programs.

The program was included for funding under the omnibus drug bill. Regrettably, through some sort of a procedural glitch, to use a colloquial expression, I understand that program was dropped in the conference, through no intention to the conferees, and the intention of our colleague from California is to see that that program gets funded and, therefore, be included as part of this legislation.

We are prepared to accept the amendment. It is an excellent program, one that has worked extremely well across the country and is very effective in providing significant education programs for some of our youngest children. We have all painfully come to accept drug education programs, even at those early ages.

So I commend my colleague for the introduction of the amendment. I am glad to accept it. As I understand, I am speaking as well for the minority on acceptance of this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I thank my friend from Connecticut for his very generous comments. The legislation is acceptable to our side. I will simply say he is correct in his observation that the Senate has already acted upon this legislation. We did approve it as part of S. 1711. Unfortunately S. 1711 does not appear to be moving in the other House. But I think his comments are well taken.

This has been given extensive acceptance. It seems to offer one of the most promising overall drug education programs. I thank him and I see no necessity for a rollcall vote, it being accepted on both sides, and therefore see no necessity for extensive debate.

Mr. COATS. Mr. President, I want to thank my distinguished colleague from California [Mr. WILSON] for his leadership in promoting the DARE Program. DARE [Drug Abuse Resistance Education] began with the Los Angeles Police Department and the Los Angeles Unified School District to prevent drug abuse in school-age youth.

We all agree that the war on drugs cannot be won solely on the streets. I have actively supported almost every proposal to help win this fight. I favor decertification of countries that allow drugs to be exported into this Nation without attempts to shut down that drug trade. I support additional funding for the DEA, the FBI, local law enforcement, and others in the front lines of this war. I have supported more funds for prisons, for prosecutors and judges, and for treatment.

I am also a strong believer in drug testing. The Tippecanoe County School District in Indiana has implemented an effective drug testing program for student athletes that is the national model. Since its implementation, neither McCutcheon nor Harrison High School has had a single drug test failure.

But when all is said and done, ultimately this war will be won or lost in the hearts of individuals. Our best long-term hope is to reach the next generation of young people with the message that drugs are wrong. To teach them that actions have consequences. To teach them problem-solving techniques so that when faced with tough decisions they are not unprepared.

Howard County, IN, of which Kokomo is the county seat, and Allen County, IN, of which Fort Wayne is the county seat, both have featured the DARE Program based upon the Los Angeles model.

Let me cite a few examples from the Howard County manual which is taken directly from the Los Angeles model. In the section on risks and results, a brief story sets up the situation. One example is a new girl in the neighborhood, with no friends, being asked to bring some of her father's beer to a party. Then the class is asked to discuss the following questions:

First, what is the risk?

Second, what are the possible choices?

Third, what might happen if she takes her father's beer to the party?

Fourth, what might happen if she refuses?

Fifth, what else can she do?

Sixth, what should she decide?

Seventh, is the risk worth taking? Why or why not?

I believe that it is important for a program to go beyond just lecturing about the basic facts of drug abuse. DARE stresses from the beginning the importance of the right to say no, the right to be safe, the right to be respected as a person. DARE includes warnings about drug abuse and effective strategies to say no.

But DARE also begins to get to the tough questions behind drug abuse. Peer pressure, lack of self-esteem, understanding personal stresses, and avoiding advertising manipulation are but a few key questions addressed.

There are many good drug education programs in the schools. But I strongly admire DARE for several additional reasons. It stresses not only both the dangers of drug abuse and the importance of developing self-esteem but does so in a directed manner.

With young children, I believe it is essential to provide direction when they are presented with difficult situations like the new student with no friends to whom I just referred. Young children need to go through the decisionmaking process—an adult will not always be standing there to tell them what decision to make—but they also do not necessarily have the experience or knowledge to make intelligent choices at that age. So when situations are discussed, directed discussion and conclusions are still necessary. For example, a police officer leading a discussion on whether a student should sneak their dad's beer to a party is unlikely to conclude that such a move is a wise one.

Which raises a second point. I think it is healthy to promote the interaction of education and law enforcement. It is important for those in school to understand that the police department is not the enemy—desiring just to lock them up. It is important for the police department to be committed to prevention and to reaching young people in a positive way. It also sends a message: a police officer may only discuss positive approaches and still, more subtly than others could, communicate that drug abuse also has legal consequences.

So, again, I praise Senator WILSON for leading this effort to promote the DARE Program. I am pleased to join with him as an original cosponsor of this amendment, as well as his original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. WILSON. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DODD. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All time has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California.

The amendment (No. 1244) was agreed to.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 1245

(Purpose: To establish a Healthy Start Demonstration Grant program)

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] proposes an amendment numbered 1245.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill insert the following:

SEC. . HEALTHY START DEMONSTRATION PROGRAM.

(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) The Secretary is authorized to pay the Federal share of the costs of making demonstration grants to local educational agencies to assist local educational agencies in coordinating support services to children and youth.

(2)(A) The Federal share shall be 80 percent.

(B) The non-Federal share of the costs of the demonstration grant under this subsection shall be supplied from sources other than the Federal Government.

(C) The non-Federal share of payments under this Act may be in cash or in kind fairly evaluated, including planned equipment or services.

(b) REQUIREMENT.—A local educational agency shall not be eligible for a grant under subsection (a) unless such local educational agency is eligible to receive financial assistance under chapter 1 of title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

(c) COUNCIL.—(1) Each local educational agency desiring a grant under subsection (a) shall, in conjunction with other local social service and law enforcement providers, establish a local service delivery coordination council which consists of not more than 20 members, including—

(A) the chairman of the county board of supervisors or his designee;

(B) the county superintendent of schools;

(C) a representative of school principals;

(D) a representative of teachers;

(E) a representative of parents;

(F) a representative of students;

(G) a representative of child protection and welfare agencies;

(H) a representative of a public health agency;

(I) a child psychiatrist;

(J) a child development specialist;

(K) a drug and alcohol treatment specialist;

(L) a mental health services specialist;

(M) a representative of a public safety and justice agency;

(N) the district attorney for the area served by the local educational area;

(O) a representative of community based organizations with experience in child development and service delivery;

(P) a public housing official;

(Q) a representative of the local school board;

(R) a representative of the private sector; and

(S) a representative of any other appropriate human support services agencies.

(2) Each local service delivery coordination council established pursuant to paragraph (1) shall develop a coordinated service delivery plan which includes the establishment of—

(A) formal channels of communication between public agencies and organizations responsible for service delivery to children and youth;

(B) cooperative service delivery agreements between public agencies and organizations responsible for children and youth services; and

(C) procedures to better coordinate interagency budgeting and planning for children and youth services.

(d) REPORTS.—(1) Each local education agency which received a grant under subsection (a) shall submit a report to the Secretary which includes—

(A) a description of the local coordinated service delivery plan;

(B) a timetable for implementation of the coordinated service delivery plan;

(C) the identification of any Federal, State, or local regulations which impede coordinated service delivery to children and youth;

(D) recommendations for administrative or legislative action to provide for greater coordination of service delivery to children and youth;

(E) an accounting of local budget savings, if any, resulting from the implementation of the coordinated service delivery plan; and

(F) any other information the local education agency may deem appropriate.

(2) The Secretary shall annually prepare and submit a report to the Congress on the success of the demonstration grants under this section.

(e) APPLICATION.—Each local educational agency desiring a grant under this subsection shall submit an application to the Secretary at such time, in such manner, and accompanied by such information as the Secretary may reasonably require.

(f) DEFINITIONS.—For the purposes of this section—

(1) the term "local educational agency" has the same meaning given such term in section 1471(12) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965; and

(2) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education.

(g) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated $10,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1991, 1992, and 1993.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a 2-hour time limitation on this amendment to be equally divided.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How much time does the Senator wish to allow himself?

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I ask that I be extended as much of that hour as I shall need.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California is recognized for whatever time he requires out of this 1 hour which he controls.

Mr. WILSON. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, we are a Nation who traditionally has looked to the family and to the home for the kind of social guidance that would prepare children for life, for productive adulthood and for their responsibilities as citizens.

Suffice it to say that while we continue in that tradition, that happy tradition no longer conforms with reality in all too many cases. We are in a time of broken homes. We are in a time of alcohol abuse, drug use by parents. We are in a time of child abuse. We are in a time of neglect. We are in a time when even well-meaning parents in many cases are simply incapable of exercising the kind of supervision, giving the kind of guidance to their children that we have accepted as the norm throughout the tradition of this Nation.

That is in part because in many instances the parents themselves are children. In many instances we have teenage mothers. They are the single heads of household. They are themselves incapable of giving direction, having had little in their own lives. In many instances they are incapable even of looking to the basic health needs of their children, in many cases incapable of looking to even of their own.

The fact of the matter is we have coming to America's classrooms each day a distinct challenge to find teachers who are not police officers, or psychiatrists, or social workers, or the parents of the children that they teach. They are educators. Yet, they find themselves involuntarily increasingly cast into the role of being in loca parentis. They have to watch for children, children who may have simply a hearing problem, or a vision problem. And God help us, were it not for the school nurses, who deserve our thanks and blessing for having rescued any number of children from being thought and treated as though retarded when in fact they simply had a vision or hearing problem.

But even the little girl who comes from a loving family, who experiences perfect vision, perfect hearing may be incapable of learning if she suffers from depression. It is necessary that somehow we have the capability early on to detect that that little girl is laboring under a special burden, in order that early on we may get to her the kind of help necessary to relieve her of that burden so she can learn and can progress to maturity without the experience of all too many children who suffer one form of mental health problem or another, who go undetected, who find that they cannot learn, who in some cases become a disruptive influence in the classroom.

What of the little boy who suffers persistent mental child abuse? There may not be a mark upon his body but he may have been so damaged in self-esteem by a parent who is a hideous role model that the boy experiences no confidence in his ability to even try to learn for fear of failure and, therefore, he does not try and he may become a disruptive influence.

In any case, he or she may drop out.

What we are experiencing increasingly is a tragedy that is difficult for those of us from an earlier, simpler time to fully comprehend. But the facts are unavoidable. We have seen changed demographic trends in this Nation. We have seen a basic change in the home setting for all too many American children. And the impact that these changes have had upon these children in many instances is that they are simply falling through the cracks. They are going to classrooms sometimes; sometimes they are not. When they go, they go without having done their homework. In many cases they go unhealthy. In many cases they are neither healthy in mind nor body.

Some progress well into the elementary grades without ever having seen or having been seen by a pediatrician or by a dentist, much less by someone competent to administer mental health services to them.

In some urban areas between 40 to 60 percent of the children within certain ethnic groups are dropping out of school before graduating. That is just not fair to those kids nor is it fair to society. We cannot afford to waste their talent or their energy, and if they do not become productive adults we face almost the certainty in some communities that their energy will be misdirected into drug gangs, into lives of crime. These are, in many cases, the children who become teenage mothers; in many others they not only enter drug gangs but they are themselves drug users.

On the average, student achievement scores have risen only slightly in a number of school districts. In all too many they are falling tragically. In many it is almost impossible to get a meaningful statistic because of another meaningful statistic, and that is the school dropout rate which is wasting talent, wasting energy and creating almost immeasurable problems for the rest of society.

If we are going to succeed in reversing these alarming trends in this age of broken homes and alcohol abuse, drug use, child abuse, neglect, then we have simply got to see to it that the support and motivation that is so desperately needed by every child, that the basic health care that should be the expectation of every American child, is supplied if not by the family of the child, if for whatever reason the family is incapable, then it must be supplied from some source outside the home.

If those who are fine teachers in our classrooms are to be permitted to teach effectively in safe schools, drug and weapon-free schools, if they are not to spend their time in other roles, then it is essential that we bring to bear, bring to focus in an area where most of our children are spending at least half their waking hours, the kind of school-based or school-connected child development and child social services that are essential to give early warning, to give detection and, therefore, to give preventive care so that farther down the road we are not engaged in reacting to problems that we could have prevented, not compelled, as a result of our failure to engage in early prevention, in the kind of far more expensive, less cost-effective, less probable of success, and therefore infinitely less humane remedial action.

Why is it, Mr. President, that in a time when this body and when State legislatures and even local governments have noted the tragic occurrences that I have been talking about and sought to respond to those critical means to avoid them with a proliferation of programs, why is it that we seem to be experiencing an increase in these manifold problems that so trouble and so diminish the capacity of our children to face life with a decent break?

Let me just suggest to you that any number of people have had the experience of observing the failure of the system to provide help where it is required. Perhaps the story did not reach the east coast or the Midwest, but in California recently there was a news story, a pathetic news story, of a 15-year-old girl, a Vietnamese immigrant and a high school honor student, who was taken into custody when she gave birth to a 6-pound baby boy in a high school restroom toilet and the baby drowned. Suddenly, Mr. President, every child service and social service agency in her city and in her county were there to help after the fact, too late to help.

Now, in no way am I finger-pointing, in no way suggesting that any of these agencies, any of the professionals within them or that anyone on the staff at the girl's school was at fault in failing to avoid this tragedy. The fact is in the culture of this poor child—and that is what she was—it was a mark of shame to be pregnant out of wedlock. Well, that has been our own tradition as well, but in hers it was keenly felt so much so that she was successful in concealing her pregnant situation from virtually everyone even her fellow students.

What I am suggesting is not a fault on the part of those who were seeking to provide social services. What I am saying is that there is a clear need that we far better integrate the preventive delivery of social and child services so that her tragedy and others like it can be prevented, not mourned.

In my State, it is my intention to see to it that every county, through the chairman of the board of supervisors or his designee, will achieve this kind of integration of agencies, social and child services, with the schools as a focal part of preventive service delivery by seeing to it that we have in effect a school watch in which a concerned teacher can, at the very least, serve as an early warning system. Where it appears to a concerned teacher that there is reason to believe that a child's home environment is dangerous or destructive or destabilizing or, in short, promises a threat to the child warranting investigate and possible intervention, there must be a clearly understood protocol for involving prompt response by child protective services or other appropriate agencies. Where it appears to the school nurse that there is some physical problem or some mental problem that requires early mental health counseling to vulnerable young children, that must occur.

We must provide the kind of coordination of services that all too often simply does not occur; that all too often fails to occur with the result, Mr. President, that those who need services do not get them.

To get the little girl that I spoke of with depression, the little boy who has been the victim of mental child abuse, the kind of help they need requires that we make mental health counseling available to little children from the point of entry into the school system and consistently thereafter. Because that kind of early life counseling of very young and vulnerable children can detect serious problems inherent either in the child's personal chemistry or in his environment.

So how do we assure that these children can get the help they need when they need it, which is as early as possible? Well, there is, I repeat, a clear need to integrate the function of county and social service agencies with school-based health programs.

What we have been doing by contrast, I would suggest, Mr. President, is that we have somehow been compartmentalizing our children because we have been compartmentalizing those services which we presumably have devised and appropriated money for to address the needs of those children and yet the services are not reaching them. Too often what has seemed to have happened is that those social service agencies function almost in isolation and clearly without adequate communication with each other or without adequate communication with the schools, and that is, of course, where the children are. That is where those agencies should be looking.

So what we are doing is isolating these problems, treating them separately instead of looking at the child as a whole being. In my State alone there are over 160 children's programs administered by close to a dozen State agencies. Most are not engaged in the sort of preventive comprehensive approach to problem solving which offers the best hope of providing our children the assistance which they, in so many cases desperately need.

Let me introduce you to some grim statistics, after which I will introduce you to a case in point, we call him Ricardo. But first, what I am talking about is the need to integrate social services to better address and therefore to prevent these kinds of statistics. These relate to 1 day, Mr. President, 1 day in the life of America's children.

Mr. WILSON. Of the almost 17,000 women who become pregnant each day, over 2,700 of them are teenagers and of those teenage mothers, slightly over 1,100 have abortions. About 400 miscarry; about 1,300 actually give birth. And what becomes of these children to whom they give birth?

Well, of all the babies born in this country each day, 676 are born to women who have had inadequate or no prenatal care, and, therefore, not surprisingly, 700 babies are born at low birth weight. By low birth weight, I mean less than 5.8 ounces. One hundred twenty-five of these are born at very low birth weight. Less than 3 pounds, 5 ounces.

As you know, Mr. President, from your work in dealing with addicted newborns, those innocently afflicted with drug use through no fault of their own but through the use of their mothers during pregnancy, we have some born at a pound-and-a-half, at 2 pounds. But that by itself is a separate problem that we have and will again discuss.

Of these babies, 69 die before they have lived a month; 107 die before their first birthday.

This is America. In this Nation, this caring Nation—and I do not say that with any sarcasm, we are a generous people—there are 7,742 teenagers who become sexually active. Of that number, about 600-plus are getting syphilis and gonorrhea. About 1,400 each day are dropping out of high school. Almost 1,900 are being abused either physically or mentally or both. So it is not surprising that many run away, and the figure there is well over 3,000. Not surprisingly, almost 1,700 of them wind up, daily, in adult jails.

To this unahppy group of children, many other things happen. They become as I have said, teenage parents—2,407 children each day in the United States are born out of wedlock. Almost 3,000 experience divorce each day. Maybe there is some connection between that and the fact that 31,000 lose jobs, even as this economy is producing millions of new jobs as it has over the past decades.

Well, those are statistics of the whole, and, frankly, I think they are understated. But they are the best we can find.

But now let me talk about an individual as a case. We will call him Ricardo. This is from an article called "Failure by Fragmentation." The author is Sid Gardner. Mr. Gardner is concerned with children.

Ricardo has problems. His teacher knew he had the ability to be a B student or better but he had skipped classes 25 days last semester and when he came, he sat quietly and said little. His homework was handed in only about half the time, and his grades were far below what his intelligence test scores indicated that he could do. Ricardo's homeroom teacher asked the school's guidance counselor to talk to him.

After a few days, a slip came to Ricardo in first period, asking him to see the counselor. He never went, and the counselor had a caseload of 178 students and so, because he was so fully occupied with the ones who did come, the counselor never saw Ricardo.

The teacher also asked Ricardo if he wanted to attend an afterschool tutorial program. Ricardo said he did not have the time, and the teacher did not follow up on the suggestion.

Ricardo's mother was a welfare recipient and, therefore, his family was known to the welfare agency. His older brother had a cirminal record, and 4 years earlier, a juvenile justice program had targeted younger siblings of that older brother as the siblings of arrested minors. Therefore, Ricardo was also in the files of that criminal justice system, that juvenile justice program.

The program had been cut back, however, and no one had ever seen Ricardo to pursue the preventive goals of that juvenile program.

A United Way agency in Ricardo's neighborhood offered afterschool recreation programs. Ricardo had dropped in several times and the counselor there had entered his name in the records as a youth that he wanted to get to know, seeing his obvious intelligence and his somewhat disturbing quietness. But outreach was difficult for the agency. The counselor had not been able to do any home visits.

Ricardo had also worked at a summer job last year and, because of that, the local job training agency had his name in their records. They had in their records a rating of his performance at a downtown printing shop. He had really liked the job. He had worked hard at it. He enjoyed making money for the first time that was his own. He had actually attended some career orientation classes as part of his summer training but the agency had not yet worked out how it would get information about his summer job performance back to the high school so the high school was totally ignorant of any work history with respect to Ricardo. It was unknown to anyone in his school.

Ricardo also had a younger sister and she had been abused by their mother's boyfriend. One of her classmates complained anonymously about this abuse. But since no life-threatening circumstances existed, the overworked child protective service workers opened a file but it remained inactive. And it bothered Ricardo. He knew something was deeply troubling to his younger sister but he could do nothing about it.

I am not going to go on with this. "Failure by Fragmentation" is the name of the article. What Mr. Gardner is saying in this, which is one of many articles, is despite the good intentions of a generous Nation through those who care a great deal about children at the Federal level, at the State, and the local level, our children are the victims of the fragmentation of our good intentions. Those good intentions are not translating into real help for them. In too many instances the agencies we have devised to supply the services are failing to do so because, in fact, there is simply not the kind of coordination and integration that is required.

What better place to focus this attention, to bring together these agencies and the services that they are meant to provide with the audience for whom they are meant to provide them, than in the schools where we sent our children to receive basic education.

This is not just my idea, Mr. President. Nor is it the complaint just of Mr. Gardner. Let me read to the Presiding Officer what a number of rather distinguished private sector agencies have said about the need for integrating social services with the schools in order to reach school children.

The Children's Defense Fund, in putting forward what they term "A Vision for America's Future: An Agenda for the 1990's" says:

> Family supports must begin with preventive services to build resilience and strengthen family functioning. The Federal Government should encourage unified children's services. Money should be provided to States which document interagency collaborations.

The Ford Foundation has produced this document, "The Common Good: Social Welfare and the American Future." What they say in part, in this document, published in May of last year is:

> Changing economic and household arrangements are creating a new kind of vulnerability for many families today. The present system of child welfare services deserves better attention. It is a maze of overlapping jurisdictions and fragmented services geared to addressing crises after they occur rather then averting them.
> The basic outline seems clear enough. Our systems of health care, nutrition services, day-care and child development should be connected and delivered to those children and parents who need them most. Therefore, we recommend the creation of interagency State youth councils. Local communities must take prime responsibility for designing better programs. Elements include the use of schools as centers for delivering integrated services to adolescents.

Similarly, the Carnegie Council on Adolescent Development, in the document they published in June 1989 entitled "Turning Points: Preparing America's Youth for the 21st Century" stated:

> Young adolescents face significant turning points. For many youths 10 to 15 years old, early adolescence offers opportunities to choose a path toward a productive and fulfilling life. But for many others it represents their last, best chance to avoid a diminished future.

The recommendations contained in this report will vastly improve the experiences of all middle grade students but will mostly benefit those at risk of being left behind. The task force calls for middle grade schools that connect schools with communities which, together, share a responsibility for each middle grade student's success through collaborations to ensure students access to health and social services.

Another study recently published, published just last year in 1989 by a group called Policy Analysis for California Education, in a document in which they sought to assess "Conditions of Calfiornia Children" had this to say:

Service professionals within agencies seldom view their work as interactive and interdependent with the work of those in other agencies. Much of the duplication and confusion of fragmented children's service delivery can be prevented by providing related services at the same site, such as schools, where possible. Services targeting a shared clientele should be located under one roof.

"In Children In Need: Investment Strategies for the Educationally Disadvantaged," in 1987, the Committee for Economic Development stated:

We urge a re-evaluation of schools that serve large numbers of disadvantaged children. Public schools and communities must work together to design and tailor programs that meet the special, academic, vocational and social health needs of disadvantaged children and adolescents.

Finally, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology the past month, in January 1990, publishing a document entitled "Education that Works and Action Plan for the Education of Minorities," the quality of education for minorities project of MIT, wrote:

The needs of students also can be served by school-linked comprehensive social, welfare, health, and other delivery systems. Bureaucratic structures are grossly inadequate for the complex problems confronting today's young people, especially minority students. School-linked comprehensive service systems can overcome these problems, more efficiently meet needs and thereby improve student achievement.

Why is everyone looking to the schools, and why is everyone saying the same thing about the need to bring about collaboration to make those in the agencies understand that they should actually reach their audience?

It is because it is obvious, and it is also obvious that the schools are being blamed, in many cases, for factors that are clearly beyond their control; because the children that come into the classrooms are not healthy and, therefore, not able to concentrate, they are not able to learn. Even if they are healthy, in many cases, they are totally without motivation to learn. They are, I will tell you, without, in many instances, the kind of adult participation in their lives that encourages them to learn, that makes learning relevant to them, that measures their progress as individual children, because there is no one in their life who does that except for the classroom teacher.

Listen to what Keith Geiger, president of the National Education Association, has to say in response to the Metropolitan Life survey of American education. He said this just last fall, September 21, 1989. I quote Mr. Geiger:

Over the years, the people who work in schools have accepted increasing responsibilities for the health and welfare of students, and that's good. But the problems students bring to their classes are becoming more diverse and complex each day. Their solution demands the experience, training, resources and time that school staffs simply do not have.

Mr. President, of course, the teacher is in loco parentis, in all too many instances, and tries to substitute for the parent, but when the teacher does detect that problem of hearing, of vision, of inadequate nutrition, of mental health problems, like depression, of inadequate motivation, of inattentiveness, of failure to do homework, when that happens, Mr. President, Mr. Geiger is absolutely right: The teacher is entitled and, God knows, more important, the child is entitled, to get those services for which we are paying so much money as taxpayers in order that those professionals, presumably capable of helping, are actually there to do the job and help them.

Mr. President, there are other articles that quote any number of other teachers who note their children coming to class in winter with thin summer dresses and no undergarments; children who come routinely without breakfast; children who come not healthy, not motivated, and, therefore, not prepared, not ready for learning. We have to change that because the cost to children is intolerable: the cost to America is really unacceptable.

We should recognize the need for prevention. What this legislation does, very simply, is to authorize a modest grant program to States and local school districts and to local governments operating in conjunction with those school districts so that, in fact, they can go forward with the kind of integration of social service and child development service delivery to schoolchildren that is required if we are to change all of these unhappy reports that I have read into the RECORD this morning. It is that simple.

It will not be that simple to deal with each individual problem, but what we are saying is that there is a basic proposition whose time has come. We really do not need to agonize further about the wisdom of integrating those services with the schools. What we are saying in this amendment is we will provide some money, a modest amount, and we will then allow those who wish to achieve that kind of integration to go forward and do so. In 3 years, we will have the basis for determining, throughout this land, what works best and, very likely, we will discover that different situations dictate different responses, but with one common thread: that is, we have to pull together the people who are engaged in child development, and in a whole variety of different programs, aimed at addressing a specific need of children and bring those to the attention of those in charge of the children through half their waking moments.

That is all, Mr. President. It is a very simple proposition.

Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 24 minutes.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, at this time, I reserve the remainder of my time and entertain whatever presentation my colleagues may wish to make.

Mr. DODD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD].

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may consume of the time allotted to us under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. President, first of all, let me say to my colleague from California, I certainly respect tremendously what he is attempting to do here. Over the last 40 minutes or so, he has outlined a very serious problem. There is no question about it. There is certainly a need to try and coordinate services and to achieve a greater efficiency in reaching these children in need.

I held hearings on Monday in New York City, Mr. President, on substance abusing parents and their addicted infant children. One of the points made over and over again by people in these intensive care units and major hospitals in New York, as well as the experts who testified later that day, was that we do not deal with the delivery of services in a whole fashion; that you have to go to one agency for drug treatment, another agency to try and encourage people or to get prenatal care or postnatal care, another agency for job training, another agency if the parent needs treatment for drug abuse. It is a patchwork system.

What we need to try and achieve has been called, and I like to call, the seamless garment of services that serve families and serve children. If I heard my colleague from California correctly, that is what he is attempting to achieve here with this proposed legislation, to try and achieve some seamless garment of services delivered so that you reduce the problems by having families or individuals search and seek out one agency after the other, and it ends up being a very disjointed delivery system.

Having said that, however, and in sincere support of the concept he is advocating with his amendment this morning, I must reluctantly oppose the amendment. The reason I do that is very simple, Mr. President. This is a matter that is complex, and how best to do this, how best to get our local agencies at the State level and below to engage in the kind of coordination that the Senator from California is talking about ought to be the subject of some consideration by the Senate and by the respective committees, where you invite in local officials, State officials, people from the very departments and organizations that are going to be affected by this kind of a decision and sort out how best to do it.

That is why we have a committee system. This five-page amendment poses some very serious questions, and I will shortly identify a few of them, that I am sure my colleagues would want to have some answers to before deciding whether or not to support the amendment, no matter how much we all may support the concept behind the proposal of the Senator from California.

For instance, on the very first page, the Federal share shall be 80 percent of this program to set up these councils.

Most programs that I am familiar with usually have a sliding scale where the Federal commitment is one percentage and then over the next several years it deceases as local share or private sector involvement increases.

Why 80 percent? Most programs people are talking about today are usually 50 percent—50 percent matching share, Federal. So where does this number come from? Why is it not a sliding scale? Why was it set so high? Should it be higher? Should it be a 100-percent Federal commitment, and not be asking local governments to take on the added burden? Or should it be less than 50 percent because of the demand on our own budget process and a variety of other programs that need to be served.

Head Start is coming along this year. The President has asked for a $500 million commitment so that we might reach 180,000 more kids in this country in the 4-year-old range who today cannot get into a Head Start Program. That is going to be a program that I think is strongly supported in a bipartisan way in this body, and I presume in the other.

The proposal here from my colleague from California is a good idea. Healthy start even sounds like Head Start. When I first heard about it, I thought it was Head Start. I did not listen to the word "healthy" carefully. I thought he said "head," "Head Start."

In that case we are going to be detracted in a sense from the resource capacities we need for the Head Start Program. So these are the things you have to consider.

I go in to page 2, just looking at some of it here. The non-Federal share of payments under the act may be in cash or in kind, and fairly evaluated, including plant, equipment, or services.

Well, what does that include? Does that mean that the Federal Government can buy all the typewriters and pay the administrative costs and so forth, and the local agencies do not have to do that much? Does it mean seminars, trips they might take, lodging? These things have to be laid out very carefully before you come forward with a new bureaucracy that you are talking about.

I proposed several years ago in the child care bill that we mandate some things that would have to be done at the local level. I could tell you firsthand how my colleagues reacted to that. They did not like the idea that we would be sitting here in Washington and mandating what local departments and agencies would have to do; that we could set up goals, if you will, or models that ought to be adopted, or we hope would be adopted at the local level, but to sit there and absolutely mandate what ought to be done at the local level received a very strong negative reaction from our colleagues.

Certainly, when I read paragraph (c), under the heading "Council" on page 2 of this amendment, if I read it correctly, it says, "Each local education agency desiring a grant under this subsection (a) shall, in conjunction with other local social service and law enforcement providers, establish a local service delivery coordination council"—it mandates the establishment of that council in every county in America, and second, which consists—that is a verb, consist—"which consists of not more than 20 members, including—"not only does it tell you you have to establish the council, but then it goes on to list the 20 people you ought to have.

So this is not decided at the local level, or whether or not in fact the board of education locally can do the job this council sets up. Maybe they have a good system; maybe they do not. But here we lay out 20 people, including the superintendent of schools, principal, teachers, parents, a representative of the students, child protection welfare agencies, a representative of the public health agency, a child psychiatrist, a child development specialist, a drug treatment specialist, a mental health specialist, a representative of public safety, a district attorney, a representative of community-based organizations, a public housing official a representative of the local school board, a representative of the private sector. My God, we just go on. We are setting down every single individual that should be a part of this.

Again, I am sympathetic to the notion it would help to do these things, but, quite frankly, when you sit here and decide you are going to establish the institution and then mandate who sits on it, I think in the past we have rejected that kind of approach at this level.

Third, is the issue of who can receive funds. "A local educational agency"—I am going up to part (b), "Requirement," on page 2. "A local education agency shall not be eligible for a grant under subsection (a) unless such local educational agency is eligible to receive financial assistance under chapter 1 of title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965."

That raises again the church-state issue. There is a serious question here about whether or not a church-based program could qualify. I have gone through those debates on other matters, and people have very strong feelings about whether or not they ought to be included.

That issue ought to be examined, and it is hard to examine it in a 1-hour or 2-hour debate on the floor of the Senate. Yet I am confident that many of my colleagues who feel one way or the other on the church-state debate would like to have that sorted out effectively so that they know the answer to the question before they vote on establishing this healthy start program.

On the makeup of this council that has been described, I mentioned earlier that a representative of the public health agency would be included. What about abortion counseling or pregnancy counseling?

Again, we have Members with very strong views on that subject matter in this body and some are going to want to prohibit this council from even considering pregnancy counseling. I am not sure they ought to prohibit it. In fact, I would disagree with that, quite frankly, and I presume in the absence of any language in this amendment, they would be permitted to do so. Frankly, I think they ought to be permitted to do so. But I know in past years a number of our colleagues have raised very strong reservations about that. And yet this amendment, if adopted as is, would obviously leave that question open, at the very least. Again, I presume that is the kind of thing on which you would want to conduct hearings, debate it, sort out those problems, and craft language that would make it possible for this council to move forward in that area.

The council itself, what it does, is described on page 3 of the amendment. It says it "shall develop a coordinated service delivery plan which includes the establishment of—and it goes on to page 3 and lists three jobs that it would do, I guess—how it would develop a coordinated service delivery plan. Formal channels of communication would be established; cooperative service delivery agreements would be reached, I gather, procedures to better coordinate, and then file reports.

I see nowhere here where you would actually deliver the services. So here is $80 million each year for 3 years that coordinates, cooperates, and reports, and frankly at a time when we are with scarce dollars, you are trying to deliver services. This does nothing more, it seems, than to require there be meetings between people on these councils to discuss these questions.

Again, I do not fault the idea of trying to coordinate these efforts but, frankly, I am not sure we are achieving it is what I am saying to you, Mr. President, with this amendment. Despite the good intentions behind it, despite the laudatory goals behind it, there are serious questions raised in a 5-page amendment that would set up a new bureaucracy at the State level.

And there is no question about that. This mandates the establishment of local councils in every county, as I read it, in this country and tells you who should sit on it. I must say there has been some discussion here about various groups, reports, and so forth. We have tried to check around. I can find no group that supports this specific proposal. If there are some groups that have come on board and support this unequivocally, then we ought to know about them.

Normally, you get groups when you get a proposal, submit this, take it to the committee, have hearings, and you invite people to come in who know something about it. And they comment, and tell you how it could work better. Again, we have had nothing of the kind here in the proposal—no case of how it works.

So I say to my colleague from California—and I mean this. Normally we say these things, and there is usually sort of a hidden secondary meaning that, I support the concept, I support the goals and ideals. I clearly do. I do. I chair the Subcommittee on Children, Families, Drugs, and Alcoholism.

It is the kind of thing we should probably look at. And it would be well to look at it at the subcommittee level, conduct some hearings, see how it works, how it can be improved, and how you answer some of these questions. I am confident that many of my colleagues on both sides of this aisle would want to raise this debate before they vote to establish a $240 million program over the next 3 years. That is what we are doing. It is a quarter of a billion dollars we will be voting on shortly here on a program that we have had a 2-hour debate on, no hearings, no discussion, and no examination of how these questions work. We cannot function that way around here. You just cannot. You would never have any really intelligent program if you went that way or you might as well abandon the committee process entirely.

So I hope when this issue comes for a vote in the next few moments that my colleagues, no matter how strongly we may applaud the goals laid out in this amendment, that they would reject this amendment as of now, have it go to the committee process, then come back to the floor after we have had that kind of consideration, and then decide whether or not they want to commit themselves to a $240 million program over the next 3 years that raises the kinds of questions that are raised in the language of this amendment as crafted. So for those reasons, Mr. President, I will reluctantly oppose this amendment, and at the appropriate time offer a tabling motion. At this point I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WILSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I am saddened, frankly, by the response of my friend. He has raised no serious questions, at least none that are raised by the legislation. This simply authorizes $10 million, not $80 million, for a grant program.

Mr. DODD. The Senator is absolutely correct about the $10 million.

Mr. WILSON. I know I am correct. I will be correct in the other assertions that I make as well. To suggest that this imperils Head Start is the most blatant nonsense I think I have ever heard. I think we are all very happy that President Bush has sought to increase the funding for Head Start by 36-plus percent. It does not imperil Head Start. That is ridiculous.

Mr. President, we have committees, and they are important. But this is the U.S. Senate, and it is an organization that has rather loose rules. If we waited for a committee hearing on every amendment that we act upon, then we would diminish our workload about 90 percent. Perhaps that might be a good thing, but it is not the way this body operates. I have seen all but the Manhattan phone book brought up here without committee hearing and pass easily.

Let me just suggest that we have done some things on the floor without committee hearing that evidently have not caused deep heartburn, either to the Senator from Connecticut or anyone else. We passed S. 1711, legislation to implement the President's drug control strategy. We passed the Cranston amendment to that legislation to amend the Public Health Service Act to assist communities in developing coalitions to implement substance abuse prevention and intervention programs. We passed with no hearing whatever the Kennedy-Hatch drug treatment amendments to S. 1711. All of those were very comprehensive pieces of legislation. None of them had any hearings—none, not one moment.

The Moynihan amendment to H.R. 2990, the Labor-HHS appropriations measure, which established a President's award for addiction research had no hearing. The Chiles amendment to H.R. 4783, the Labor-HHS appropriation, to provide funds to carry out a comprehensive child development program and to develop interactice laser video disk technology course materials for upgrading workplace literacy had no hearings.

The list could go on for days, but, Mr. President, I think that makes the point sufficiently. To argue that a simple grant should be denied passage when, in fact, all of its goals are not just embraced but lauded does not make any sense because we are not talking about anything complex. Indeed, what would be required of grant applicants, and I believe we have all heard of grant applicants before, is that they meet some simple criteria, the criteria being relevant to the goals for which the legislation is proposed. This legislation is proposed to bring about the integration of child and social services with schools. It is not a mandate. It is a grant program. There is not anybody in the country that has to apply for the grant. So what is this nonsense about a mandate?

And $10 million, a mandate to every county in the Nation—well, Mr. President, I only wish that every county in the Nation would undertake the kind of effort that is required to bring about the integration of child and social service delivery, preventive delivery, and that is my goal. But this does not mandate it. And $10 million I will assure you is going to be enough for a very few demonstration programs which will provide us the basis and experience of those different programs to determine what seems to be the most optimum, the optimum workable way to bring about this coordination, this integration instead of the fragmentation that has meant that all of this tax money is spent to no purpose.

I must tell you I resent an argument that is constructed for the purpose of denying a good idea because it did not come from a member of the committee. The fact that this has had no hearing means relatively little. It is not difficult to understand either the basic proposition or the simple mechanics of this grant. If you are a school district, eligible under existing law to make application for other grants, then you are the kind of school district that can apply for this.

What are you required to do? What is the mandate? The mandate is to come together with those social service and child development agencies in your region and establish formal channels of communication between yourselves and them, between public agencies and organizations responsible for service delivery to children, and youth, and schools—so that classroom teacher has a protocol for communicating to the mental health specialist about the little girl who seems strangely depressed, so that she can deal with child protective services, about the little boy who though he does not have a mark on him seems to have been so traumatized by mental child abuse that he is incapable of even undertaking any concentration or learning.

The next thing that this mandate imposes—and I am being sarcastic if anyone is in doubt—is that there be a simple agreement for a cooperative service delivery between public agencies and organizations responsible for children, youth services, and the schools.

Finally, it requires that this be devised as a part of this getting together, procedures to better coordinate interagency budgeting and planning for children and youth services. Mr. President, this is not very hard to understand. It is real simple. It is real necessary. It is an idea whose time has come, come to the Ford Foundation, to the Carnegie Endowment, an idea embraced by the President of the National Education Association, an idea very clearly advocated by the Children's Defense Fund.

Mr. President, I think it is an idea that makes simple, good sense. We are not going to be spending much money. We are not mandating anything. We are saying to people who wish to apply for a grant that if they want 80 percent and are willing to put up 20 percent and their 20 percent can be in kind, that is through services, then they will be designated as one of the grant recipients. And after 3 years time we will look to see whether or not in their county and in their school system they have been able, not just to integrate services, but as a result, to claim some victories for children. That is what this is about. To talk about injuring Head Start and mandating that every county will have this program is sheer and unadulterated nonsense.

I do wish to give offense to a colleague, but, frankly, these arguments are pure straw. That is being kind. This is an idea whose time has come. It is an idea that is really late. It is simple, common sense. Instead of funding organizations that do not talk to each other and do not talk to the schools, where our children—I repeat—spend 50 percent of their waking hours, is to be blind to an obvious requirement.

Mr. President, I feel that what is at work here is a little turf jealousy. Ordinarily, I would not care very much about that, but I have seen a little too much recently in the way of what happens because of the failure to provide the kind of services that are necessary to prevent some real tragedies. That 15-year-old Vietnamese honor student who became pregnant is no isolated case. She is only one of many teenage mothers, or in her case, a teenage pregnancy which came to tragic end.

If we are serious about doing something about being able to deal with learning problems, if we are serious about teenage pregnancy, if we are serious about drug gangs and drug use, if we are serious about the kind of dropout rate that is robbing America of the work force that it will need and robbing each of those dropouts of hope for simple dignity and earning power, then, by God, the time has come to do something about it—not to say, well, this is complex stuff; we had better have some hearings.

There have been so many hearings on the different facets of all of what we are talking about, that it would fill—and it has—volumes of committee records. Has this proposal today had a hearing? No. Does it need one? No. What we need is response, response from those agencies that are involved in teaching, and those that are involved in providing service delivery, in order to bring the services to the children for whom they are intended. It is not happening. I am angry about it, because it is time it happened. I will just tell you that what we are talking about, simply stated, is prevention, rather than remedial care.

Mr. President, I will put it to you very simply. We will start with crime. I am, some would say, a hardliner on crime. I believe the President is, too. I do not care whether you are a conservative who believes in the death penalty and in stiff sentences, as the President and I do, or whether you are a liberal who does not. In either case, how much better it is to prevent crime than to punish it. How much better to keep kids in school than to see them in reform school. How much better it is to prevent drug use than to go the expensive and uncertain route of rehabilitation.

I want to put those dedicated people to whom I am so grateful, those who are specialists in compensatory education, into the category of being a diminishing, rather than a growth industry, by preventing the need for their attention.

How much better to prevent learning disorders than to suffer then, and to have to go through the tremendous exertions, and all of the expense that is involved in special compensatory education. How much better, Mr. President, to engage in prevention than in the far less humane—because it is far less effective and far less cost effective—course of remedial action that is likely not to succeed, even as it spends dollars.

Mr. President, the case for this, I think, is compelling. There is no need for committee hearings; there is need for action. It does not require great courage to take this action to authorize $10 million to allow those agencies who wish to, to apply for a grant that will assist them in better integrating the delivery of preventive health and social and child development services to school children. That is what this is about. We, by God, should get to it.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHELBY). Who yields time?

Mr. PELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I must oppose the amendment offered by the Senator from California and urge my colleagues to do the same. The amendment submitted by him charts new ground, maybe good ground, but new ground, and I believe, really, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Education, it is a matter that should first be the subject of consideration by our Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

As the Senator knows, the text of the amendment was not available until, I believe, this morning. That has made any detailed examination difficult.

Mr. WILSON. Will my friend yield the floor? The text was provided to the committee staff.

Mr. PELL. I think you will find there is a dispute on this. My staff said they did not receive it.

Mr. WILSON. A summary was provided, and I assume that, frankly, the staff was able to read it and understand it. I have high confidence in the staff.

Mr. PELL. At any rate, my understanding is that it was a summary that was provided, but no text.

I congratulate the Senator, too, on his project D.A.R.E. amendment, which was accepted earlier and which provides for police officers to be trained to go into the classrooms of our elementary school children, and I think that is a good and positive step in the fight against drug abuse.

But in this case, I think that we should examine very carefully this proposal and how it affects other successful proposals. I must, as I said earlier, vote against it. I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time and move to table, if the Senator is willing to yield back the remainder of his time.

Mr. WILSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, first as a courtesy to my friend, I ask him what questions he has, what questions does the staff have?

Mr. PELL. Basically, speaking as a member of our committee, I think it should go through our committee.

Mr. WILSON. I am afraid I am not being clear. What specific questions about this legislation does the chairman or the staff have? I mean, it is so patently obvious, I want to know what question they have, what it is they fail to understand?

Mr. PELL. I think that the specifics were well articulated by my colleague the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, earlier. But my main objection is that it should first go through the committee. We would like to work with him on the committee, but unfortunately no effort was made to go through the committee.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, no effort was made to go through the committee, because there should be no effort required.

This is so patently obvious. The necessity for it is so clear that it has been documented by one organization after another. Only the Labor and HHS committee seems not yet apprised of the need to do this.

I do not think this is a bold new course being turned. I wish I could claim the credit that my friend is seeking to give. I will just tell him that the time for action on a simple proposition, a $10 million grant application, is now. We do not need to go through the process of such a hearing.

We did not give a hearing to the Chiles amendment, to the Moynihan amendment, to the Kennedy-Hatch drug treatment amendment to S. 111, to the Cranston amendment to S. 111. These were far, far more complicated and more extensive.

What we are talking about is simply giving those very few local districts that could apply under the modest amount of money provided in this grant the opportunity to do so, so that we will have some basis in experience. Then we might have a hearing that would be useful where we examine the experience of those school districts that have actually put to work an agreement that requires only three things: Communication, cooperative service delivery agreements, and procedures to better coordinate the budgeting and planning for the delivery of child and youth services.

I frankly do not see how anyone could have a question, and I have not heard any question. Therefore, I have to conclude that there are strange forces at work that make it impossible for those who should understand to do so, which is certainly strange because they are bright intelligent people.

Mr. President, I will yield back the remainder of my time and when my friend moves to table I want him to know that I intend to seek a rollcall vote because I cannot imagine anyone who would not be ashamed really to vote against this.

They should be if they do.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I believe that authorizing demonstration grants to assist local educational agencies in coordinating support services to children and youth is a worthy goal. Unfortunately, this amendment would impose inflexible requirements on local education agencies which seek to apply for these demonstration grants.

For example, this amendment would mandate that local educational councils which apply for a demonstration grant include a range of public officials and private citizens with a variety of specialties. However, under the language of the amendment, if a local educational council has people to fill 19 of the specified slots, but does not have a person for the 20 slot, then that agency—regardless of how suited it might otherwise be for the project and regardless of how great might otherwise be the need—would not be eligible to apply for the grant.

This amendment would be useful if it were less rigid. For that reason, I will vote against the Wilson amendment.

Mr. PELL. I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time now and am glad to have a rollcall vote.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator can yield his time. Whatever the distinguished chairman wishes, there is going to be a rollcall vote.

Mr. PELL. Sure. So does the Senator yield back the remainder of his time?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. PELL. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I move to table.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from California.

On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

The result was announced—yeas 51, nays 49, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DODD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending business is the committee substitute amendment, as amended.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, wil the Senator from Rhode Island yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. PELL. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. HOHNSTON. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. JOHNSTON pertaining to the introduction of S. 2088 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

PROVIDING FOR ADJOURNMENT OF THE TWO HOUSES

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 256, the adjournment resolution, now at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMON). The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 256) providing for the adjournment of the two Houses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 256) was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

EDUCATIONAL EXCELLENCE ACT OF 1989

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, what is the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending business is the committee substitute amendment, as amended. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 1246

(Purpose: To amend the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards)

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the Chairm, both personally and professionally.

Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS,] proposes an amendment numbered 1246.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 118, line 5, insert "public" after "the".

On page 118, line 5, insert "public school" after "all."

On page 119, line 3, insert "for competency in a discipline" after "standards".

On page 119, line 4, insert "public schools" after "the".

On page 119, line 12, beginning with "has" strike all through line 14 and insert "means a public school which provides elementary education, as determined under State law,".

On page 119, line 15, beginning with "has" strike all through line 17, and insert "means a public school which provides secondary education, as determined under State law, except that it does not include any education provided beyond grade 12.".

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, it became quite apparent last night that a majority in this body is content with allowing a union-dominated National Board to set standards for the public teaching professions.

While the Board has said publicly that the standards will be voluntary, and that word voluntary has been run through this Chamber time and time again during the debate on this piece of legislation, what do the unions say? They are unabashedly saying that they intend to have the States adopt the Board's future standards as de facto State licensing standards.

Those are the facts.

From the point of view of this Senator, I am concerned that with the overwhelming union influence on the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards, the Board will not promulgate truly rigorous and meaningful standards in light of the teachers' union's overwhelming opposition to the many attempts by the States in the past to implement written competency tests.

But all of that was last night's debate, Mr. President. I do not intend to go into it again. What I do want to discuss—and I think that I am obliged to discuss—is the question of whether the Senate intends to permit the National Board to use Federal funds to develop standards for private schoolteachers and home-schooling parents.

Therefore, the pending amendment would stipulate that the National Board's activities will be confined to developing standards for the public elementary and secondary schoolteachers, and, if this amendment is agreed to, the Board will be prohibited by law from using Federal funds for activities directly related to developing competency assessments or certification requirements for private schoolteachers or parents who teach their children at home.

I think we ought to write it in indelibly, unmistakably, and that is the purpose of this amendment.

The point is this, Mr. President. Parents who have been their children out of the public school system essentially pay twice to educate their children since, in addition to paying the cost of their children's private education, they must also pay taxes to support the public school system. Most of the parents who make such sacrifices do so for religious or academic reasons, and those who teach their own children at home or put them in religious private schools for religious reasons disagree with erroneous Supreme Court decisions prohibiting even voluntary religious activities in the public schools. They do not want their children educated in an environment devoid of religious content or in an environment that is implicitly—and in many instances virulently—prejudiced against religious beliefs.

Many parents, religious and nonreligious, also prefer to take their children out of the public schools because they disagree with the educational theories and philosophies prevailing these days in the public schools.

Such parents will hardly be interested in applying to the National Board for certification when the Board's bylaws ensure that a majority of its composition at all times will be public schoolteachers. You may not agree with these parents, but that is the way they feel, and their feelings ought to be respected by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, it is particularly enlightening that even though private school and home-schooled children currently constitute between 15 and 20 percent of the Nation's total student population, only one—only one—of the National Board's 60-odd members comes from the private school sector, and even then that member does not speak for the concerns of religious schools or home-schooling parents.

Mr. President, I must assume that most of us agree that parents who are willing to endure great additional personal expense and sacrifice in order to seek out an alternative to public education should be permitted to do so if they wish. After all, this is supposed to be a free country. And once these parents find and pay for alternative ways of teaching their children, they should not be required to turn their private schools and homes into clones of the public school system.

Mr. President, that is what they are trying to get away from. Agree with them or not, they have that right as Americans. But this is precisely what the public school professionals are trying to force upon them, forcing them to knuckle under to what somebody else thinks is best for their children.

For example, the National Board itself has declared that one of its purposes is to dispel the myth "that any modestly educated person with some instinct for nurturing has the requisite qualifications to teach."

The Lord knows what all that means, but I think I know what it means. It means, as I said over and over again yesterday and last evening on this floor, that what this crowd is after is monopoly power and control financed by the taxpayers of the United States of America.

By definition, most home-schooling parents are, I suppose, modestly educated people who have an instinct and desire to nurture their children. So, if I were them, I would be greatly alarmed by the Board's statement as to its purpose in this regard.

Mr. President, what would be more disturbing to this Senator would be the boldness with which the rest of the public school teaching profession declares their hostility to the existence of private schools and home-schools outside their control.

The NEA as recently as 1984 said that "Nonpublic school instructional personnel must be credentialed"—and between the lines that means by them—"according to minimum standards"—again decided by them—"comparable to and comparable with those applied in certifying public educators."

The National Education Association also believes that private K-12 educational institutions must employ teachers who hold public educator certification.

Do you see where that leads us, Mr. President? Taking everything away from these people who are paying double to educate their children, taking away all of their rights. The NEA is saying, "We will decide who is or is not competent to teach your children, not you."

So, Mr. President, the problem here for private schools, particularly religious schools, is that a public teaching certificate is usually contingent upon an individual's having graduated from an accredited teachers college. Of course, the NEA does not want any teachers college to be accredited unless that college teaches "pedagogical" theories and other matters which border on nonsense.

The NEA also does not want teachers colleges to be accredited if they are overly involved in teaching religion. I happen to be one of those who thinks that the Supreme Court stood itself on its ear when it yielded to Madalyn Murray O'Hair and took school prayer out of the public schools of America. In terms of the effectiveness of the schools, the respect for the schools, the participation by parents, and the deterioration of schools, I think they all could be charted on a graph downward after that decision. When we took every element of religion out of our schools, we set them on a slippery slope, as evidenced by the state of education in this country today.

Mr. President, the point is that the many teachers colleges in this country were established precisely because their founders did not believe in such "educational theories." So in many instances they felt—just as many religious school and home-schooling parents do—that such theories are antithetical to their religious beliefs. But here we have the specter of the NEA, advocating that graduates from religious teachers colleges should be prohibited from teaching anywhere, even in elementary or secondary schools belonging to the teachers college's same denomination.

Mr. President, the NEA is equally unequivocal in its opposition to home-schooling parents. The NEA at its convention in New Orleans in 1988 adopted a resolution stating that the NEA "believed that home-schooling programs cannot provide the child with a comprehensive education experience."

I am sure that comes as news to the many parents who have observed over the years that the vast majority of public schoolteachers spend more time trying to keep order in the classroom than in instructing the students.

Mr. President, I mentioned yesterday that Mrs. Helms and I have an older daughter who is a school principal. Later on this year she will be principal of two schools simultaneously, an elementary school, and a middle school, as it is called. Yes, their school is connected with the Episcopal Church. My daughter began as a public schoolteacher, but she realized that she was doing nothing for the students because the problem was keeping order, and most of her time was consumed with keeping order, filling out forms, and doing things that schoolteachers in years past never had to bother with. Back then teachers could teach. But the problem with public education as we have allowed it to develop in this country is that the schools are not teaching.

You see all sorts of comparisons between America's young people, and those of other countries, which show that the public schools are not teaching our children properly. For instance, compare the students in Japan in terms of their knowledge of technology with students in this country and I am afraid it will be all too evident that our students do not measure up.

Mr. President, this past Friday, I flew to Raleigh, NC, with the President of the United States. The President is earnestly trying to do something about the educational deficiencies. We stopped at North Carolina State University, which is a great university, and specifically we visited the part of the university that emphasizes semiconductors. When we walked in, I was surprised to see that most of the people, I gathered, were not even U.S. students. I remember one very bright and personable young man who knew all about the semiconductors. And he was the one chosen to explain the semiconductors to the President of the United States. The young man had on a white jacket, and he spoke meticulously. He is from Taiwan.

Do not let anybody try to tell this Senator that the intervention of the Federal Government into the educational processes of this country has not done decided damage. That is the reason you have home-schooling. That is the reason you have so many parents paying twice to give their children a little more in terms of education. That is why you have so many protests about title X that this Senate insisted time and time again yesterday must remain in the bill.

Mr. President, I said at the outset of my remarks yesterday that if we wanted to go to final passage on this bill all we had to do was take title X out and thereby give the President of the United States the bill he originally sent to Congress. But by repeated votes, rollcall votes, the teachers unions prevailed.

I expect that Senators are going to hear quite a bit from people all over America once word finally gets out about what has been done in this Chamber in the last 24 hours.

The point is Mr. President, that the private school and home-schooling parents have grounds for concern. Some say, as my friend from Connecticut said or at least implied yesterday, title X does not apply to private schools or home schools. But unless this amendment is adopted, the Senator from Connecticut is wrong. He may be sincere, and I am sure he is, but he is sincerely wrong.

Senators should take note that title X's definition of "elementary school" and "secondary school" tracks exactly and precisely with the meanings given those terms by the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. And that act states that "an elementary school means a day of residential school which provides elementary instruction." The word "residential" is of particular note since it unequivocally brings home-schools within the purview of the National Board's activities. And the definition for secondary schools is exactly the same except for the word "elementary."

Mr. President, title X specifically authorizes the Board to develop "teacher assessments and certification procedures for elementary and secondary schoolteachers."

Of course, according to the act's definitions which I just read that includes private teachers and home-schooling parents who are providing elementary and secondary school instruction. Those who disagree with me can protest all they wish, but we will eventually and ultimately see who is right.

Other Senators may say that title X will not affect private schools and home-schools because religious schoolteachers and parents would have to apply for Board certification. But such teachers and parents are not in the least interested in applying for such certification. In fact, it is the kind of philosophy driving the Board which prompted most of them to take their children out of the public schools in the first place.

I want Senator DODD to be exactly right. I want the Senate to say that Senator DODD is exactly right in his contention that, as the act is written, that the National Board's activities will be confined to developing teacher assessment and certification requirements for public school-teachers. I want it to be clear that the National Board cannot use Federal funds to develop certification or assessment standards for private schools or home-schooling parents.

Mr. President, I do not want the NEA to be able to use standards emanating from federally funded entity as ammunition in its efforts to force public school standards, methods, and philosophies on private religious schools and home-schooling parents. These are citizens who have desperately tried to opt out of the public school system altogether. If left alone, they are more than willing to be judged by the educational progress of their students. That is a teacher competence standard that I am sure we will never see the National Board promulgate that competency standard for public school-teachers because the NEA would never accept it. Too many of its members would flunk.

Mr. President, I urge Senators to go on record as protecting the rights of all parents to seek out alternatives to public education for their children, if they wish, with as little interference from Government as possible. That can be accomplished, or course, by adopting the pending amendment.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator will yield for a question?

Mr. HELMS. I am glad to yield to my friend.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Is it not true that today, as a matter of fact, home-schools or private schools are not under any State requirement requiring competency or testing?

Mr. HELMS. I do not believe it is true. I state this respectfully to my friend. The States regulate home-schools in many ways. In some States, one parent must have a college degree. In others, the children are required to take a test to see that they are doing at least as well as the public schools. In every instance so far, by the way, the home-schooled children do much better than the public school students.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Today, as it stands, do teachers in home schools have to meet any standards that a State may have regarding teaching requirements?

Mr. HELMS. I suppose that varies from State to State.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Well, the requirements do. I am asking, because I was not sure. I did not realize that private school-teachers or home school-teachers had to meet any existing State requirements.

Mr. HELMS. Well, let me say for the RECORD that the State of Michigan, for example, has already acquiesced in the NEA's position and currently requires parents to hold a public school teacher's license before they can teach their own children at home.

Mr. KERREY. Will the Senator yield?

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. KERREY. I am here to talk about something else, but I have some experience with that certification issue, both for the purposes of the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Kansas. I believe a half-dozen States require—mine being one of them, and I tried to get that law changed unsuccessfully—advanced certification before permission can be granted to teach either in a private or home school.

Most of the States—I do not know the exact number—will permit testing of the students themselves to determine whether or not the school is getting the job done. There are still a handful of States that require certification prior to that teacher being given permission to teach in school, whether a public, home, or a private school.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I thank the Senator from Nebraska. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been requested. Is there a sufficient second?

There appears to be a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I yield the floor.

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to speak on the underlying bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection.

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, I rise, first of all, in support of S. 695. I believe it is a worthy proposal being offered for serious Americans problems in our schools. I am pleased to be able to join in support of the Chair's legislation yesterday, which addresses the problem of adult illiteracy, because I believe it is a serious effort to deal with a serious problem. Those of you, including the distinguished Senator from Illinois, the Senator from Rhode Island, and the distinguished Senator from Kansas, and others, who have spent an awful lot of time on this, I believe understand very well what ought to be done and what can be done.

Mr. President, the worst dilemma for an elected official is to be caught between the public's desire for a solution to a problem and our own ignorance of the problem itself. The squeeze of the proverbial rock of public sentiment and the resistance of a hardened mind is not uncommon in American politics.

Sometimes, however, our dilemma is more accurately described by the Latin expression once passed on to me by Nebraska's super literate attorney general, Bob Spire. We are caught "a fronte praecipitium a tergo lupi"—between the cliff in front and the wolves behind.

Mr. President, the passage of the National Literacy Act yesterday is a good effort directed at a serious problem. Today, we have before us a proposal by the President which is a good effort, too.

The President has set the year 2000 before us and has challenged us to participate in the effort to achieve several astonishingly worthwhile objectives by that date. Leaving aside the question of whether a 9-year plan is a long term goal, I am concerned by the President's almost breathless enthusiasm to accomplish all sorts of things by this day.

President Bush, has become fascinated lately with the potential for harmonic convergence in the year 2000. He wants to eliminate adult illiteracy, reduce dropout rates to 10 percent, and advance 17-year-olds to the top of the industrial world's math and science class by the dawning of that magical moment.

We are rushing headlong toward the year 2000, trying to pass appropriate legislation along the way. Faster and faster we go while behind us are voters and pollsters tolling us to do something about education.

My fear, Mr. President, is that instead of finding the promised land in the year 2000, we will find a cliff. We will find we are at the edge of a precipice rushing headlong to our destruction. The hard fact of the matter is—and we all know it—simply by passing legislation, we will not improve the literacy of our adults and our children.

It would be a great tragedy if—while the people are behind us—we took steps which do not lead to the improvement of our schools. It would be tragic if we stood on the floor and only pretend to understand what is needed or to simply posture about the long term benefits.

It would be a tragedy because we need to dramatically improve the quality of American primary and secondary education. The performance of our best teachers and students suggest what we could do; but the aggregate performance of all our students make it clear how far we have to go. I happen to be one of many Americans who the President of the United States referenced in Charlottesville when he said "Americans are ready for a radical change in their schools." I do not believe the President's proposals are up to that particular task.

At their best, and indeed they can be good—given the proper oversight and funding—these legislative moves will improve things at the margin. At their worst, which I fear is more likely, they offer promise unsupportable by honest evaluation.

In this case, we will have thrown a little more money at the problem, adding credibility to the conclusion of many parents and teachers that nothing can or will be done to add to the intellectual performance or capacity of the American student. And there is the very real possibility of strengthening the two most formidable barriers facing America's teachers, parents, taxpayers, and pupils, and that is the bureaucracy of education and regulation of education in this country.

All the clearing houses, public-private partnerships, challenge grants, merit schools, alternative certification programs, and the rest, take us in many cases in the opposite direction suggested earlier by Secretary Cavozos. Apparently he is the concerned by bureaucracies in America's schools, not in America's human capital.

When I look at the long list of all the new and expanded ideas contained in two education bills being considered this week, the words of an old Muscovite man who was commenting on the Soviet Communist party come to mind. He said:

When the mouth is eating more food than both hands can hold it is time to shut the mouth.

Mr. President, I feel the same way now about our education policy. It is time for us to shut our mouths and put a lot more money into the hands of teachers, principals, and parents who are struggling against great odds. There are 40 million students in America's 16,000 primary and secondary school districts; they need a lot more than we are prepared to give them this week.

They will need a comprehensive effort which, I believe, must be centered around encouraging the most innovative, creative and promising educational programs around the country.

In the near future I plan to introduce legislation establishing an Education Trust Corporation which attempts to accomplish that objective. I believe radical changes are needed but I believe the Federal Government is going to have to be an active partner; otherwise, those radical changes will not occur.%

My proposal in many ways is analagous to the Resolution Trust Corporation in that both establish a source of funds to address the problem and make sure that problem is addressed in an adequate way.

We must understand that housing, health care, transportation, public libraries and parks, and job retraining are more important than they have ever been in the struggle to educate our children. As important as good law enforcement is we will not educate our children by promising them good shelter only if they end up doing hard time.

We must struggle against our own schedules and ages to understand what it is like to be a teacher or a principal today. The heroic effort of our best must be joined by us. We must stand shoulder to shoulder with our school leaders to fight for better pay, improved working conditions, and the opportunity to be held accountable for their performance.

We must examine the status of American productivity and connect American educational effort with the daunting task of reversing an almost two decade decline which threatens the standard of living of all of us.

Mr. President, you, above all people, have not only spoken but written at length about declining productivity in United States of America, and understand how crucial it is for us to connect our educational achievement with our economic gain and our economic machine.

When I graduated from high school in 1961, the statistics said I would double my standard of living in 20 years, but today's graduate, the person who graduates from school in 1990, statistics say that that individual will have the opportunity to double his standard of living in 120 years.

Additionally, we must make certain that our Tax Code simultaneously rewards long-term productivity and provides a fair shake for middle America. We must turn back those greedy friends who approach the Federal tax trough for exemptions, deductions, or lower rates that amount in the end to welfare for the rich.

We must stop the annual charade of talking about $100 billion deficits in January while knowing we will increase the national debt by $300 billion in October. Mr. President, it is a fatal hypocrisy for us to promise educational improvement with these grand legislative measures at the same time we understand that our fiscal policies force interest rates higher, shift wealth away from those Americans upon whom we depend as we compete with the world, and worse of all burdened today's children with the debt of our consumption today.

In short, Mr. President, if we have any real expectation, desire, or hope to stand on the edge of the year 2000 looking back on the work we did in the year 1990 with the pride of mature men and women who gave their all to the cause of preparing a better world for their children we will have to do more than pass a few education bills.

I yield the floor, and I thank the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island and the distinguished Senator from Kansas for permitting me to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I have studied this amendment and find it a very interesting one. As I understand it, it says that a teacher at a private school or home school could not take the examination to be certified. I am a trustee and have been a trustee of a private school, and we have no certification requirements, to the best of my knowledge, for any of our teachers at that school.

As of now a teacher, if she wanted to and if this basic legislation is passed, could go ahead and take the test to be certified. She does not have to, but she has that privilege. I think the passage of this amendment could prevent her from having that privilege and that right, and I think that would be an error.

I would hope we could adjust the legislation or amend it in such a way that it would not interfere with the present practice in private schools or in home teaching.

The present procedure is that the Board certifies teachers, not schools, and sometimes in our discussions we forget that the individuals being certified are not the schools but they are actually the teachers.

This amendment would place a restriction on teachers who move from public to private schools or, to give the example I just did, move from private school to a public school.

When we certify doctors, we do not restrict that certification to practice in a public hospital. I think that that analogy is pretty correct here, that when teachers get certified they should be certified without the requirement that they must teach in a public school.

I suggest the absence of a quorum, and ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Who yields time?

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I did not know we are under a time agreement. I yield such time as the Senator from Pennsylvania may require.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank my distinguished colleague from North Carolina.

Mr. President, I have sought recognition to address the pending amendment and to speak more broadly on the questions which were discussed yesterday in a series of amendments which sought to limit the funding for the National Board for Professional Teachers and also to change the composition to provide for open bidding on such funding.

In my votes yesterday, I opposed the reduction in the $25 million figure and I also opposed providing for a change in the composition of the Board because of the very considerable progress which has been made already following the Carnegie Task Force report on teaching as a profession which was issued in 1986. With respect to funding, at this juncture I am not sure how much that funding should be, but with an authorization provided in this legislation there can always be a tailoring during the appropriations process. I am the ranking Republican on the Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services and Education, so we can address the funding issue more closely at that time.

As I listen to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina earlier today, I share his frustration in the educational system in America. I commented to him in the Cloakroom a few moments ago about my own observations in a classroom taught by my wife, Joan Specter, as to what Senator HELMS had observed or commented about with his own daughter.

I visited the classroom on one occasion many years ago and it was similar to that of a track and field event. The teacher was really a warden of a small institution.

We do know that our educational process in this country is in a state of disrepair and in tremendous need, and it is one which requires our very devoted attention. I compliment my distinguished colleague from North Carolina for the close attention which he has paid to it and his efforts to try improve the situation. In addition, I compliment my colleague, the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mrs. KASSEBAUM] and the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, Senator PELL, as we struggle here today to try to find some ways to improve this system and it is very hard to do.

I have struggled with the issues which were presented yesterday. It is very difficult because we were in the midst of hearings on the nomination of Clarence Thomas and it was back and forth from the floor on a series of amendments, talking to my colleagues in the well, on the floor, trying to reach some conclusion. With the help of my very excellent staff assistant, Earthamae Issac, I cast the votes I did yesterday and wanted to comment very briefly today on the pending amendment.

I have been impressed with the work which has been done by the Carnegie Task Force on Teaching as a Profession. It issued an extensive report in 1986 entitled "A Nation Prepared: Teachers for the 21st Century." That report calls for the establishment of a National Board for Professional Teaching Standards. I have noted that there is considerable private funding which has already been advanced, a $5 million, 5-year grant from the Carnegie Corp. in New York. The National Board for Professional Teaching Standards was launched as a result of that. There has been additional funding in excess of $6 million: $3 million from the Lilly Foundation, $1 million from the Ford Foundation, $75,000 from Charlson Research, $500,000 from AT&T, $500,000 from the Chrysler Corp., $500,000 from Du Pont, $500,000 from Xerox, and many other contributions.

When we are looking at Federal funding, we are looking at it in the context of very considerable private funding. I think it is a very important public-private partnership which is in process here. So that when we look at this authorization for $25 million, it is in the context of others having put up considerable money from the private sector.

I have noted the composition of this Board. I heard some of my colleagues complain yesterday about a Board dominated by folks which were antithetical to this particular Member's point of view, let me put it that way, charitably and diplomatically.

As I look at the composition of this Board, it is very diversified and there is no monopoly of power anywhere. Some may complain about the participation of some groups, but as I look over this Board of 64 members, the American Federation of Teachers has 7 members; the National Education Association has 7 members; 14 members represent specialty and disciplinary associations, such as the National Council of Teachers of Mathematics. The remaining 21 directors include Governors, State legislators, local and State school board members, chief State school officers, superintendents, principals, community and business leaders, parents, and outstanding individuals from higher education. That looks to me like it is a pretty representative Board. Obviously this is not an allocation of Federal money to some special interest groups which are going to have their own interests at heart as opposed to the public interest.

I discussed some of these issues with Mr. Albert Shanker of the American Federation of Teachers some time ago, and others who are in this group.

Mr. President, I would also like to note the participation of three very distinguished Pennsylvanians, which is something this Senator considers, although it is not dispositive. We have had representations from three members of my State whose word I value highly.

Martha Dolfi is on the Board. She teaches math and language arts in the Brookline Elementary Teachers Center in Pittsburgh. Ms. Dolfi was the 1986 Pennsylvania Teacher of the Year.

Another Board member is Mr. Alan K. Campbell, executive vice president and vice chairman of the board of ARA Services, Inc., in Philadelphia. He is former Chairman of the Civil Service Commission and former Director of the Office of Personnel Management.

In addition, Miss Helen E. Martin, who teaches Earth and space science to seniors and juniors at the Unionville High School in Pennsylvania. She has come to my office on a couple of occasions. She and her students have a unique process for a weather satellite tracking station which they use to track American and Russian satellites.

This is a teacher who is in the trenches. She really, I think, knows what is going on.

From these three Board members I, frankly, have a lot of confidence in what they are doing. And the concern I have about the amendments which have been pending so far is a concern that we would start over from scratch. This Board is now ready to commence the intensive research and development program that will enable it to issue the first certificates to teachers in 1993. That is why, notwithstanding the able arguments presented by the proponents of the bill for opening up the competition, it seems to me we should not take a step away from the Board, which already is in existence; and that if we forfeit these 3 years of work, we will start all over again, forcing a setback of this important project.

The whole project, Mr. President, of establishing high and rigorous standards for what teachers should know and be able to do is a very lofty goal. And this certification, I think, has significant promise to advance educational goals and to improve the quality of our teachers and the quality of education in America.

This is an issue which, of course, the Senate must pass on without being experts in the field. I have not had the opportunity to attend the hearings or to delve with the depth which the committee has which has presented this proposal.

When the distinguished Senator from North Carolina offers the current amendment, as best I understand it, that would preclude private schools from participating in the certification program. My own sense is they do not have to if they do not want to. I would be reluctant however, to see a Federal bar, if I accurately understand this amendment. A Federal prohibition which would rule out participation in this certification process if anyone, any school, private or home school, wishes to undertake that.

I do agree with the rest of the comment that we ought not to force it on private schools or on home schools. But if they wish to do so on a voluntary basis, at least at this stage of the debate, I have not seen forceful reasons which ought to preclude its availability, if they choose to undertake it.

Mr. President, although considerable debate has occurred regarding title X of S. 695, the Educational Excellence Act, not enough attention has been focused on the public/private partnership nature of this initiative.

In 1986 the Carnegie Task Force on Teaching as a Profession issued its report "A Nation Prepared: Teachers for the 21st Century," which called for the establishment of a National Board for Professional Teaching Standards. One year later, with a $5 million, 5-year grant from the Carnegie Corp. of New York, the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards was launched.

The National Board for Professional Teaching Standards is an independent, nonprofit, nonpartisan organization governed by a 64-person board of directors. Two-thirds of the board must be teaching professionals—32 of whom must be elementary and secondary school teachers—with 7 members representing the American Federation of Teachers; 7 members representing the National Education Association; 14 members representing specialty and disciplinary associations; for example, National Council of Teachers of Mathematics; and 14 members must be outstanding teachers. The remaining 21 directors include Governors, State legislators, local and State school board members, chief State school officers, superintendents, principals, community and business leaders, parents and outstanding individuals from higher education.

Three of the current board members are Pennsylvanians: First, Martha Dolfi, teachers math and language arts at the Brookline Elementary Teachers Center in Pittsburgh. Ms. Dolfi was the 1986 Pennsylvania Teacher of the Year. Second, Alan K. Campbell is executive vice president and vice chairman of the board of ARA Services, Inc, in Philadelphia. He is a former chairman of the Civil Service Commission and former director of the Office of Personnel Management. And third, Helen E. Martin teaches earth and space science to juniors and seniors at the Unionville High School in Pennsylvania. Ms. Martin and her students built and now operate a weather satellite tracking station, which they use to track American and Russian satellites, and which has enabled them to follow hurricanes.

The purpose of the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards is to establish high and rigorous standards for what teachers should know and be able to do, to certify teachers who meet those standards, and to advance other education reforms to improve student learning in the schools. The certification will be offered on a voluntary basis, and will be designed for experienced teachers. Such certification is meant to complement, not replace, State systems of mandatory licensure, which set minimum standards for beginning teachers.

Mr. President, in addition to the $5 million grant from the Carnegie Corp., the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards has received other gifts and pledges totaling $6,425,000. These include: $3 million from the Lilly Foundation; $1 million from the Ford Foundation; $75,000 from Charlson Research; $500,000 from AT&T; $500,000 from Chrysler Corp.; $500,000 from Du Pont; $500,000 from Xerox; $150,000 from RJR Nabisco; $100,000 from ARA Services; and $100,000 from Sears, Roebuck & Co.

The corporate contributions totaling $3,350,000 have been raised this year and represent slightly more than a quarter of the $10 billion the Board plans to raise from the business community in 1990. The 1990 corporate campaign is being chaired by David Kearns, chairman and CEO of the Xerox Corp., and Richard E. Heckert, retired chairman and CEO of E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., both of whom are members of the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards.

Mr. President, there is ample precedence for providing Federal funds for private nonprofit organizations: the Close Up Foundation, the American Red Cross, and the Corporation for Public Broadcasting are only three examples of private organizations receiving Federal support. The funds would be used for research and development purposes and could not be used for administrative costs. In addition, the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards will conduct an open competition for research grants. Requests for Proposals [RFP's] will be published in the Federal Register, ensuring that the research community is aware of the availability of funds, and the procedure for obtaining these funds. Further, the Board's research agenda must be submitted to the Secretary of Education, the director of the National Science Foundation, and the National Research Council for Comment and Review.

Mr. President, the Board for Professional Teaching Standards has already developed policies regarding certification standards, assessment processes, and education reform issues. The Board is now ready to commence the intensive research and development program that will enable it to issue the first certificates to teachers in 1993. This issue is too important to the future of education in this country, to forfeit 3 years of work and start all over again. I believe that our colleagues on the Labor and Human Resources Committee have given this issue careful consideration. Further, I believe that the willingness of the private sector, including the business community to invest in the work proposed by the Board should be matched, to the extent possible, by the Federal Government. The future of teachers and therefore of education in this country is irrevocably tied to our future ability to be internationally competitive. This is a national problem, and it demands a national response.

In the fiscal year 1990 Labor, HHS, Education and related agencies appropriations bill, Congress provided $5 million for the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards, pending authorization of such legislation. The private sector has demonstrated strong leadership in the development of this vehicle to professionalize teaching and to help attract and retain talented people in teaching. It is now up to the Federal Government to contribute to this effort.

I urge my colleagues to support this public/private sector initiative.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Pennsylvania has made some very thoughtful observations. I particularly appreciate his comments regarding the composition of the Board. I introduced the names in the RECORD yesterday because I think there are many distinguished men and women who are serving on that Board.

I know this whole area, education, is of great interest to the Senator from Pennsylvania, as it is to all of us. My opposition to the Board of Professional Standards, as it is so construed, is, for one, if the teachers themselves believe this is important, the funding should come from the profession itself, as doctors have done for their specialty board credentials.

The Senator from Pennsylvania is exactly right. It is a matching, dollar for dollar, as a matter of fact, between public and private funds. Many in the business community are very supportive and have already, as the Senator pointed out, put in a sizable amount of funding for this endeavor.

I think it will have the ability to enhance professionalism and criterion standards, which I think are very important. But I also believe this is really not the heart of the matter as far as trying to determine and support and increase the recognition and quality of teachers who are in our system today.

It is for that reason I felt there were other things that perhaps our energies and talents could be channeled into at this point that would be more beneficial. But I certainly think the points raised are valid ones and important ones.

Mr. SPECTER. Will the distinguished Senator yield for a question?

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I will be happy to.

Mr. SPECTER. On the amendment which the Senator proposed yesterday, as I understood it from our informal discussions in the well, the Senator would have had the Board constituted by competitive bidding or open offers.

Who would have made the decision as to the ultimate composition of the board under the amendment which the Senator proposed yesterday.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. The Secretary of Education. And I would just add, the competitive bidding. I think there were a lot of concerns that we do provide funds without competitive bidding—and I am not sure this group would not have been the ones that would have been selected, because they have already done so much work.

But I just think it behooves us, whenever we can, to encourage the competitive process. That is why I made that suggestion.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Senator for that response, and that was my understanding, that it would have been a decision made by the Secretary of Education. It was with great reluctance I opposed that amendment of Senator KASSEBAUM because of my high regard for her work and customary deference for her decisions concerning her committee work.

But it seemed to me when I took a look at what the Carnegie Task Force had done in 1986, it would force the initiative to start over from scratch. We have a very able Secretary of Education. But I think there is a high value to encouraging foundations like Carnegie to undertake this kind of work and if we, the Congress, came in at this stage and said, well, we do not like your Board and we do not like your activities, for one reason or another, that would discourage activities like those of the Carnegie Foundation.

If there was some very positive reason, if they had done something wrong, or if they had a board which was not adequate, then I think it would be our duty to say so. But at least presumptively, given the three members I identified and the composition of the Board and the presidents, where we have private and nonprivate organizations. In addition, we have the Close Up Foundation, organization like Organization for Public Broadcasting, even the American Red Cross, where we have in the private sector very positive activities.

It just seemed to me in light of the urgency of the need for improvements in education and the work already done, on balance I wanted to stay with what the Carnegie Task Force had done since they had put substantial money into it. Other foundations had taken a look at it, prominent people. We can always handle, in the appropriations process, further limitations if we think they are appropriate.

I know these are complex decisions. I appreciate the work which Senator KASSEBAUM and others have done. I thank the Senator for her comments.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. And I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for his comments in this debate.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum with the time to be equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Who yields time?

Mr. PELL. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Michigan have 5 minutes not to be charged against my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, earlier today we adopted a very important amendment which will authorize $10 million for grants to local communities to provide drug abuse resistance education. I want to spend a moment saying why this is such an important program.

One of the most exciting and important aspects of our Nation's war on drugs is the growing awareness and the growing toughness of our young people. In elementary schools and high schools, just saying no is no longer just rhetoric; it is struggling to be reality. In community after community in my State of Michigan and around the country, drug free is becoming the way to be.

Families deserve the lion's share of the credit for the turnaround that we are beginning to see in some places. There never will be a substitute for the active involvement of parents. In the schools where the social pressures on young people are the greatest, resistance to drugs has a chance to become a new standard of behavior.

One proven way to improve our odds to clean up our schools and give young people the tools of confidence and self-esteem to say no is the DARE Program. DARE is a 17-week program led by law enforcement officers to teach fifth and sixth graders how to resist drugs. The program has four major goals: Providing accurate information about alcohol and drugs, teaching students decisionmaking skills, showing them how to resist peer pressure, and giving them ideas for alternatives to drug use.

The DARE Program is unique in encouraging law enforcement officers to spend time directly with the students. This creates contact from classroom to playground to lunchroom, creates a sense of partnership and citizenship that can last a lifetime. Along the way, the truth about drugs replaces the myths and an entirely new form of peer pressure arises in our schools.

Michigan started implementing the DARE Program in 1987. Already the State police and other local law enforcement agencies have reached thousands of fifth and sixth graders. There are over 150 trained DARE law enforcement personnel teaching drug resistance to 250 elementary schools, 430 fifth grade classes and almost 300 sixth grade classes.

Last year the DARE Program reached 20,000 youngsters in Michigan and this year the State police expect that the program will reach over 40,000 youngsters.

Mr. President, one of the most impressive aspects of the Michigan program is that it is funded by private donors almost exclusively. However, as impressive as that is, there are still more students that we need to reach and in this the Federal Government ought to help. This amendment would provide that additional assistance.

Americans can win the war on drugs and will do it by keeping our children off drugs. DARE has given thousands of Michigan children the tools to say "no" and an important new relationship with police officers. DARE is on the frontlines, and that is where Federal money for the war on drugs should be spent.

I thank my friend from Rhode Island. I thank the Chair. I yield the floor. I note the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes of my time to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Mississippi for 5 minutes.

Mr. COCHRAN. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman of the committee, the Subcommittee on Education, Senator PELL, for yielding this time.

I am hoping that we can work out an agreement on this issue where we can clearly spell out in the bill the need for an understanding that nothing in this legislation seeks to abolish or in any way adversely affect teaching in homes or private schools. That effort is a challenge we are finding out, but we are working on that and I think people are trying to come together on some language there to get that understanding reflected in language that everybody can agree with. That is what is happening right now, Mr. President.

But I think this also illustrates how, while we may not agree on exact language, for instance, in this amendment right now, we are hoping we can come to an agreement. We all agree that education efforts need to be improved. I think the debate that we had on the Education Excellence Act today, and yesterday as well, has shown that Senators are strongly committed to supporting the effort to improve our Nation's schools, to improve teaching, to improve recruitment of teachers, trying to attract the better minds in our country to a career in education—these are goals that we all share.

Just the other day, for example, I was noticing an op-ed piece, an editorial in the Northeast Mississippi Daily Journal by Tom Pittman, who is the editor of that fine newspaper. He concludes with a sentence that it would be great news if we can "improve our schools to match the economic opportunities that we have."

He was talking specifically about northeast Mississippi because there are a lot of good things happening in that part of the State that illustrate the fact that new opportunities are being created for those who are capable, who have the skills, and who have the experience to handle some space age technology jobs.

But the challenge is to bring to the marketplace the skills and the know-how to take advantage of those opportunities. So I hope that, as we continue this debate today and put the final touches on this important legislation, we keep that goal in mind.

That is what we are trying to do—bring our opportunities, bring our education in line. We have a lot of new opportunities developing around the world with the changes that are occurring in Eastern Europe. It is really a dramatic time to be observing these changes. I feel that they are going to bring us new economic opportunities. I hope we are up to the challenge.

Mr. President, I think we will. One good first step is the passage of this important Excellence in Education Act.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I referred from the Northeast Mississippi Daily Journal be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Northeast Mississippi Daily Journal, Jan. 27, 1990]

NASA LAUNCHES CAMPAIGN FOR MATH AND SCIENCE

(By Tom Pittman)

I didn't know that Monday begins NASA Education Week when I went to Huntsville, Ala., earlier this week. Editorial Page Editor Joe Rutherford and I simply wanted to learn more about space-related industry like the NASA facility coming to Tishomingo County.

Huntsville proved a good example. Tupelo and this north Alabama city, which is less than 100 miles from the Tishomingo NASA site, were about the same size in 1950. Now Huntsville has 165,000 residents and an average household income of $37,508. It is one of "Inc." magazine's Top 10 hot spots in the nation and competes for businesses with California's Silicon Valley, Boston's Route 124 and North Carolina's Research Triangle.

We were cautioned not to expect Iuka to become another Huntsville, but who could have anticipated Huntsville's growth 40 years ago?

Among the 20 high-tech leaders we interviewed, the overriding concern was for more and better math and science education. Nationwide the predictions are that by the year 2000 the number of scientific jobs will far exceed the number of people qualified to fill them. Scientists and engineers are necessary for space, computer, electronics and other high-tech industries that are the wave of the future throughout the world.

A NASA leader pointed out that while the number of graduate engineering students in American universities has remained relatively stable, foreign citizens now compose more than half that number. And most of those students return to their homelands after graduation.

An advanced degree is not necessary for most high-tech jobs, however. There's a tremendous need for graduates of two-year college programs in automated manufacturing, who have learned math and science essential to their industries.

The concern we heard in Huntsville, however, is even more broadly based. It looks to spreading knowledge of math and science throughout the general population. A functional scientific literacy, you might say.

Numerous organizations—public and private—are using the space effort to stimulate students' interest in math and science. If students want to become part of that effort, they need at least a functional scientific literacy.

The Tishomingo County plant, we were told in Huntsville, will be NASA's largest construction project since 1964. The manufacturing process will be completely automated. There will be robots, artificial intelligence and all those other things that used to sound like science fiction.

The typical worker in the plant will need at least two years in automated manufacturing courses, have a basic knowledge of chemistry and be comfortable working with computers.

I hope Mississippi can supply those workers. Northeast Mississippi and Itawamba community colleges offer the courses. But if those colleges do not get enough qualified students into the courses, we were told that Alabama and Tennessee will. If Northeast Mississippi students want to work at the NASA facility in Tishomingo or any other high-tech industry anywhere in the world, they will need to develop beyond a functional scientific literacy.

The product of the Tishomingo County facility—Advanced Solid Rocket Motors—is necessary to increase the weight that the shuttle can carry. That means it is essential for building the space station, developing a colony on the moon and launching flights to Mars.

To avoid thinking those projects are more science fiction, consider the timetable. The first flight to begin constructing the space station is scheduled in five years. Plans call for completion of the space station before the end of the decade. The first flight to begin building the moon colony is scheduled for the year my older son finishes high school—2001. The first flight to Mars is projected for 2030. If all goes well, the Tishomingo facility will still be making Advanced Solid Rocket Motors for that flight.

Huntsville leaders expect President Bush to back up last year's commitment to the Mars flight when he makes his State of the Union address Tuesday night. That would be good news to Tishomingo County and all Northeast Mississippi.

It will be even better news if we in Northeast Mississippi can improve our schools to match the economic opportunities that we have.

Mr. PELL addressed the Chair.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIXON). The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President I ask the Senator how much time he desires.

I yield 6 minutes to the Senator from Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Oregon is recognized for 6 minutes.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, when I was home in Oregon in December and early January I had the opportunity to observe some truly valuable programs aimed at reducing the drug abuse problem among my State's youth. These are programs which could be implemented anywhere by any school or any individual.

One particularly innovative approach is a program called Self-Enhancement, Inc. This program serves at-risk students, those students who are involved or likely to become involved in drug abuse, street gangs or are likely to drop out of school. Portland is a magnificent city. But like all other cities we have a drug problem as well as inner-city gang problems, and these kids are taught that they can possibly succeed by joining the gang. Self-Enhancement is designed to teach them that they have options, that they have a way of getting out, that they can have faith in themselves and make it.

Self-Enhancement was founded by Tony Hobson in 1981 and it began in 1981 as a 1-week athletic camp for inner city Portland youth. With the assistance of Ray Leary, Self-Enhancement now serves approximately 700 students at 3 elementary schools, and 1 high school in inner city Portland.

Self-Enhancement is dedicated to the total learning experience of the urban child. Self-Enhancement strives to teach children that life has options. It seeks to increase self-esteem, improve academic skills, and encourage civic and community involvement, and through this process the students learn that they do indeed have choices other than the street, and other than the gang.

They learn that there are alternatives to abusing drugs and their bodies, and joining gangs. They learn that they as individuals have something positive to contribute to society.

Self-Enhancement, Tony Hobson and Ray Leary have been recognized by William Bennett, the Nation's drug czar, in his report on fighting back. They are among the community leaders cited by Secretary Bennett for his efforts in helping America win the war on drugs.

These community leaders are showing the Nation that communities can fight back and make a difference. I was very impressed by the kids in Self-Enhancement, and I am convinced that this program will make a difference in the lives of these children.

I want to mention another innovative approach to fighting the war on drugs. Crater High School in Central Point, OR, south Oregon, has undertaken a very effective poster campaign, and you will see the poster in the back that they started. This poster campaign work is not just an art contest; it is basically a pyramid club in which the school designs its own poster that says "We will win," and sends it on to five other schools, and the five other schools send them on to five others, each creating their own posters.

But the poster is not the point. What is involved in this program is a requirement that students from the school, leaders of the school, speak to the grade schools, to the community, and Mr. President, it is working. Crater High School put up this poster with the "We will win" slogan and sent it on to five other schools, and each school finds five others. There are several hundred schools today in this program which was started last November. Several hundred schools throughout the Nation are participating.

On the day that I was at the school, they had phone calls from Arkansas and Alaska wanting to participate in the program. During my visit to Crater High School in December—and bear in mind that this program had been going at that time only a month—five other schools came from around the State to Crater to join in the program. They were Grant Union High School in John Day, Eagle Point High School, Ashland High School, Phoenix High School, and South Medford High School. There are now several hundred schools nationwide committed to participating in the poster program, and that number continues to grow.

What Crater High School has started is probably more important than all the money Congress can put into the war against drugs. The very foundation of the poster campaign itself, peer pressure, is what makes the program work. If you can get high school students to talk to high school students and grade school students, it means much more than a parent or a teacher or the policeman on the beat. Peer pressure is one of the most effective tools there is. Money will not buy it, and Oregon high schools are proving it can succeed.

The programs I have described are just two of the innovative methods Oregonians have developed to fight this war. There are many more. I believe if we support these local grassroots efforts—in many cases already in place—as these posters indicate, "we will win" the war against drugs.

I thank the manager of the bill.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon yields the floor.

The manager, the Senator from Rhode Island is recognized.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, what is the time situation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time situation is that the Senator from Rhode Island, as manager, has 15 minutes, 3 seconds.

Mr. PELL. The Senator from North Carolina?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has no time.

Mr. PELL. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator yields the remainder of his time.

AMENDMENT NO. 1247 TO AMENDMENT NO. 1246

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I send an amendment in the second degree to the desk and ask that it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PELL] proposes an amendment, No. 1247 to amendment number 1246.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

In the pending amendment—

On line 1, strike "public".

On line 2, strike "public school".

On lines 4 and 5, strike "for competency in a discipline".

On line 6, strike "public schools".

On line 9, in lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted, insert the following: "has the same meaning given that term in section 1471(8) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965."

On line 13, in lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted, insert the following: "has the same meaning given that term in section 1471(21) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

Nothing in this Act shall be construed to infringe upon the practice or accreditation of home school or private school teaching.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, this amendment would simply make clear that this legislation would not infringe upon home or private school teaching. The important language, the governing language is: "Nothing in this Act shall be construed to infringe upon the practice or accreditation of home school or private school teaching."

I think that this amendment would meet the objections and concerns which have been raised, and I hope we can accept it and move on to the underlying amendment and to final passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further discussion of the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. HELMS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time will be charged to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. That is fine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, last evening I agreed to a unanimous consent in good faith assuming that there would be good faith on both sides. I think I have learned something about my future practices in the Senate. I do not think at this moment that I am ever going to agree to another time limitation or unanimous consent with respect to a piece of legislation.

I am being denied a vote on a perfectly sensible amendment by the offering of a second-degree amendment that is unclear. Maybe we can clear up the ambiguity of the meaning of the second-degree amendment, in which case I will say to the Chair that I have no pride of authorship in my underlying amendment. I think the underlying amendment is far superior to the second-degree amendment, but perhaps we can make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. Let us try by establishing some legislative history.

I would pose a couple questions to the distinguished managers of the bill. If they will turn to page 124 of the bill, line 8, or line 7 as a matter of fact, where it says "Section 1006. Authorized Activities," do we agree that section 1006 is compelling when it says "(a) In General, Federal funds received under this act may only be used for research and development activities directly related to the development"—and I repeat—"development of teacher assessment and certification procedures for elementary and secondary school teachers"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the distinguished senior Senator from North Carolina will yield, does he direct that question to the manager on our side or to the minority manager?

Mr. HELMS. To the managers, plural.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Would either manager care to yield to the Senator from North Carolina to respond to that inquiry?

The Senator from Kansas is recognized.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HELMS. Excuse me. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HELMS. I thought the hour was equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour is equally divided, may I say to the Senator from North Carolina. I thought he was presenting a question to the managers; was he not?

Mr. HELMS. Yes. But why would they have to yield to me? I thought I understood the Chair to say "Will either yield to me."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. I meant respond to the question. If I phrased that wrong, I apologize to the Senator from North Carolina. Is there an inquiry of the managers by the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HELMS. I would like to pose it to both of them, and I have posed it. Is this provision, section 1006, compelling? Do we really mean what we are saying with 1006?

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I might take a stab at responding to the Senator from North Carolina. Does the Senator mean compelling in stating that the development activities directly relate to the development of teacher assessment and certification procedures?

Mr. HELMS. Not exactly. I am saying that, I say to my good friend, whom I admire greatly, as she knows, that in line 9 the act reads "Federal funds received under this Act may only be used for research and development activities directly related to teacher assessment and certification procedures for elementary and secondary school teachers."

My question is whether or not the only purpose for which the Board may use the Federal funds granted them by the act is research and development, and that is all they can use the money for. If that is true, the word "only" in line 9 where the act reads "this Act may only be used for research and development activities" is out of place. It should read "This act may be used only for research and development activities." The "only" should not be where it is. But can we assume that the "only" is meant to precede the word "for"?

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I assume so.

Mr. HELMS. Does the distinguished manager agree with that?

Mr. PELL. I did not properly understand the question. Would the Senator repeat it?

Mr. HELMS. I am trying to lay out a little bit of legislative history as to the intent both of the bill and the second-degree amendment to my first-degree amendment.

Mr. PELL. And the Senator's question?

Mr. HELMS. It is fair to say that what was meant was Federal funds received under this act may be used only for research and development activities. Do you agree with that?

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I would agree with that. I am not an English teacher, but it seems to me that it means the same either way you read it.

Mr. PELL. I might say the same thing; "only be used," "used only," I do not see the difference.

Mr. HELMS. There is a vast difference between "only to be used" and "to be used only." My English teacher in high school, Miss Annie Lee, is looking down from the heavens and compelling me to make this inquiry. And I say "hello" to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. FOWLER. "Hello" to my friend from North Carolina.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I defer to the interpretation of the Senator from North Carolina, from a grammatic standpoint. I think regardless of which place "only" falls, it is clearly stated here.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator.

I assume that my distinguished chairman agrees with that.

Mr. PELL. It means exactly what it says, may only be used or used only, for research and development activities.

Mr. HELMS. I think the grammarians will agree with me about where "only" ought to be in that sentence.

Mr. COCHRAN. If the distinguished Senator from North Carolina will yield to me for an observation, I think he is eminently correct. I cannot see why we do not ask unanimous consent to move the word "only" where it should be. You pointed out a simple grammatic error that exists in the bill. I do not see why anyone would object to changing it.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator make that request?

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the word "only" in line 9, on page 124 of the bill, be struck and that it be substituted after the word "used" and before the word "for."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The statement of the Senator from Mississippi has been made.

Is there any objection to the unanimous consent request of the distinguished senior Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair and I thank my friend from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the change is made, and Miss Annie is happy wherever she is.

Mr. HELMS. I will say to the distinguished Presiding Officer that this may or may not tell us something about the school systems in America.

Now seriously, getting to the point that I wanted to make, two or three questions, and I will direct these, Mr. President, to the managers of the bill.

Can I be assured that this second-degree amendment will not permit the Board to develop competency assessments or standards for home-schooling parents?

Mrs. KASSEBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. If I may respond with my interpretation, I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that, yes, indeed that would be the case.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the majority manager have comment to the Senator?

Mr. PELL. I fail to understand the specific question. Will the Senator repeat it, please?

Mr. HELMS. The Senator wants me to repeat the question a little louder?

Would the distinguished chairman, the manager of the bill for the majority, assure me that the second-degree amendment now pending will not permit the Board to develop competency assessments or standards for home-schooling parents?

I ask that question, Mr. President, because it has been repeatedly said over and over again on this floor that we need not worry about this point.

I do worry about it because in section 1004 of this bill it states that the bill will use the same definitions as the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. The definition of "elementary and secondary" schools in the 1964 act includes "day and residential" schools as well as public schools. So by my literal reading of section 1006 of the pending legislation, it would appear that the National Board will be able to use Federal funds to develop "teacher assessment and certification procedures" for residential schools—which means home-schools if I am not mistaken.

What I am asking the distinguished manager of the bill for the majority is whether he can assure me that the pending second-degree amendment will not permit the National Board to use Federal funds to develop teacher assessments or standards for home-schooling parents.

If the answer to this question is "yes," then I will ask one more question and I will be through.

Mr. PELL. In other words, what the Senator is saying, can I assure him that the Board will not make competency tests compulsory for home schools; is that right?

Mr. HELMS. I prefer my phraseology on it. Will not permit the Board to develop competency assessment or standards for home-schooling parents. That is the King's English.

Mr. PELL. In other words, is the competency test mandatory? The answer is it is not mandatory.

Mr. HELMS. That answer has nothing to do with my question.

Mr. PELL. If the home school teacher, for example, asked to take a competency test for it, should they be denied it? No, I do not think so.

Mr. HELMS. That is an analogy that escapes me, I say to my friend. But if they ask for it, that is another kettle of fish.

Mr. PELL. Another kettle of fish?

Mr. HELMS. Yes.

Mr. PELL. I do not see how if the Board receives a request from a teacher in a private school, or if that private school makes a request to the Board for a teacher in the school to take a competency test, such a request should be denied.

Mr. HELMS. I thought we had the burden of the argument on the other side from the very beginning that this bill does not touch or intend to touch home-schooling or private or religious schools. Was all this so much gibberish that I heard yesterday and last night and this morning, or is it fact? What is correct? Are we leaving out the home-school or leaving out the religious school or the private school?

Mr. PELL. We say nothing in this act shall be construed to infringe upon the practice or accreditation of home-school or private school teaching. I think that phrase covers the point the Senator made.

Mr. HELMS. In that case, if that is what the Senator meant, then the answer to my question is yes; is that correct?

Mr. PELL. I am not sure I understand the question.

Mr. HELMS. Let me read it again. I will read it. I wrote it out so I would say it the same way each time.

Can the Senator assure me, as Senator KASSEBAUM already has, that the pending amendment will not permit the Board to develop compentency assessments or standards for home-schooling parents?

Mr. PELL. I am informed that it will not permit it.

Mr. HELMS. If you are saying the answer is yes, the ballgame is over and we can go to a vote.

Mr. PELL. When I say "yes," I want to be able to stand by it. This act would not have an impact, in any way, on private or home schools.

Mr. HELMS. Including development of competency assessments or standards for home-schooling parents?

Mr. PELL. Unless they requested it.

Mr. HELMS. Well, I think I will buy that because it will snow in August before a home-schooling parent will request that. May I have the chairman's attention?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. My next question is, Does the pending second-degree amendment permit the board to develop competency assessments or standards for teachers in private religious schools? Is the same answer applicable?

Mr. PELL. As far as I am concerned, the same answer would be applicable.

Mr. HELMS. Fine. We are making some headway here.

Now, the last question, and this is important legislative history, and those who read it in months and years to come will understand why I have been so careful in the articulation of my question.

Will Federal funds provided by this act be used for Board testing of teachers?

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. My understanding is the Federal funds would not be used for board testing.

Mr. HELMS. Very good.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. This is an initiative where there is reasearch done on professional standards that could be used as a guideline.

Mr. HELMS. In other words, what my colleague is stating is, section 1006(a) on lines 7 through 12, on page 124, where it reads, "Federal funds received under this act"—as modified by my friend from Mississippi—"may be used only for research and development activities directly related to the development of teacher assessment and certification procedures for elementary and secondary school teachers" means that Federal funds cannot be used to implement, conduct, or enforce any teacher assessment or certification procedures.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. That is correct.

Mr. HELMS. Does the manager agree?

Mr. PELL. I do.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, we have nailed down the point that was of primary interest to me and I think to the home-schooling parents and to teachers and administrators of private religious schools.

I do not see any difference between the underlying amendment and the second-degree amendment, and I have no objection to the amendment.

I yield back any time I may have.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the Senator yield just a minute to me?

Mr. HELMS. Absolutely.

Mr. COCHRAN. I want to compliment and thank the distinguished Senator from North Carolina for helping to make this clear so we all understand what the facts are about whether this has any impact on or adversely affects the interests of those who go to school in their own homes.

Mr. HELMS. Right.

Mr. COCHRAN. I think the answer is clear now that it does not act adversely. I thank the Senator for getting us to this point so that is resolved.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Will the Senator yield just a moment?

Mr. HELMS. Absolutely.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I would say to the Senator from North Carolina that I appreciate his help in working out some language which I believe is a little clearer in getting across the message and the intent of the language from the Senator from North Carolina.

I very much appreciate his willingness to try to clarify the language.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Kansas, the junior Senator, is always gracious and she is always kind, and I thank her.

Mr. PELL. I thank my ranking minority member for her help in this, which was tremendous; and I thank the Senator from North Carolina for his willingness to work out this accommodation.

But I suggest we vitiate the order for the yeas and nays on the underlying amendment—we have not called for them on this amendment—and by voice vote adopt the underlying amendment as amended and move on to final passage.

Mr. HELMS. I think that is fine, unless somebody wants to build up their voting record a little bit.

Have the yeas and nays been ordered on final passage, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ADAMS). They have been ordered on the Helms amendment, not the second-degree or final passage.

Mr. HELMS. I judge the Senator is going to vitiate the yeas and nays?

Mr. PELL. I would ask to vitiate the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Have the yeas and nays been ordered on final passage?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time on the amendment?

Mr. PELL. I yield such time as he may need to the majority leaders.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, as Members of the Senate know, President Carter is here to brief Members of the Senate on the election process in Nicaragua. That was scheduled from 2 to 3. He has a similar meeting with House Members at 3 o'clock.

I am going to suggest to the managers—I have discussed this with the distinguished Republican leader—that they complete action on the amendment and then I am going to ask unanimous consent that we go into recess and have the vote on final passage at 3:15, unless there is some objection by the managers or any interested Senators, because we will not have time for the briefing otherwise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask decision on my request be withheld for a moment.

Because of commitments by other Senators, when I make the request I am going to modify it and suggest the vote occur at 3.

Mr. President, I ask whether action on the pending amendment has yet occurred?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, it has not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will yield to the manager to permit that to occur and then, after this occurs, I will make the unanimous-consent request which I have just sought.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I would like to express my support for the Helms amendment as modified by Senator PELL. I have received several hundred phone calls and letters from constituents of mine who are concerned about the effect the funding of the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards would have on teachers in private schools or on parents who choose to teach their children in their home. While I support efforts to increase professionalism in teaching, I do share the concerns that some have expressed that the establishment of such a certification process could infringe on the rights of private schoolteachers and home-schoolers. I strongly support the traditional structure of our current educational system that leaves certification authority to the States. For this reason, I support the Helms amendment which would prohibit the NBPTS from establishing certification for private or home-school individuals. The amendment by Senator PELL clearifies that if a home-school parent or a private schoolteacher wishes to become certified under the NBPTS' certification process, that they are not prohibited from doing so. You can be sure that I will be following the development of this program to ensure that it continues to operate as intended in a voluntary manner.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do the managers yield back the remainder of their time?

Mr. PELL. I yield back the remainder of our time.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The remainder of the time having been yielded back by all parties, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PELL. I vitiated the request for the yeas and nays on amendment No. 1246.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been a vitiation of the request for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PELL. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no further debate, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The amendment (No. 1247) was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Now the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, as amended.

The amendment (No. 1246), as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I inquire now whether all that remains is the rollcall vote on final passage on the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We have to adopt the substitute amendment, as has been amended and voted upon, read the bill a third time, and then it is ready for a vote on final passage.

The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as we near a final vote on this bill, I would like to recognize our colleagues and their staffs who put this bill together. As he always does, Senator PELL provided distinguished leadership on an education bill. Senator PELL has been the "education senator" for many years and it is always a pleasure to work with him. His staff, David Evans, Ann Young, Sarah Flanagan, Marissa Quinn, and Merry Richter, and Mike Epstein did their usual professional job.

Senator KASSEBAUM should also be commended for her work on this bill. Filling Bob Stafford's shoes on an education bill is a big task, but she did an excellent job. I also wish to say that her staff, Susan Hatton, Becky Rogers, and Linda Wood all did fine work.

Other members and staff of the Labor Committee played a major role in this process. Senator DODD and his staffer, Joan Hogan, did much of the work on the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards. Cheryl Smith on Senator SIMON's staff, Meg Thale and Cheryl Birdsall from Senator METZENBAUM's office, and Terry Muilenberg from Senator HARKIN's office, also played a major role in this bill.

I want to commend Senator HATCH, the ranking minority member of the Labor Committee, for his work on the bill and to thank Laurie Chivers of his staff. I would also like to recognize Pam Kruse of Senator JEFFORDS' office and Doris Dixon of Senator COHEN's office.

Finally, I want to especially thank my own staff who worked on this bill. Amanda Broun, Rusty Barbour, and Terry Hartle did an excellent job and their interns, Michael Epp, Melissa Soza, and Jeffrey Blackburn also made important contributions.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 695, the Excellence in Education Act of 1990. President Bush has asked for congressional cooperation on education, and I am pleased to see legislative evidence of his yearning for educational quality in America. I am glad to join with the President in supporting scholarships for math and science students, funding for historically black colleges and universities, encouragement of alternative certification programs, and loan-default reforms.

Mr. President, I also support title X of this act which authorizes research and development funds for the National Board of Professional Teaching Standards. This effort reminds me of legislation I introduced in 1983 to raise teacher salaries and give them more control over their profession. A panoply of studies in that year trumpeted the need for improved education. A common thread among those studies and many which followed—including the Carnegie Corp. study which gave rise to the National Board—has been the need for increased professionalism in teaching. Under my earlier bill, State commissions of teachers would establish standards for entry into teaching, coordinate inservice programs, and develop curricula, and the Federal Government would supplement the salary of each teacher to repay the months of extra work.

Mr. President, I am glad to see a similar idea resurface and I strongly support it. On every count, this is a fine effort in tune with the history of the Federal involvement in education and with the purposes of the parts of this bill requested by the President. Specifically, the Federal Government has committed itself to ensuring that each child receives an education which will allow him or her to understand and exercise America's rights and freedoms and to take equal advantage of her wealth of opportunities. The Federal Government has also addressed itself to national needs and crises in education. President Bush has proclaimed a commitment to increased quality and has followed that proclamation with legislation which places an emphasis on rewards for quality.

Today we are faced with a national crisis in the availability of quality teachers. More than half of our new teachers quit during the first 5 years of teaching, and we are graduating only about half as many teachers as we will need to fill openings in the next decade. We also need improved specialization for the populations that Federal aid has targeted in the past. As the Quality Education for Minorities project has pointed out recently, minorities make up 30 percent of our K-12 students, but fewer than 10 percent of our teachers. The National Board addresses all of these concerns. Recognizable, respected, portable, credentials will assure parents that their children are being challenged by capable, knowledgeable educators who view teaching as a long-term commitment to excellence. Professional credentials will also give teaching the respect and economic drawing power needed to make sure that the best students enter teaching and are properly rewarded—as Albert Einstein said, "A society which pays its teachers less than its plumbers will have neither good teachers nor good plumbers." And the Board's priorities—research and development on the teaching of mathematics, sciences, foreign languages, and literacy—could not be more appropriate in our climate of increasing international competitiveness, increasing needs for technological expertise, and inadequate progress on literacy.

Mr. President, the public schools of America have been, by and large, an American success story. Central to that success has been the provision of teachers of a quality commensurate with the needs of the day. Our needs are increasing, but we as a nation are treading water on education. Look at our education budget and look at the interest costs on our deficit which will jump over the next year by $23 billion. This incremental increase in debt service could double our education spending, but instead it is buying nothing. For the security and prosperity of this Nation, we must reorder our priorities, and that reordering must begin at the level of personal aspirations and of personal and community perceptions. I urge my colleagues to join me in a significant step in that direction by supporting the National Board of Professional Teaching Standards.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to see the Senate move toward passage of the President's Educational Excellence Act. The initiatives at the core of this bill—Presidential merit schools, the New Schools of Excellence Program, alternative certification for teachers and principals, endowment assistance for historically black colleges and universities, and the National Science Scholars Program—will help us achieve the education goals outlined by the President in his State of the Union Address. I commend the President for putting forward the proposals on which this legislation is based and I thank my colleague from Kansas for all she has done on behalf of this important measure.

The legislation before us is designed to reward educational excellence, target Federal funds to the most needy, promote flexibility, and bring about more accountability for results. These principles have guided the education policy of the President and Secretary of Education Lauro Cavazos. And they are ideas the American people endorse.

Americans know that the existing education system is failing their children—and they want and demand change. At the same time, they believe education should remain a State responsibility and a local function. Parents don't want Uncle Sam dictating what or how their children learn. Where the Federal Government should be most involved is in ensuring access to education by the disadvantaged, promoting innovation, and rewarding academic excellence. This bill will strengthen the Federal Government's leadership role in these critical areas.

Mr. President, I am very disappointed that the bill includes certain provisions which were not a part of the President's package and which, though well intentioned, will not in my view ultimately advance the goals of this legislation. In particular, I do not support the authorization of funding for the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards, for many of the same reasons the White House and some of my colleagues have expressed. I hope that these concerns will be fully addressed by the other body. If they are not addressed, and title 10 remains in the bill, I for one will support the administration if they ultimately oppose the bill.

Notwithstanding my serious concerns about this particular component of the bill, I would still urge my colleagues to give this measure their support. We all know what is at stake. Without a sound education system, we won't have a competitive economy or a functioning democracy. President Bush clearly understands the seriousness of the situation, and he has responded by putting forward the proposals on which this bill is based and by forging a compact with the Nation's Governors to improve the quality of education. I commend the President on his commitment, and I urge the Senate to act favorably on his education initiative.

Mr. SHELBY. Mr. President, I rise today in support of S. 695, the Educational Excellence Act of 1989. The legislation would recognize and reward excellence in education, target Federal funds to those who need it most, encourage educational choice and flexibility, and assure greater accountability in education.

I an encouraged by this legislation which would increase funding to the Department of Education by over $400 million.

Specifically, the incentives propose: $200 million for merit schools; $50 million for schools of excellence; $15 million for alternative teacher and principal certification; $6 million for the National Science Scholars Program; $25 million for drug-free schools; $20 million for historically black colleges and universities; $50 million for "We the People"; $5 million for the President's Council on Academic Excellence; $25 million for middle school teaching demonstration programs; and $25 million for research and development for the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards.

This increased funding for education is commendable—but more is needed to ensure that students in the richest country in the world receive an education that is second to none.

We all become very concerned when we hear that America is losing its competitive edge with foreign countries. But how can we remain competitive if our education system is not turning out a work force that can work within this highly advanced, technologically oriented world?

Data prepared by the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics show a direct correlation between education and jobs. For example, March 1988 figures indicate that: 88 percent of all college graduates ages 25 to 64 were in the labor force; 83 percent of individuals with 1 to 3 years of college had jobs; 77 percent of individuals with only a high school diploma had jobs; and only 61 percent of persons with less than a high school diploma had jobs.

It is increasingly clear that the most rapidly growing jobs though the year 2000 will require relatively more education.

In 1983, the White House released a 5-year report ominously entitled "A Nation at Risk" which documented the inadequacies of the American system of education. The report came to a startling conclusion: "Our Nation is at risk * * * the educational foundations of our society are presently being eroded by a rising tide of mediocrity that threatens our very future as a nation and a people."

A 1988 update to the 1983 report, entitled "Making It Work," claims that we have made progress. Education is now the single largest budget item in all but 2 of the 50 States. However, the report hastens to add that we are not doing well enough, fast enough.

Let me share with you some of my concerns about the State of Alabama's educational system. I am deeply concerned that we still rank near the bottom in education.

Of the 28 States who test their high school graduates with the same test we use, Alabama students score eighth from the bottom.

With respect to the number of students for each teacher, Alabama teachers have larger classes than 42 other States.

Forty States pay their teachers more than Alabama does.

And we're almost last in the expenditures per pupil category with only two States spending less money per pupil than Alabama.

Every year, I conduct countywide town meetings in all 67 counties of my State. The people are always concerned about education. And invariably the question is, "How can we improve education?" I always answer that question with the old adage, "You get what you pay for." We've got to invest in the education system.

I believe that the education of our children is our most important national obligation and that the States cannot fulfill this obligation without further assistance from the Federal Government. The legislation that we are considering today would go a long way toward providing the kind of financial assistance needed by the States.

As I stated earlier, the relative competitiveness of the U.S. economy will to a large extent depend on the relative performance of our education system. Thus, there may be useful lessons to be learned from looking at comparative data from other countries.

Elementary and secondary students in the United States in 1985 had an average school year of 180 days versus 243 days for students in Japan.

Between 1983 and 1986, American elementary and secondary students scored substantially worse than Japanese students on science achievement tests.

In 1982, United States scored substantially worse than Japanese students on mathematics achievement tests and worse also than students in Canada, France, Sweden, and Great Britain.

In 1984, the starting salary of a Japanese high school teacher was 15 percent higher than the starting salary of a white-collar employee with an equivalent degree.

In Japan, about 200,000 applicants compete annually for about 38,000 teacher vacancies in the public school system. In the United States most large urban school systems experience difficulty in finding applicants to fill projected vacancies.

In 1985, 62 percent of the United States educational expenditures were for primary and secondary education versus 75 percent for Japan and 80 percent for West Germany.

I believe that these data indicate that the Nation which pioneered free public education is rapidly losing its leadership role to other nations—other nations whose leaders have recognized that the children are a country's greatest asset.

I would like to suggest that if the United States is to regain its competitive position in the world economy, we must raise by quantum leaps the quality of our public education system. In spite of the harm that has been done by years of neglect, these are not times for despair. We must remind ourselves that this great Nation was not built by men and women lacking in vision, courage, or a capacity for hard work.

Moreover, I believe that the initiatives that we have discussed here today represent important steps toward educational excellence. As we pursue these and other initiatives, let us resolve not to forget a painful lesson of recent history; that is, that an America that fails to invest adequately in the future of its children runs the risk of destroying its children's legacy and falling short of being the richest, most democratic, best educated, and most powerful Nation in the world.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of the Educational Excellence Act of 1989. This year, Congress must come to grips with the competitive challenge facing America—and the front line will be the battle to improve our schools. This bill makes a good stride toward this important goal.

Many of my colleagues, myself included, were concerned about the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards provision of the bill. But the language on this has been worked out—and I am convinced that it will not interfere with home-schooling and private schools.

We have a great task before us: preparing tomorrow's Americans for the greatest economic struggle of our country's history. We begin this task today, with this bill. That is why I was an original cosponsor of the bill—and that is why I'm voting for it.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, we have spent many hours discussing this bill. Most of the debate, however, has focused on title X, which would federalize teacher certification. I participated in that debate, expressing my opposition to Federal Government intrusion into teacher standards and certification.

The President also opposes title X, even though he supports the rest of the bill. The rest of the bill, in fact, is the President's bill. I am sure that many Senators find themselves in the same situation as I. That is, I enthusiastically support the majority of the Excellence in Education Act, but adamantly oppose one title.

Despite my opposition to title X, it does not seem appropriate to me to let that one bad apple spoil the whole bushel basket of excellent educational programs contained in S. 695. Therefore I will cast my vote in favor of final passage of S. 695.

I hope the House of Representatives will omit any reference to the National Board of Professional Teaching Practices when it takes up the bill. In the event that title X remains in the bill essentially as passed by the Senate, and if the President thus vetoes the legislation on the grounds of his opposition to title X, I will then vote to sustain the President's veto. Since the bulk of the bill is his legislation, I feel that he has the right to treat it in the manner he feels would best meet the needs of our country's education programs.

I believe this statement clarifies my position on this legislation and on title X, in the event that the Senate will later need to react to a Presidential veto.

Mr. KOHL. Mr. President, I have received a number of calls from my constituents in the State of Wisconsin in the past 2 days. I am being urged to vote against S. 695, the Education Excellence Act.

This bill includes a number of provisions which the President asked Congress to pass last spring as a part of his educational initiatives. Included in the bill are provisions establishing a Merit-based National Science Scholars Program, to provide scholarships to outstanding students to go on to college in the areas of science, math, and engineering. The bill also establishes Presidential Merit Schools, which will receive cash awards for substantial progress in: First, raising student educational achievement; second, creating a drug-free and safe school environment; and third, reducing the dropout rate. In addition, one section of the bill modifies requirements for determining eligibility for aid for those continuing on in higher education programs.

Another provision of the bill extends the School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act. Under this act, the Milwaukee Public Schools and the Milwaukee Area Technical College received grants to help work on innovative solutions for reducing the dropout rate in the Milwaukee area. In addition, Lac Du Flambeau Band of Lake Chippewa Indians also received a grant to reduce the high dropout rate among students in their community.

Due to the controversy concerning this bill, I carefully weighed the arguments for and against the bill and came down in favor of this set of educational programs. In listening to the concerns raised by my constituents, I found that many had been given misinformation about the bill.

I learned that concern was really limited to but one section of the bill, title X, providing for a one-time authorization to support the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards. I also learned that there really wasn't a clear understanding of this section of the bill.

Let me quote directly from the bill in order to provide you with a better understanding as to what the bill is authorizing, and the reasons behind Federal funding for the Board:

The Congress finds that—

(1) the economic well-being and national security of the United States depends on efforts to strengthen the educational system to provide all children with an education which will ensure a well-educated workforce;

(2) improved teaching is central to the goal of ensuring a well-educated workforce;

(3) incentives to enhance the professionalism and status of teaching can be provided through the development and promulgation of voluntary standards of professional certification that are rigorous and unbiased, that complement and support State licensing practices and recognize the diversity of American society;

(4) the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards, a private nonprofit organization has been created to establish such voluntary standards and a significant initial investment in research and development from non-Federal sources will be required to create such a system of professional certification; and

(5) the Federal Government has played an active role in funding vital educational research and can continue to support this national effort by providing limited but essential support for critical research activities.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to provide financial assistance to the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards to enable the board to conduct independent research and development related to the establishment of national, voluntary professional standards and assessment methods for the teaching profession.

This section of the bill is designed to enhance the profession of teaching in the hopes of both retaining the best and the brightest already in the profession, and in attracting outstanding individuals to the profession. The National Board will facilitate research to help identify what is working, and what is needed in our classrooms to provide the best educational environment possible for our Nation's youth. State certification standards are not affected by this provision, nor are home-based schools.

In order to make certain that there be no misunderstanding as to congressional intent, an amendment to title X was approved unanimously by the Senate, which adds the following language to title X: "Nothing in this act shall be construed to infringe upon the practice or accreditation of home school or private school teaching."

I feel strongly about education in this country. When an opportunity is presented to vote in favor of an education bill which will help our Nation's youth I will vote for it.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, everyone in this Chamber—indeed everyone in this country—will agree that we need to do more to promote educational excellence in our society. The legislation before us, S. 695, moves beyond mere good intentions and proposes a blueprint for change and improvement in our educational system—from grade school through the secondary and postsecondary levels. Accordingly, I am proud to support the Educational Excellence Act.

In his State of the Union Address last week, the President outlined a number of ambitious educational goals to be met by the year 2000: a 90-percent high school graduation rate, a drug-free school environment, and a challenge to place U.S. students first in the world in math and science achievement. These goals can only be reached if each of us demand more from students, teachers, schools, parents, and from ourselves.

The Excellence in Education Act represents a significant step toward meeting the educational challenges of the next decade, and beyond.

I am particularly pleased with two aspects of this proposal: The Presidential Merit Schools Program and the National Science Scholars Program. Both programs encourage and reward the best in American education.

This act authorizes $200 million for a new national program to reward outstanding schools: merit schools. At a time when many of the Nation's classrooms are in crisis, it is appropriate to recognize deserving schools that have distinguished themselves through raising educational achievement, establishing a drug-free climate, and increasing graduation rates.

This legislation also authorizes $6 million to establish a merit-based National Science Scholars Program to reward achieving high school students who will continue their study of the sciences, math, and engineering at the postsecondary level.

Some may say that $6 million is only a drop in the bucket—if we are serious about returning American students to the top in global science and math achievement, more money is needed. This new proposal, however, is an important step in reclaiming American supremacy in math and science achievement. This new funding indicates that America is willing to do more to encourage our young students to pursue a career in the sciences.

The most contentious provision in this legislation is title X. Title X will authorize $25 million over 3 years for the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards to develop a set of teacher certification standards for elementary and secondary school teachers throughout the United States.

I fully support the need for high and rigorous standards for our Nation's teachers. Teachers represent a distinguished profession and a system must be established to identify and certify the Nation's most outstanding teachers. The National Board for Professional Teaching Standards, in my opinion, is best prepared to develop a set of voluntary examinations to help teachers distinguish themselves within their profession.

Nevertheless, I must agree with my distinguished colleague from Kansas [Mrs. KASSEBAUM]. The Federal Government must encourage competitiveness when considering grant proposals of this magnitude. The funding that this legislation calls for, $25 million over 3 years, is simply too much to direct to one group—even such a deserving group as the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards—on a noncompetitive basis.

This $25 million grant would represent approximately 20 percent of the Department of Education's entire research budget. It is imprudent to designate this large sum without the benefit of a competitive process.

I supported Senator KASSEBAUM's amendment to S. 695 because in my view the Federal Government should not make it a practice to award such a sizable grant without the benefit of a competitive bidding process. The Department of Education should make the final decision on what group is best prepared to establish the criteria for recognizing outstanding American teachers.

In closing, I would like to commend Senator KASSEBAUM and the entire Committee on Labor and Human Resources for bringing this legislation to the Senate floor.

It is my hope that the Excellence in Education Act will serve as a guide for members of the educational community who share our deep concern for promoting excellence and achievement in America's classrooms.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I renew my inquiry. Is there any further action remaining on this bill, other than a rollcall vote on final passage?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No further action is required, and the yeas and nays have been ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

RECESS UNTIL 3 P.M.; ROLLCALL VOTE ON S. 695

Mr. MITCHELL. Accordingly, Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 3 p.m. and that at 3 p.m., the rollcall vote occur on final passage of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 3 P.M.

Thereupon, at 2:10 p.m., the Senate recessed until 3 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. REID].

EXCELLENCE IN EDUCATION ACT OF 1989

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

The result was announced—yeas 92, nays 8, as follows:

TITLE I—IMPROVING ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION

PART A—PRESIDENTIAL SCHOOLS OF DISTINCTION

SEC. 101. PRESIDENTIAL SCHOOLS OF DISTINCTION.

Title IV of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 2701 et seq.) is amended by adding at the end thereof a new part G to read as follows:

"PART G—PRESIDENTIAL SCHOOLS OF DISTINCTION

"SEC. 4701. SHORT TITLE.

"This part may be cited as the 'Presidential Schools of Distinction Act'.

"SEC. 4702. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

"(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

"(1) the basic goal of all schools is to develop the skills and abilities of students to their maximum potential;

"(2) achievable standards of excellence can and should be set for all students and for all schools;

"(3) financial incentives can spur schools to rise to the challenge of meeting these standards; and

"(4) improvement in the quality of our educational system is vital to the Nation's future, and demonstrated schoolwide progress in achieving excellence deserves public recognition.

"(b) PURPOSE.—The purpose of this part is to recognize and reward public and private elementary and secondary schools that have made substantial progress in—

"(1) raising student educational achievement;

"(2) creating a safe and drug-free school environment; and

"(3) reducing the dropout rate.

"SEC. 4703. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—The amount authorized to be appropriated for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this part for each of the fiscal years 1991, 1992, and 1993 is an amount equal to the lesser of—

"(1) the excess, if any, of—

"(A) the amount appropriated to carry out parts A, B, D, E, and F of chapter 1, of title I, of this Act for such fiscal year, over

"(B) $5,090,000,000, or

"(2) the excess, if any, of—

"(A) the amount appropriated to carry out part C of chapter 1 of title I of this Act for such fiscal year, over

"(B) $200,000,000.

"(b) LIMITATION.—The amount authorized to be appropriated under subsection (a) shall not exceed $200,000,000 for fiscal year 1991.

"SEC. 4704. ALLOCATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

"(a) RESERVATION.—From the amount appropriated under section 4703 for any fiscal year, the Secretary may reserve up to one quarter of 1 per centum for grants to Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, and Palau (until the effective date of the Compact of Free Association with the Government of Palau) for activities under this part.

"(b) ALLOCATION AMONG STATES.—(1) The amount remaining after any reservation of funds under subsection (a) shall be allocated to States as follows:

"(A) from one half of such amount, each State shall be allocated an amount that bears the same ratio to such amount as the number of children aged five to seventeen, inclusive, in the State bears to the number of such children in all such States, according to the most recent available data that are satisfactory to the Secretary; and

"(B) the other one half of such amount shall be allocated among such States on the same basis as funds are allocated among such States under section 1005 of this Act for the same fiscal year.

"(2) For purposes of this subsection, the term 'State' means each of the fifty States, the District of Columbia, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

"SEC. 4705. STATE APPLICATIONS.

"(a) THREE-YEAR APPLICATION.—Each State that wishes to receive a grant under this part shall submit to the Secretary, through its State educational agency, an application for a three-year period, at such time and in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe.

"(b) APPLICATION CONTENTS.—Each State application shall contain—

"(1) the criteria the State educational agency will use to select Presidential Schools of Distinction under section 4708;

"(2) the criteria it will use to determine the amount of awards;

"(3) an assurance that it will carry out this part in accordance with the requirements of this part and other applicable legal requirements; and

"(4) other information the Secretary may require.

"(c) GEPA PROVISIONS INAPPLICABLE.—Sections 435 and 436 of the General Education Provisions Act, except to the extent that such sections relate to fiscal control and fund accounting procedures, shall not apply to this part.

"SEC. 4706. STATE USE OF FUNDS.

"(a) ADMINISTRATION.—Each State educational agency may use up to 5 per centum of its grant for the administrative costs of carrying out this part.

"(b) PRESIDENTIAL SCHOOL OF EXCELLENCE AWARDS.—Each State educational agency shall use at least 95 per centum of its grant for Presidential School of Distinction Awards made in accordance with section 4708.

"(c) INSULAR AREAS.—The provisions of Public Law 95-134, permitting the consolidation of grants to the Insular Areas, shall not apply to funds received by such areas under this part.

"SEC. 4707. STATE ACTIVITIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES.

"(a) STATE REVIEW PANEL.—(1) Each State educational agency shall establish a State review panel to assist in the selection of Presidential Schools of Distinction.

"(2) The State review panel shall be broadly representative of the following interests in the State—

"(A) elementary and secondary school teachers and administrators;

"(B) college and university faculty and administrators;

"(C) parents;

"(D) State and local boards of education;

"(E) State and local governments;

"(F) labor;

"(G) business; and

"(H) the general public.

"(b) ANNUAL REPORTS TO THE SECRETARY.—(1) Within sixty days of making Presidential School of Distinction Awards under this part for any fiscal year, each State educational agency shall submit a report to the Secretary that—

"(A) identifies the schools chosen as Presidential Schools of Distinction;

"(B) states the reasons for their selection; and

"(C) states the amount of their awards.

"(2) Beginning with the second year for which any State educational agency receives funds under this part, its annual report shall also include a brief description of how schools selected in the previous year used their awards.

"SEC. 4708. SELECTION OF PRESIDENTIAL SCHOOL OF DISTINCTION.

"(a) ELIGIBLE SCHOOLS.—(1) A State educational agency may designate as a Presidential School of Distinction any public or private elementary or secondary school in the State whose students are receiving services under chapter 1 of title I of this Act that has been nominated through procedures established by such agency.

"(2) In selecting Presidential Schools of Distinction, each State educational agency shall apply the selection criteria uniformly.

"(3) DISTRIBUTION OF AWARDS.—Each State educational agency shall make at least one Presidential School of Distinction Award in each congressional district.

"(b) CRITERIA ESTABLISHED BY SECRETARY.—(1) The Secretary shall establish minimum criteria to be used by every State educational agency in selecting Presidential Schools of Distinction.

"(2) The criteria established by the Secretary shall address—

"(A) progress in improving educational performance, with particular emphasis on mastery of reading, writing, and mathematics skills;

"(B) the degree to which the school demonstrates progress in achieving and maintaining a safe environment, including reduction or elimination of problems related to drug and alcohol use; and

"(C) secondary school progress in reducing the number of students who drop out of school or in encouraging those who have dropped out to reenter school and complete their schooling.

"(c) STATE CRITERIA.—(1) Based on the selection criteria established by the Secretary, as required by subsection (b), each State educational agency shall establish additional criteria that measure progress in such areas as—"(A) student achievement, as measured by such factors as year-to-year improvement in test scores, college entrance rates, and employment of graduates in jobs with significant potential for career development; and

"(B) other indicators of a school's success, such as improvements in school leadership, the teaching and learning environment, and parental and community support and involvement.

"(2) In setting criteria for Presidential Schools of Distinction, the State educational agency shall establish standards that recognize the composition of the student body and other relevant factors, and that give special consideration to schools with substantial numbers of proportions of children from low-income families. The State educational agency may also set different criteria for different grade levels.

"(3) In applying the criteria to a school in which a program is conducted under part A of chapter 1 of title I of this Act, the State educational agency shall consider the desired outcomes identified for children in the application submitted under section 1012(b) of this Act by the local educational agency operating the school. No school that a local educational agency has identified under section 1021(b) of this Act shall be eligible for a Presidential School of Distinction Award until such time as the school has demonstrated progress in complying with the provisions of the State or local improvement plan set forth under section 1020 or 1021 of this Act.

"(4) In selecting Presidential Schools of Distinction and in setting the amount of their awards, the State educational agency may not consider a school's planned use of a Presidential School of Distinction award.

"(5) Except as provided in section 4706, each State educational agency receiving assistance under this Act shall make the same number of awards to elementary schools within the State as such State educational agency makes to secondary schools within the State.

"(d) AMOUNT OF AWARD.—(1) Each State educational agency shall establish criteria, subject to subsection (c)(4), including criteria relating to the size of the school and the economic circumstances of the student body, for determining the amount of Presidential School of Distinction Awards.

"(2) The amount of Presidential School of Distinction Awards shall be substantially equivalent among congressional districts.

"(e) BYPASS.—If a State educational agency is either prohibited by State law from providing funds made available under this part to private schools, or is unwilling to do so, it shall notify the Secretary of such prohibition or unwillingness, as well as the private schools it has designated as Presidential Schools of Distinction and the amount of their awards. The Secretary shall then provide those funds, from the State's allocation under this part, to the designated private schools, through such arrangements as the Secretary finds suitable. The Secretary shall also withhold from the State's allocation under this part the administrative costs of making such arrangements.

"(a) PRESIDENTIAL CERTIFICATES OF DISTINCTION.—Each Presidential School of Distinction shall be awarded a Presidential Certificate of Distinction.

"(b) AWARDS CEREMONY.—The Secretary is authorized to accept gifts to pay the costs of conducting awards ceremonies for Presidential Schools of Distinction.

"SEC. 4710. PUBLIC SCHOOL USE OF FUNDS BY PRESIDENTIAL SCHOOLS OF DISTINCTION.

"A Presidential School of Distinction shall use its Presidential School of Distinction Award for activities that further the educational program of the school. Such activities may include, but are not limited to—

"(1) development, implementation, or expansion of special programs, such as those focused on: dropout prevention or reentry, student transition to college or employment, preschool children, remedial services, or gifted and talented students;

"(2) the purchase or lease of computers, telecommunications equipment, scientific instruments, instructional materials, library books, and other equipment and materials, except that a public agency shall have title to, and exercise administrative control of, all such equipment and materials;

"(3) bonus payments for faculty, administrators, and school personnel;

"(4) school based management/shared decision making;

"(5) parental involvement activities; and

"(6) community outreach activities;

"SEC. 4711. PRIVATE SCHOOL USE OF FUNDS BY PRESIDENTIAL SCHOOLS OF DISTINCTION.

"Each State educational agency receiving financial assistance under this part shall ensure that each private school designated as a Presidential School of Distinction under section 4708 will use the Presidential School of Distinction Award for capital expenses as set forth in section 1017(d) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, and after capital expenses have been met, use such award for purposes as set forth and administered under section 1572 of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

"SEC. 4712. PROHIBITION ON STATE OR LOCAL REDUCTION OF OTHER ASSISTANCE.

"No Federal, State, or local agency may, in any year, take a Presidential School of Distinction Award into account in determining whether to award any other assistance from Federal, State, or local resources, or in determining the amount of such assistance, to either the Presidential School of Distinction itself or the local educational agency, if any, that operates the school.

"SEC. 4713. EVALUATION.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall conduct a biennial evaluation of Presidential Schools of Distinction.

"(b) NATIONAL DIFFUSION NETWORK.—The Secretary shall submit information on successful Presidential Schools of Distinction programs to the National Diffusion Network for possible dissemination.

"SEC. 4714. DEFINITION.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—As used in this part the term 'school based management/shared decision making' means a process by which a team of individuals is formed at a school site to make decisions regarding the management of the school. Such a team may include teachers, the school principal, other school administrators, parents, and community representatives.

"(b) RESPONSIBILITIES.—The school based management/shared decision making team is responsible for decisions which affect the school and classroom environment. Such decisions may include decisions regarding—

"(1) curriculum and instruction priorities which meet priorities and goals of the local educational agency, including materials and activities, organization, and evaluation and assessment, while taking into account the special needs of students;

"(2) student grouping, promotion, and tracking;

"(3) school rules and discipline policies;

"(4) the scheduling and structure of the school day;

"(5) the school environment;

"(6) the physical structure of school facilities;

"(7) the administrative structure of the school;

"(8) the use of funds available to the school;

"(9) hiring and evaluation of teachers and administrators;

"(10) professional development programs which will meet faculty needs; and

"(11) relationships with parents and community.".

PART B—SCHOOLS OF EXCELLENCE

SEC. 111. SCHOOLS OF EXCELLENCE.

Title IV of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 is further amended by adding at the end thereof a new part H to read as follows:

"PART H—SCHOOLS OF EXCELLENCE

"SEC. 4801. SHORT TITLE.

"This part may be cited as the 'Schools of Excellence Act of 1990'.

"SEC. 4802. FINDINGS.

"The Congress finds that—

"(1) no single method of education, or single way of organizing schools and school systems, is best for every community or every group of students;

"(2) schools that have increased competition and choice have helped to improve the quality of schools and the education of children in the school districts in which they have been established; and

"(3) schools that focus on mathematics and science train future leaders in such disciplines are of critical importance to the Nation's economic competitiveness;

"SEC. 4803. PURPOSE.

"It is the purpose of this part to support the establishment, expansion, or enhancement of Schools of Excellence in order to promote open enrollment through parental choice and to strengthen the knowledge of elementary and secondary school students in academic and vocational subjects.

"SEC. 4804. DEFINITION.

"As used in this part, the term 'School of Excellence' means a public elementary or secondary school that—

"(1) offers the highest quality instruction in an academic or vocational discipline or creates a unique and effective learning environment;

"(2) is open to students from beyond the immediate school attendance area; and

"(3) is capable of attracting students from a variety of backgrounds.

"SEC. 4805. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—The amount authorized to be appropriated for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this part for each of the fiscal years 1991, 1992, and 1993 is an amount equal to the lesser of—

"(1) the excess, if any, of—

"(A) the amount appropriated to carry out title III of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 for such fiscal year, over

"(B) $165,000,000, or

"(2) the excess, if any, of—

"(A) the amount appropriated to carry out section 4606 of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 for such fiscal year, over

"(B) $35,000,000.

"(b) LIMITATION.—The amount authorized to be appropriated under subsection (a) shall not exceed $50,000,000 for fiscal year 1991.

"SEC. 4806. GRANT APPLICATIONS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) Any local educational agency, intermediate educational agency, or consortia of such agencies desiring to receive a grant under this part shall submit an application at such time, in such manner, and containing such information, as the Secretary may require.

"(2) An applicant may be, but is not required to be, adopting or implementing a desegregation plan.

"(b) REQUIREMENTS.—Each application shall contain—

"(1) a description of—

"(A) the objectives of the proposed project and how those objectives will achieve the purpose of this part, as set out in section 4803; and

"(B) how the funds made available to the applicant will be used to provide an educational program of the highest quality that will encourage greater parental decisionmaking and involvement;

"(C) the method of information dissemination;

"(D) the unique learning environment; and

"(E) the open enrollment policy for students beyond the immediate attendance area; and

"(2) such assurances as the Secretary may reasonably require.

"(c) SPECIAL RULE.—The Secretary shall encourage applications for proposed projects that—

"(1) recognize the potential of children who are educationally disadvantaged or who come from low-income families; and

"(2) establish, expand, or enhance schools that focus on a particular educational approach or on a particular subject area, such as mathematics and science.

"(d) DEMONSTRATION.—Each application submitted pursuant to this section shall demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Secretary that any proposed project assisted with funds under this part will not result in segregation based upon race, religion, color, national origin, sex, or handicap, or impede the progress of desegregation within the applicant's school system.

"SEC. 4807. SELECTION OF APPLICATIONS.

"In awarding grants under this part, the Secretary shall consider the quality of the proposed project, the likelihood of the project's successful implementation, and the likelihood of its strengthening the educational program of the applicant.

"SEC. 4808. LIMITATIONS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—No School of Excellence may be supported with funds under this part for more than two years.

"(b) SATISFACTORY PROGRESS.—No applicant may receive a grant for more than one year under this part, unless it demonstrates to the Secretary that the School of Excellence for which assistance was provided in the first year is making satisfactory progress in meeting the objectives specified in its approved application.

"(c) SPECIAL RULE.—No Federal, State, or local agency may, in any year, take a School of Excellence award into account in determining whether to award any other assistance from Federal, State, or local resources, or in determining the amount of such assistance, to either a School of Excellence itself or to the local educational agency or intermediate educational agency that operates the school.".

PART C—ALTERNATIVE CERTIFICATION FOR TEACHERS AND PRINCIPALS

SEC. 121. ALTERNATIVE CERTIFICATION FOR TEACHERS AND PRINCIPALS PROGRAM.

Title IV of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 is further amended by adding at the end thereof a new part I to read as follows:

"PART I—ALTERNATIVE CERTIFICATION FOR TEACHERS AND PRINCIPALS

"SEC. 4901. SHORT TITLE.

"This part may be cited as the 'Alternative Certification of Teachers and Principals Assistance Act of 1990'.

"SEC. 4902. FINDINGS.

"The Congress finds that—

"(1) effective elementary and secondary schools require competent teachers and strong leadership;

"(2) school systems would benefit greatly by recruitment pools of well-qualified individuals, such as scientists and engineers, from which to select teachers and principals;

"(3) talented professionals who have demonstrated a high level of subject area competence or management and leadership qualities outside the education profession wish to pursue second careers in education, but often do not meet traditional certification requirements; and

"(4) alternative certification requirements that do not exclude such individuals from teaching or school administration solely because they do not meet current certification requirements would allow school systems to take advantage of these professionals and improve the supply of well-qualified teachers and principals.

"SEC. 4903. PURPOSE.

"It is the purpose of this part to improve the supply of well-qualified elementary and secondary school teachers and principals by encouraging and assisting States to develop and implement alternative teacher and principal certification requirements.

"SEC. 4904. DEFINITIONS.

"As used in this part—

"(1) The term 'alternative teacher and principal certification requirements' means State or local requirements that permit entry into elementary and secondary teacher and principal positions for individuals who have demonstrated a high level of appropriate subject area competence, or management or leadership qualities, in careers in or out of the education field, but who would not otherwise meet existing requirements for teaching or supervisory positions. Alternative teacher and principal certification requirements may recognize that—

"(A) for teachers, a high level of demonstrated competence in an appropriate subject area may be substituted for traditional teacher certification requirements (such as teacher training course work); and

"(B) for principals, a high level of demonstrated competence in administration and management may be substituted for traditional principal certification requirements.

"(2) The term 'State' means any of the States of the Union, the District of Columbia, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

"SEC. 4905. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

"For the purpose of carrying out this part, there are authorized to be appropriated $15,000,000 for fiscal year 1991.

SEC. 4906. ALLOTMENTS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) From the amount appropriated to carry out this part, the Secretary shall allot to each State the lesser of either the amount the State applies for under section 4907 or an amount that is proportional to the State's share of the total population of children ages five through seventeen in all the States (based on the most recent data available that is satisfactory to the Secretary).

"(2) If a State does not apply for its allotment, or the full amount of its allotment, under the preceding paragraph, the Secretary may reallocate the excess funds to one or more other States that demonstrate, to the satisfaction of the Secretary, a current need for the funds.

"(b) SPECIAL RULE.—Notwithstanding section 412(b) of the General Education Provisions Act, funds awarded under this part shall remain available for obligation by a recipient for a period of two calendar years from the date of the grant.

"SEC. 4907. STATE APPLICATIONS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Any State desiring to receive a grant under this part shall submit, through its State educational agency, an application at such time, in such manner, and containing such information, as the Secretary may reasonably require.

"(b) REQUIREMENTS.—Each State application shall—

"(1) describe the programs, projects, and activities to be undertaken; and

"(2) contain such assurances as the Secretary deems necessary, including assurances that—

"(A) funds awarded to the State educational agency will be used to supplement, and not to supplant, any State or local funds available for the development and implementation of alternative teacher and principal certification requirements;

"(B) the State educational agency has, in developing the State's application, consulted with representatives of local educational agencies, elementary and secondary school teachers and principals, parents, and other interested organizations and individuals; and

"(C) the State educational agency will submit to the Secretary, at such time as the Secretary may specify, a final report describing the activities carried out with funds awarded under this part and the results achieved.

"(c) SPECIAL RULE.—Sections 435 and 436 of the General Education Provisions Act, except to the extent that such sections relate to fiscal control and fund accounting procedures, shall not apply to this part.

"SEC. 4908. USE OF FUNDS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) A State educational agency shall use funds awarded under this part to support programs, projects, or activities that develop and implement new, or expand and improve existing, alternative teacher and principal certification requirements.

"(2) A State educational agency may carry out such programs, projects, or activities directly, through contracts, or through subgrants to local educational agencies, intermediate educational agencies, institutions of higher education, or consortia of such agencies.

"(b) PROGRAMS, PROJECTS, AND ACTIVITIES.—Programs, projects, and activities supported under this part may include, but are not limited to, the—

"(1) design, development, implementation, testing, and evaluation of alternative teacher and principal certification requirements;

"(2) establishment of administrative structures necessary to the development and implementation of alternative teacher and principal certification requirements;

"(3) training of staff, including the development of appropriate support programs, such as mentor programs, for teachers and principals entering the school system through the alternative teacher and principal certification program;

"(4) development of recruitment strategies; and

"(5) development of reciprocity agreements between or among States for the certification of teachers and principals.

"SEC. 4909. EXPIRATION DATE.

(2) $400,061.00 for fiscal year 1986 (for programs of transitional bilingual education) and any expenditure of funds by the Franklin-Northwest Supervisory Union pursuant to such awards, shall be treated as if they were made in accordance with the provisions of the Bilingual Education Act for purposes of any claims for repayment asserted by the Secretary of Education.

PART F—PRESIDENTIAL AWARDS FOR EXCELLENCE IN EDUCATION PROGRAM

SEC. 151. PRESIDENTIAL AWARDS FOR EXCELLENCE IN EDUCATION PROGRAM.

(a) TITLE HEADING AND TABLE OF CONTENTS.—(1) The heading for title II of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 is amended to read as follows:

"CRITICAL SKILLS IMPROVEMENT AND PRESIDENTIAL AWARDS FOR EXCELLENCE IN EDUCATION".

(2) Section 1 of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act is amended by inserting after "SEC. 2203. Authorization of Appropriations." the following:

"PART F—PRESIDENTIAL AWARDS FOR EXCELLENCE IN EDUCATION PROGRAM

"Sec. 2301. Findings and purpose.
"Sec. 2302. Allocation to States.
"Sec. 2303. State applications.
"Sec. 2304. Selection of award recipients.
"Sec. 2305. Amount and use of awards.
"Sec. 2306. Awards ceremony.
"Sec. 2307. Authorization of appropriations.".

(b) AMENDMENT TO TEXT.—Title II of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new part:

"PART F—PRESIDENTIAL AWARDS FOR EXCELLENCE IN EDUCATION PROGRAM

"SEC. 2301. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

"(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

"(1) the success of America's elementary and secondary schools depends most heavily upon the Nation's educators;

"(2) when educators are highly motivated and committed to excellence, they succeed not only in imparting subject matter knowledge, but also in instilling in their students an appreciation of the value and importance of education;

"(3) elementary and secondary school systems should have in place standards of teacher excellence and fair and effective procedures for measuring teacher success; and

"(4) in return for their efforts, excellent elementary and secondary school educators deserve public recognition, respect, and appropriate financial awards.

"(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this subpart to reward educators in every State who meet the highest standards of excellence.

"SEC. 2302. ALLOCATION TO STATES.

"(a) ALLOCATION FORMULA.—From the funds appropriated under section 2307—

"(1) 50 per centum shall be allocated among the States in an amount which bears the same ratio to such amount as the number of children aged 5 to 17, inclusive, in the State bears to the number of such children in all such States, according to the most recent available data that are satisfactory to the Secretary; and

"(2) 50 per centum shall be allocated among the States on the same basis as funds are allocated among such States under section 1005 of this Act for the same fiscal year.

"(b) ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES.—Each State may reserve up to 5 per centum of its allocation under subsection (b) for administrative expenses, including the cost of convening the panel described in section 2304(c).

"(c) STATE DEFINED.—For the purposes of this part, the term 'State' shall include the 50 States, the District of Columbia, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

"(d) INSULAR AREAS.—The provisions of Public Law 93-134, permitting the consolidation of grants to the Insular Areas, shall not apply to funds allocated under this part.

"(e) DISTRIBUTION OF AWARDS.—Other provisions of this title notwithstanding, each State shall make at least one Presidential Award for Excellence in Education in each congressional district.

"SEC. 2303. STATE APPLICATIONS.

"(a) SUBMISSION OF STATE APPLICATIONS.—The Secretary is authorized to make allocations to States in accordance with the provisions of this part. In order to receive an allocation under this part, the Governor of each State shall submit a one-time application to the Secretary. Such application shall be filed at such time in such manner, and shall contain such information, as the Secretary may reasonably require.

"(b) DESCRIPTION OF STATE CRITERIA AND PROCEDURES.—The application submitted pursuant to subsection (a) shall contain a description of the State's criteria and procedures for selecting recipients of Presidential Awards for Excellence in Education. The State's criteria and procedures shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary.

"(c) ASSURANCES.—The application submitted pursuant to subsection (a) shall contain assurances that—

"(1) Presidential Awards for Excellence in Education shall be made in accordance with the provisions of this part;

"(2) the State shall provide such fiscal control and fund accounting procedures as the Secretary shall require; and

"(3) the State shall apply the selection criteria uniformly to nominations for recipients of Presidential Awards for Excellence in Education that are received from public and private schools, educators, associations of educators, parents, associations of parents and educators, businesses, business groups, or student groups, as well as those received from educational agencies.

"SEC. 2304. SELECTION OF AWARD RECIPIENTS.

"(a) ELIGIBLE RECIPIENTS.—Any full-time public or private elementary or secondary school teacher of academic or vocational subjects or any full-time public or private elementary or secondary school principal or headmaster shall be eligible to receive an award under this subpart, except that teachers of religion (other than religion as an academic discipline) shall not be eligible.

"(b) NOMINATIONS.—(1) Local educational agencies, public and private schools, educators, parents, associations of educators, associations of parents and educators, businesses, business groups and student groups may nominate teachers for awards under this part.

"(2) The State educational agencies shall notify local educational agencies, public and private schools, associations of educators, associations of parents and educators, business groups, and the general public of the deadlines and procedures for making nominations, and inform them of the selection criteria which will be used in selecting award recipients in a given year.

"(c) SELECTION BY STATE PANEL.—Selection of award recipients in each State shall be made from among the teachers nominated in accordance with subsection (b). Award recipients shall be selected by a panel which is chosen by the Governor in consultation with the chief State officer and is composed of members representing parents, school administrators, teachers, school board members, and the business community.

"(d) SELECTION CRITERIA.—The State panel shall select award recipients in accordance with the criteria approved by the Secretary in the State's application. Such selection criteria may include an educator's success in—

"(1) educating 'at-risk' students, such as educationally or economically disadvantaged, handicapped, limited English proficient, or homeless children to their fullest potential;

"(2) educating gifted and talented students to their fullest potential;

"(3) encouraging students to enroll, and succeed, in advanced classes in subjects such as mathematics, science, and foreign languages;

"(4) teaching in schools educating large numbers of 'at-risk' students, including schools in low-income inner-city or rural areas;

"(5) introducing a new curriculum area into a school or strengthening an established curriculum;

"(6) acting as a 'master teacher' by helping new teachers make the transition into a teaching career;

"(7) encouraging potential dropouts to remain in school or encouraging individuals who have dropped out to reenter and complete their schooling;

"(8) improving daily attendance;

"(9) leadership qualities; and

"(10) success in employing other innovative educational techniques.

"SEC. 2305. AMOUNT AND USE OF AWARDS.

"(a) AMOUNT OF AWARDS.—The amount of a Presidential Award for Excellence in Education shall be $5,000.

"(b) PRO RATA REDUCTION.—Should the amount allocated by the Secretary to a State not be sufficient to support one Presidential Award for Excellence in Education in each congressional district, the State is authorized to make pro rata reductions in the amount of other awards to enable the award of at least one Presidential Award for Excellence in Education in each congressional district.

"(c) USE OF AWARDS.—An award to an individual recipient under this part shall be available for the recipient's use of any purpose, except that private school educators receiving a Presidential Award for Excellence in Education may only use such award for capital expenses at the school where such individual teaches as set forth in section 1017(d) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

"The Secretary is authorized to accept gifts to pay for the costs of conducting awards ceremonies to recognize recipients of Presidential Awards for Excellence in Education.

"SEC. 2307. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

"There are authorized to be appropriated $7,600,000 for the fiscal year 1991 and each of the fiscal years 1992 and 1993 to carry out the provisions of this part.".

TITLE II—NATIONAL SCIENCE SCHOLARS

SEC. 201. NATIONAL SCIENCE SCHOLARS PROGRAM.

Part A of title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 1001 et seq.; hereinafter referred to in this title as "the Act"), is amended—

(1) by redesignating subparts 7 and 8 as subparts 8 and 9, respectively; and

(2) by inserting immediately after subpart 6 the following new subpart:

"SUBPART 7—NATIONAL SCIENCE SCHOLARS PROGRAM

"PURPOSE

"SEC. 419L. (a) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this subpart—

"(1) to establish a National Science Scholars Program to recognize student excellence and achievement in the physical, life, and computer sciences, mathematics, and engineering;

"(2) to encourage role models in physical, life, and computer sciences, mathematics, and engineering fields for young people by offering opportunities to pursue a postsecondary education in such fields;

"(3) to strengthen the leadership of the United States in the fields of physical, life, and computer sciences, mathematics, and engineering; and

"(4) to assist students who have demonstrated outstanding academic achievement in continuing their education in these fields of study.

"SCHOLARSHIPS AUTHORIZED

"SEC. 419M. (a) PROGRAM AUTHORITY.—(1) The Secretary is authorized, in consultation with the Director of the National Science Foundation (hereinafter referred to as the 'Director') and in accordance with the provisions of this subpart, to carry out a program of awarding scholarships for the study of the life, physical, or computer sciences, mathematics, or engineering.

"(2) The Director, in consultation with the Secretary, shall establish and implement a merit-based program for annually awarding scholarships for the study of physical, life, or computer sciences, mathematics, or engineering to—

"(A) one male and one female from each congressional district of the United States, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico, and

"(B) one male and one female from Guam, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Palau, the Republic of the Marshall Islands, the Federated States of Micronesia, and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands.

"(3) Wherever possible in awarding scholarships, special consideration shall be given to economically disadvantaged students or students from groups traditionally underrepresented in the life, physical, or computer sciences, mathematics, and engineering professions.

"(b) NOTIFICATION OF SECONDARY SCHOOLS.—The Secretary shall notify all public and private secondary schools and all institutions of higher education in each State and in each of the entities set forth in subsection (a)(2)(B) annually of the availability of scholarships under this subpart.

"(c) CRITERIA AND PROCEDURE FOR NOMINATION AND SELECTION.—(1) Individuals shall be nominated and selected for scholarships under this subpart on the basis of the student's—

"(A) academic achievement in the life, physical, or computer sciences, mathematics, or engineering;

"(B) promise of outstanding academic achievement in physical, life, or computer sciences, mathematics, or engineering;

"(C) potential to successfully complete a post- secondary program in physical, life, or computer sciences, mathematics, or engineering; and

"(D) motivation to pursue a career in physical, life, or computer sciences, mathematics, or engineering.

"(2) The Director, in consultation with the Secretary, shall appoint a National Science Scholars Program Board (hereinafter referred to as the 'Board'), composed of scientists, mathematicians, educators, engineers, and representatives of the business community, to—

"(A) recommend to the Director specific academic achievement criteria for use in the nomination of scholars; and

"(B) make recommendations for awarding scholarships to the Director.

The Director, in consultation with the Secretary, shall review the Board's recommendations and shall each publish the appropriate academic achievement criteria in the Federal Register.

"(3) The Director, in consultation with the Secretary, is authorized to establish, either directly or by contract, a procedure for nominating at least 4, but not more than 10 students from each congressional district and from each of the entities set forth in subsection (a)(2)(B), for scholarships under this subpart. The Director shall ensure that such nominations shall be made in consultation with educators, scientists, mathematicians, engineers, and representatives of the business community.

"(4) After considering the students nominated under paragraph (3), the Director, in consultation with the Board, shall recommend to the President one male and one female from each congressional district of the United States, and one male and one female from each of the entities set forth in subsection (a)(2)(B), for scholarships under this subpart.

"(d) DISBURSAL OF SCHOLARSHIP PROCEEDS.—Scholarship proceeds shall be disbursed by the Secretary on behalf of students who receive scholarships under this subpart to the institutions of higher education at which the students are enrolled. No scholarship proceeds shall be disbursed on behalf of a student until the student is enrolled at an institution of higher education.

"(e)(1) NATIONAL SCIENCE SCHOLARS.—Students awarded scholarships under this subpart shall be known as 'National Science Scholars'.

"(2) Students nominated under subsection (c) but not awarded scholarships under this subpart shall be known as 'National Science Scholarship Finalists'.

"(f) NATURE AND AMOUNT OF SCHOLARSHIPS.—(1) Scholarships shall be limited to a maximum of $5,000 per student, per year, for a period not to exceed 4 years.

"(2) In the event that funds available in a fiscal year are insufficient to fully fund all awards under this subpart, the amount paid to each student shall be ratably reduced.

"(g) USE OF EXCESS FUNDS.—If the funds available under this subpart for any fiscal year exceed the amounts required for initial and continuing awards under this section, additional scholarships may be awarded by the President, in consultation with the Director, to students selected as National Science Scholarship Finalists for the award year.

"(h) RELATION TO COST OF ATTENDANCE AND OTHER GRANTS AND SCHOLARSHIPS.—(1) The amount of a scholarship awarded under this subpart shall be reduced by the amount that the scholarship exceeds the student's cost of attendance, as defined in section 472 of the Act.

"(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the award made under this subpart shall be considered as income for the purposes of awarding Federal student financial aid.

"(i) SPECIAL RULE.—The Director shall encourage the support and assistance of civic groups, the business community, professional associations, institutions of higher education, and others in providing scholarship assistance to National Science Scholarship Finalists.

"(j) ANNOUNCEMENT AND AWARD OF SCHOLARSHIPS.—The selection process shall be completed, and the announcement of the selection of National Science Scholars will be made by the President prior to January 1st of each fiscal year. The Secretary shall notify Members of Congress of selections before the public announcement by the President. Presentation of scholarships shall be made in a public ceremony.

"ELIGIBILITY OF SCHOLARS

"SEC. 419N. (a) REQUIREMENTS FOR INITIAL AWARD.—To be eligible to receive a scholarship under section 419M, a student shall—

"(1) be scheduled to graduate from a public or private secondary school, or to obtain the equivalent of a certificate of graduation (as recognized by the State or entity in which the student resides), during the school year in which the award is made;

"(2) be a citizen or national of the United States or the entities set forth in subsection (a)(2)(B), or be an alien lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence;

"(3) have applied, or intend to apply, for admission to an institution of higher education in the United States or an institution of higher education in the entities set forth in subsection (a)(2)(B), that is accredited by a nationally recognized accrediting agency or association in accordance with the provisions of section 1201(a) of this Act.

"(b) MAINTAINING ELIGIBILITY.—(1) In order to maintain eligibility to receive funds pursuant to a scholarship awarded under this subpart, a student must—

"(A) be enrolled at an institution of higher education that is accredited by a nationally recognized accrediting agency or association in accordance with the provisions of section 1201(a) of the Act;

"(B) major in any field of physical, life, or computer science, mathematics, or engineering;

"(C) maintain academic performance in good standing, as determined by such institution; and

"(D) except as provided in paragraph (2), carry a full-time academic work load, as determined by the institution in which the student is enrolled under standards applicable to all students enrolled in that student's program.

"(2) The Secretary shall make exceptions to the requirement under paragraph (1)(D) in the case of a student who—

"(A) is on active duty as a member of the armed services;

"(B) has a disability or serious injury as certified by a qualified physician; or

"(C) has exceptional personal circumstances or emergencies, as determined by the Secretary.

"(c) FAILURE TO MEET ELIGIBILITY REQUIREMENTS.—In the event that the student fails to meet the requirements of this section, the student's eligibility to receive further scholarships (or scholarship proceeds) under this subpart shall be determined in accordance with the regulations of the Secretary.

"SUMMER EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR SCHOLARS

"SEC. 419O. (a) PRIORITY FOR SUMMER EMPLOYMENT.—To the extent that they are otherwise qualified, students receiving scholarships under this subpart shall be given priority consideration for federally financed summer employment in federally funded research and development centers, that, to the maximum extent practicable, complements and reinforces the educational program of these students.

"(b) FEDERAL AGENCY COOPERATION.—Federal agencies shall cooperate fully with the Secretary and participate actively in providing appropriate summer employment opportunities for such students.

"EFFECTIVE DATE

"SEC. 419P. The amendments made by this subpart shall be effective on October 1, 1990, for award year 1991-1992 and each succeeding award year thereafter.

"AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

"SEC. 419Q. There are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Education for the purpose of carrying out this subpart $6,000,000 for the fiscal year 1991, and such sums as may be necessary for each of the 2 succeeding fiscal years.".

SEC. 202. CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.

(a) Section 401(b) of the Act is amended by striking out "subparts 1 through 8," and inserting in lieu thereof "subparts 1 through 9,".

(b) Section 481(a)(1) of the Act is amended by striking out "except subpart 6" and inserting in lieu thereof "except subparts 6 and 7".

TITLE III—HISTORICALLY BLACK COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

SEC. 511. SPECIAL ACCREDITATION RULES.

Section 487(c) of the Act is amended—

(1) by redesignating paragraph (3) as paragraph (5); and

(2) by adding after paragraph (2) the following new paragraphs:

"(3) The Secretary is authorized to carry out the provisions of paragraph (1)(D), relating to limitation, suspension, or termination of an eligible institution whenever the institution withdraws from a nationally recognized accrediting agency or association during a show cause or suspension proceeding brought against that institution.

"(4)(A) Whenever a nationally recognized accrediting agency or association reports pursuant to subparagraph (B) that an eligible institution was denied institutional accreditation, the Secretary is authorized to carry out the provisions of paragraph (1)(D) relating to limitation, suspension, or termination of an eligible institution.

"(B) The Secretary is authorized to enter into such arrangements with accrediting agencies and associations as may be necessary to assure notice of the denial of institutional accreditation in order to carry out subparagraph (A).".

SEC. 512. ELIGIBLE INSTITUTION ACCREDITATION RULE.

Section 481(a) of the Act is amended by inserting after paragraph (2) the following new paragraph:

"(3) Whenever the Secretary determines accreditation for the purpose of paragraph (1), the Secretary shall not approve the accreditation of any eligible institution of higher education under this section if the eligible institution of higher education is in the process of receiving new institutional accreditation by a national or regional accreditation agency unless the eligible institution submits to the Secretary all materials relating to the prior accreditation, including the reasons, if applicable, for changing the accrediting agency or association.".

SEC. 513. TOLL-FREE CONSUMER HOTLINE.

Section 485 of the Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(e) TOLL-FREE CONSUMER HOTLINE.—(1) In addition to the toll-free telephone information provided for in section 483, the Secretary shall contract for, or establish, and publicize a toll-free telephone number for use by the public, in order to permit students who allege fraud or unfair practices by eligible institutions to inform the Department of such fraud or unfair practices.

"(2) The Secretary shall, directly or by way of contract or other arrangement, make the toll-free telephone number, and the availability of the consumer hotline established by this subsection, generally available to students receiving financial assistance under this title.".

SEC. 514. TUITION REFUNDS.

(a) REFUND RULE.—Section 487(c)(2)(B)(i) of the Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "In addition, the Secretary may require such eligible institutions to make refunds in accordance with division (iii).".

(b) REFUND PROCEDURES.—Section 487(c)(2)(B) of the Act is amended by adding the following new division after division (ii):

"(iii) When the Secretary determines there has been a violation, failure, or misrepresentation pursuant to division (i), the Secretary may require the institution to refund the student's tuition and fees. The Secretary shall establish procedures for refunding the tuition and fees. Such procedures shall—

"(I) first require the payment by the institution to the United States Government of any portion of the tuition and fees paid with Federal funds received under this title (other than funds under subpart 3 of part A and part B of this title); and

"(II) then require payment by the institution to the lender of that portion of the tuition and fees attributable to a loan made, issued, or guaranteed under part B of this title.".

SEC. 515. PELL GRANT PROGRAM AMENDMENT.

TITLE VII—OTHER HIGHER EDUCATION AMENDMENTS

SEC. 701. SUBSIDIZED EMPLOYMENT MODIFICATION UNDER WORKSTUDY.

Section 443(b)(4) of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (hereafter in this title referred to as the "Act") is amended to read as follows:

"(4) provide that for a student employed in a work-study program under this part, at the time income derived from any need-based employment (including non-working-study or both) is in excess of the determination of the amount of such student's need by more than $200, continued employment shall not be subsidized with funds appropriated under this part;".

SEC. 702. STUDENT LOAN MARKETING ASSOCIATION AMENDMENTS.

"(b) ESTABLISHMENT.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—There is hereby created a body corporate to be known as the Student Loan Marketing Association (hereinafter referred to as the 'Association'). The Association shall have succession until dissolved. It shall maintain its principal office in the District of Columbia or the metropolitan area thereof and shall be deemed, for purposes of jurisdiction and venue in civil actions, to be a District of Columbia corporation. Offices may be established by the Association in such other place or places as it may deem necessary or appropriate for the conduct of its business.".

(b) DIRECTORS.—Section 439(c) of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"(c) BOARD OF DIRECTORS.—

"(1) COMPOSITION OF BOARD; CHAIRMAN.—The Association shall have a Board of Directors (hereinafter in this section referred to as the 'Board') which shall consist of 21 persons, 7 of whom shall be appointed by the President of the United States and shall be representative of the general public. The remaining 14 directors shall be elected by the common stockholders of the Association entitled to vote pursuant to subsection (e). Commencing with the annual shareholders meeting to be held in 1989—

"(A) 7 of the elected directors shall be affiliated with an eligible institution, and

"(B) 7 of the elected directors shall be affiliated with an eligible lender.

The President shall designate 1 of the directors to serve as Chairman.

"(2) TERMS OF APPOINTED AND ELECTED MEMBERS.—The directors appointed by the President shall serve at the pleasure of the President and until their successors have been appointed and have qualified. The remaining directors shall each be elected for a term ending on the date of the next annual meeting of the common stockholders of the Association, and shall serve until their successors have been elected and have qualified. Any appointive seat on the Board which becomes vacant shall be filled by appointment of the President. Any elective seat on the Board which becomes vacant after the annual election of the directors shall be filled by the Board, but only for the expired portion of the term.

"(3) AFFILIATED MEMBERS.—For the purpose of this subsection, the references to a director 'affiliated with an eligible institution' or a director 'affiliated with an eligible lender' means an individual who is, or within 5 years of election to the Board has been, an employee, officer, director, or similar official of—

"(A) an eligible institution or an eligible lender;

"(B) an association whose members consist primarily of eligible institutions or eligible lenders; or

"(C) a State agency, authority instrumentality, commission, or similar institution, the primary purpose of which relates to educational matters or banking matters.

"(4) MEETINGS AND FUNCTIONS OF THE BOARD.—The Board shall meet at the call of its Chairman, but at least semiannually. The Board shall determine the general policies which shall govern the operations of the Association. The Chairman of the Board shall, with the approval of the Board, select, appoint, and compensate qualified persons to fill the offices as may be provided for in the bylaws, with such functions, powers, and duties as may be prescribed by the bylaws or by the Board, and such persons shall be the officers of the Association and shall discharge all such functions, powers, and duties.".

(c) STOCK.—Section 439(f) of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"(f) STOCK OF THE ASSOCIATION.—

"(1) VOTING COMMON STOCK.—The Association shall have voting common stock having such par value as may be fixed by its Board from time to time. Each share of voting common stock shall be entitled to one vote with rights of cumulative voting at all elections of directors.

"(2) NUMBER OF SHARES; TRANSFERABILITY.—The maximum number of shares of voting common stock that the Association may issue and have outstanding at any one time shall be fixed by the Board from time to time. Any voting common stock issued shall be fully transferable, except that, as to the Association, it shall be transferred only on the books of the Association.

"(3) DIVIDENDS.—To the extent that net income is earned and realized, subject to subsection (g)(2), dividends may be declared on voting common stock by the Board. Such dividends as may be declared by the Board shall be paid to the holders of outstanding shares of voting common stock, except that no such dividends shall be payable with respect to any share which has been called for redemption past the effective date of such call.

"(4) SINGLE CLASS OF VOTING COMMON STOCK.—As of the effective date of the Student Loan Marketing Association Amendments of 1990, all of the previously authorized shares of voting common stock and nonvoting common stock of the Association shall be converted to shares of a single class of voting common stock on a share-for-share basis, without any further action on the part of the Association or any holder. Each outstanding certificate for voting or nonvoting common stock shall evidence ownership of the same number of shares of voting stock into which it is converted. All preexisting rights and obligations with respect to any class of common stock of the Association shall be deemed to be rights and obligations with respect to such converted shares.".

(d) SHORT TITLE.—This section may be cited as the "Student Loan Marketing Association Amendments of 1990".

SEC. 709. ADMINISTRATION OF THE COMMISSION.

Section 1321 of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 1221-1) is amended by inserting after subsection (d) the following:

"(e) ADMINISTRATION OF THE COMMISSION.—

"(1) RATE OF PAY.—Members of the Commission who are not full-time officers or employees of the United States and who are not Members of Congress may, while serving on business of the Commission, be compensated at a rate not to exceed the rate specified at the time of such service for Grade GS-18 of the General Schedule as authorized by section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, for each day, or any part of a day, they are engaged in the actual performance of Commission duties, including travel time; and while so serving away from their homes or regular places of business, all members of Commission may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by section 5703 of title 5, United States Code, for persons in Government service employed intermittently.

"(2) TEMPORARY EXEMPTION.—Subject to such rules as may be adopted by the Commission, the Chairperson, without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service and without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates, shall have the power to—

"(A) appoint a Director or Executive Director who shall be paid at a rate not to exceed the rate of basic pay for GS-18 of the General Schedule; and

"(B) appoint and fix the compensation at a rate not to exceed the rate payable at the GS-18 rate of such other personnel as the Chairperson considers necessary.

"(3) AUTHORITY TO CONTRACT.—Subject to the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended, the Commission is authorized to enter into contracts with Federal and State agencies, private firms, institutions, and individuals for the conduct of activities necessary to the discharge of its duties and reponsibilities.

"(4) SOURCE OF ADMINISTRATIVE SUPPORT.—Financial and administrative support services (including those related to budget and accounting, financial reporting, payroll and personnel) shall be provided to the Commission by the General Services Administration (or other appropriate organization) for which payment shall be made in advance, or by reimbursement, from funds of the Commission, in such amounts as may be agreed by the Chairperson of the Commission and the Administrator of General Services.

"(5) AUTHORITY TO HIRE EXPERTS AND CONSULTANTS.—The Commission is authorized to procure temporary and intermittent services of experts and consultants as are necessary to the extent authorized by section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, but at rates not to exceed the rate specified at the time of such service for grade GS-18. Experts and consultants may be employed without compensation if they agree to do so in advance.

"(6) AUTHORITY FOR DETAIL OF EMPLOYEES.—Upon request of the Commission, the head of any Federal agency is authorized to detail on a reimbursable basis, any of the personnel of such agency to the Commission to assist the Commission in carrying out its duties under this section."; and redesignating subsections (e) and (f) as (f) and (g) respectively.

TITLE VIII—WE THE PEOPLE . . . THE CITIZEN AND THE CONSTITUTION

SEC. 801. WE THE PEOPLE . . . THE CITIZEN AND CONSTITUTION.

Part F of title IV of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 is amended by—

(1) redesignating section 4608, as renumbered and amended in sections 202(1) and 202(2), respectively, of Public Law 100-569 as section 4610; and

(2) inserting after section 4608 as added by Public Law 100-569 and renumbered by Public Law 100-690 the following new section 4609:

"SECTION 4609.—We the People . . . The Citizen and the Constitution.

"(a) GENERAL AUTHORITY.—(1) The Secretary shall, in accordance with the provisions of this section, carry out a program entitled "We the People . . . The Citizen and the Constitution" to educate students about the history and principles of the Constitution and Bill of Rights and to foster civic competence and civil responsibility.

"(2) The education program authorized by this section shall continue and expand the educational activities of the National Bicentennial Competition of the Constitution and Bill of Rights administered by the Center for Civic Education.

"(3) The Secretary is authorized to contract with the Center for Civic Education to carry out the provisions of this section.

"(b) PROGRAM CONTENT.—The education program authorized by this section shall provide—

"(A) a course of instruction on the basic principles of our constitutional democracy and the history of the Constitution and Bill of Rights.

"(B) school and community simulated congressional hearings following the course of study at the request of participating schools.

"(C) an annual competition of simulated congressional hearings at the congressional district, State, and national level for secondary students who wish to participate in such program.

"(c) PROGRAM PARTICIPANTS.—The education program authorized by this section shall be made available to public and private elementary and secondary schools in the 435 congressional districts, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, and the District of Columbia.

"(d) SPECIAL RULE.—Funds provided under this section may be used for the advanced training of teachers about the Constitution and Bill of Rights after the provisions of subsection (b) have been implemented.

"(e) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated $5,000,000 for fiscal year 1990 and such sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years 1991, 1992, and 1993 to carry out the provisions of this section.".

TITLE IX—NATIONAL BOARD FOR PROFESSIONAL TEACHING STANDARDS

SEC. 901. SHORT TITLE.

This title may be cited as the "National Board for Professional Teaching Standards Act of 1990".

SEC. 902. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the economic well-being and national security of the United States depends on efforts to strengthen the educational system to provide all children with an education which will ensure a well-educated work force;

(2) improved teaching is central to the goal of ensuring a well-educated work force;

(3) incentives to enhance the professionalism and status of teaching can be provided through the development and promulgation of voluntary standards of professional certification that are rigorous and unbiased, that complement and support State licensing practices and recognize the diversity of American society;

(4) the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards, a private nonprofit organization has been created to establish such voluntary standards and a significant initial investment in research and development from non-Federal sources will be required to create such a system of professional certification; and

(5) the Federal Government has played an active role in funding vital educational research and can continue to support this national effort by providing limited but essential support for critical research activities.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to provide financial assistance to the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards to enable the board to conduct independent research and development related to the establishment of national, voluntary professional standards and assessment methods for the teaching profession.

SEC. 903. DEFINITIONS.

For the purpose of this title—

(1) The term "Board" means the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards.

(2) The term "Committee" means the Research and Development Advisory Committee established pursuant to section 905 of this Act.

(3) The term "elementary school" has the same meaning given that term in section 1471(8) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

(4) The term "secondary school" has the same meaning given that term in section 1471(21) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to infringe upon the practice or accreditation of home school or private school teaching.

(5) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education.

SEC. 904. PROGRAM AUTHORIZATION.

(a) PROGRAM AUTHORIZED.—From sums appropriated under subsection (b) in any fiscal year, the Secretary is authorized and directed, in accordance with this Act, to provide financial assistance to the National Board for Professional Teaching Standards, in order to pay the Federal share of the costs of the activities described in section 906.

(b) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated $25,000,000 for the period beginning October 1, 1989, and ending September 30, 1993 to carry out the provisions of this title.

(c) TERMS AND CONDITIONS.—(1) No financial assistance may be made available under this Act except upon an application as required by section 907.

(2) No financial assistance may be made available under this Act unless the Secretary determines that—

(A) the Board will comply with the provisions of this Act;

(B) the Board will use the Federal funds only for research and development activities in accordance with section 906 and such teacher assessment and certification procedures will be free from racial, cultural, gender or regional bias;

(C) the Board—

(i) will widely disseminate for review and comment announcements of specific research projects to be conducted with Federal funds, including a description of the goals and focus of the specific project involved and the specific merit review procedures and evaluation criteria to be used in the competitive award process, and

(ii) will send such announcements to the Secretary of Education, the Director of the National Science Foundation, the National Research Council, and the educational research community.

(D) the Secretary, pursuant to an arrangement with the Board, will publish the announcement described in subparagraph (C) in the Federal Register (or such other publication deemed appropriate by the Secretary) and in publications of general circulation designed to disseminate such announcements widely to the educational research community;

(E) the Board will, after offering any interested party an opportunity to make comment upon, and take exception to, the projects contained in the announcements described in subparagraph (C) for a 30-day period following publication, and after reconsidering any project which comment is made or to which exception is taken, through the Secretary issue a request for proposals in the Federal Register (or such other publication deemed appropriate by the Secretary) containing any revised project information;

(F) the Board will make awards of Federal funds competitively on the basis of merit, and, in the award process, the Board will select, to the extent practicable consistent with standards of excellence—

(i) a broad range of institutions associated with educational research and development; and

(ii) individuals who are broadly representative of the educational research and teaching communities with expertise in the specific area of research and development in question;

(G) the Board will adopt audit practices customarily applied to nonprofit private organizations and will comply with section 909(c);

(H) the Board will not use Federal funds to meet the administrative and operating expenses of the Board;

(I) the Board will submit an annual report to Congress in accordance with the provisions of section 909(a); and

(J) the Board will, upon request, disseminate to States, local educational agencies, or other public educational entities the results of any research or research project produced with funds authorized by this Act, upon the payment of the cost of reproducing the appropriate material.

(d) AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS.—(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, funds appropriated to carry out this Act shall remain available for obligation and expenditure until the end of the second fiscal year succeeding the fiscal year for which the funds were appropriated.

(2) No funds shall be made available to the Board after September 30, 1993, except as authorized by paragraph (1) of this subsection.

SEC. 905. RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT.—The Board shall establish a Research and Development Advisory Committee composed of ten recognized scholars and experts in teaching, assessment, and other relevant fields. In carrying out the previous sentence the Board shall appoint two individuals selected by the Secretary. The Board shall consult with the Secretary of Education, the Director of the National Science Foundation, the National Research Council, and the educational research community on the appointment of other Members to the Committee.

(b) FUNCTIONS.—The Committee shall advise the Board on the design and execution of its overall research and development strategy, including procedures to assure compliance with the requirements of this Act. The procedures shall include—

(1) an outline of specific research and development agenda and activities to be conducted with the Federal funds; and

(2) provisions to ensure compliance with the open competition and merit review requirements of this Act for proposals and projects assisted under this Act.

SEC. 906. AUTHORIZED ACTIVITIES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Federal funds received under this Act may be used only for research and development activities directly related to the development of teacher assessment and certification procedures for elementary and secondary school teachers.

(b) PRIORITIES.—(1) The Board shall give priority to research and development activities in—

(A) mathematics;

(B) the sciences;

(C) foreign languages; and

(D) literacy, including the ability to read, write and analyze.

(2) The Board shall give priority to research and development activities for the certification of elementary and secondary school teachers and the need and ability of such teachers to teach special educational populations, including—

(A) limited English proficient children;

(B) gifted and talented children;

(C) handicapped children; and

(D) economically and educationally disadvantaged children.

SEC. 907. APPLICATION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Board shall submit applications to the Secretary at such time and in such manner as the Secretary may reasonably require. Each such application shall—

(1) describe the activities for which assistance is sought; and

(2) provide assurances that the non-Federal share of the cost of activities of the Board is paid from non-Federal sources, together with a description of the manner in which the Board will comply with the requirements of this paragraph.

(b) APPROVAL.—The Secretary shall approve an application unless such application fails to comply with the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 908. FEDERAL SHARE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall pay to the Board the Federal share of the costs of the activities of the Board for the period for which the application is approved under section 907.

(b) AMOUNT OF FEDERAL SHARE.—The Federal share shall be 50 percent of the costs of the activities described in section 906.

SEC. 909. REPORTS AND AUDITING PROVISION.

(a) NATIONAL BOARD FOR PROFESSIONAL TEACHING STANDARDS REPORT.—(1) The Board shall submit an annual report to the appropriate committees of the Congress not later than December 31 of 1990, and each succeeding year thereafter for any fiscal year in which Federal funds are expended pursuant to this Act. The Board shall disseminate the report for review and comment to the Department of Education, the National Science Foundation, the National Research Council, and the education research community. The report shall—

(A) include a detailed financial statement and a report of the audit practices described in section 904(c)(2)(G);

(B) include a description of the general procedure to assure compliance with the requirements of this Act as required in section 906; and

(C) provide a comprehensive and detailed description of the Board's agenda, activities, and planned activities for the preceding and succeeding fiscal years, including—

(i) the Board's overall research and development program and activities;

(ii) the specific research and development projects and activities conducted with Federal funds during the preceding fiscal year, including—

(I) a description of the goals and methodology of the project;

(II) a description and assessment of the findings (or status and preliminary findings if project is not yet completed);

(III) a description of the competitive bidding process, the merit review procedures, and the evaluation criteria used to award project funds; and

(IV) a description of the Board's plans for dissemination of the findings described in clause (ii);

(iii) the specific research and development projects and activities planned to be conducted with Federal funds during the succeeding fiscal year, including the goals and methodologies to be used; and

(iv) a listing of available publications of the Board, including publications related to policies, standards and general information, research reports, and commissioned papers of the Board.

(2) The first annual report required by this subsection shall include a description of the Board's research and development agenda for the succeeding 5-year period. Such first report shall include to the maximum extent practicable, a description of specific research and development projects and activities, and the goals and methodologies of such projects and activities.

(b) ADDITIONAL REPORTS.—The Department of Education, the National Science Foundation, and the National Research Council shall report to the appropriate committees of the Congress on the compliance of the Board with the requirements of this Act not later than 30 days after the Board submits its annual report pursuant to subsection (a).

(c) AUDITING PROVISION.—The Comptroller General of the United States, and any of his authorized representatives, shall have access, for the purpose of audit and examination, to any books, documents, papers, and records of the Board, and to any recipient of funds from the Board, that are pertinent to the sums received and disbursed under this Act.

SEC. 910. CONSTRUCTION.

Nothing in this Act shall be construed to—

(1) establish a preferred national curriculum or preferred teaching methodology for elementary and secondary school instruction;

(2) infringe upon the rights and responsibilities of the States to license elementary and secondary school teachers;

(3) provide an individual certified by the Board with a right of action against a State, local educational agency, or other public educational entity for any decisions related to hiring, promotion, retention or dismissal; or

(4) authorize the Secretary to exercise supervision or control over the research program, standards, assessment practices, administration, or staffing policies of the Board.

TITLE X—MIDDLE SCHOOL TEACHING DEMONSTRATION PROGRAMS

SEC. 1001. MIDDLE SCHOOL TEACHING DEMONSTRATION PROGRAMS.

Title V of the Higher Education Act of 1965 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new part F:

"PART F—MIDDLE SCHOOL TEACHING DEMONSTRATION PROGRAMS

"SEC. 581. STATEMENT OF PURPOSE.

"It is the purpose of this part to provide financial assistance to institutions of higher education which offer teacher training or retraining programs to develop model programs with a specialized focus on teaching grades 6 through 9.

"SEC. 582. DEFINITIONS.

"As used in this part—

"(1) The term 'developmentally appropriate' means a program that is appropriate for a child's age and all areas of an individual child's development, including educational, physical, emotional, social, cognitive, and communication.

"(2) The term 'institution of higher education' has the same meaning given that term in section 1201(a) of the Higher Education Act of 1965.

"(3) The term 'local educational agency' has the same meaning given that term in section 1471(12) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

"(4) The term 'middle school' means a school which enrolls students in at least two of the grades 6, 7, 8, and 9.

"SEC. 583. PROGRAM AUTHORIZED.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary is authorized to make grants, on a competitive basis, to institutions of higher education to develop model programs with a specialized focus on teaching grades 6 through 9.

"(b) SPECIAL RULE.—(1) The Secretary shall ensure an equitable geographic distribution of grants awarded under this part.

"(2) The Secretary shall take into consideration equitable levels of funding for urban and rural areas in awarding grants under this part.

"(c) GRANT PERIOD.—Grants under this part may be awarded for a period not to exceed 3 years.

"(d) FUNDING LIMITATION.—Grants awarded under this part may not exceed $250,000 in the first year of funding.

"SEC. 584. APPLICATION.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Each institution of higher education desiring a grant under this part shall submit an application to the Secretary at such time, in such manner, and accompanied by such information as the Secretary may reasonably require.

"(b) CONTENTS.—Each application submitted pursuant to subsection (a) shall demonstrate that—

"(1) the applicant will establish and maintain a program of teacher training or retraining designed to offer specialized preparation for individuals teaching grades 6 through 9;

"(2) the applicant has designed a program of teacher training or retraining which includes—

"(A) a study of adolescent development (including cognitive, social, and emotional) with particular emphasis on early adolescent development;

"(B) a study of the influence of institutions such as schools, families, and peer groups in the socialization of adolescents;

"(C) information concerning the organization of schools for students in grades 6 through 9, with particular emphasis on developmentally appropriate school and classroom organization and practices;

"(D) training in at least 2 subject areas and related instructional strategies;

"(E) direct experience through internships in middle grade schools under the guidance of teachers who demonstrate exemplary classroom practices;

"(F) strategies for the prevention and detection of high risk behavior, particularly drug and alcohol abuse, and for the enhancement of self esteem among adolescents;

"(G) a study of effective methods and models of presenting substance abuse information and education to adolescent students; and

"(H) methods of encouraging parental and community involvement with middle schools; and

"(3) the program will be designed and operated with the active participation of classroom teachers and will include an in-service training component.

"SEC. 585. REPORTS AND INFORMATION DISSEMINATION.

"Each institution of higher education receiving a grant under this part shall submit to the Secretary such reports and other information regarding programs conducted under this part as the Secretary deems necessary. The Secretary shall disseminate such information to other institutions of higher education, State educational agencies, and local educational agencies.

"SEC. 586. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

"There are authorized to be appropriated $25,000,000 for fiscal year 1991 to carry out the provisions of this part.".

TITLE XI—PRESIDENT'S COUNCIL ON ACADEMIC EXCELLENCE

SEC. 1101. SHORT TITLE.

This title may be cited as the "President's Council on Academic Excellence".

SEC. 1102. STATEMENT OF PURPOSE.

It is the purpose of this title to establish a President's Council on Academic Excellence to define the components or courses of an academically rigorous secondary school curriculum and to develop and present a medal or other suitable award to all secondary students who complete the curriculum.

SEC. 1103. COUNCIL ESTABLISHED.

There is established a President's Council on Academic Excellence (hereinafter referred to as the "Council").

SEC. 1104. DUTIES OF THE COUNCIL.

(1) The Council shall—

(A) enlist the active support and assistance of individual citizens, civic groups, private enterprise, voluntary organizations, the media, educators, and others in efforts to promote and improve American education and to encourage the pursuit of academic excellence in our secondary schools;

(B) initiate programs to inform the general public of the importance of academic excellence and the link which exists between academic excellence and international competitiveness;

(C) encourage State and local governments, private enterprise, and the media to recognize and honor academic excellence;

(D) encourage students to undertake an academically rigorous course of study;

(E) develop cooperative programs with professional societies to encourage the pursuit of academic excellence;

(F) stimulate and encourage research on academic excellence and achievement;

(G) assist educational agencies at all levels in developing high quality, innovative, educational programs which emphasize the importance of academic excellence; and

(H) encourage and cosponsor programs with public and private organizations which support and promote academic excellence.

(2) In addition to academic coursework, the Council may elect to include other activities such as school and community service, athletic participation, and artistic achievement in defining the components of an academically rigorous secondary school curriculum.

(3) The Council may adopt achievement standards that might be used to document academic excellence.

SEC. 1105. SPECIAL RULE.

The Council shall emphasize that the Council does not intend to establish a national curriculum, nor a national secondary school diploma; rather, the Council intends to recognize the successful completion of an academically demanding course of study.

SEC. 1106. MEMBERSHIP AND LOCATION.

(a) MEMBERSHIP.—The Council shall consist of—

(1) 11 members selected by the President;

(2) 5 members selected by the Senate Majority Leader; and

(3) 5 members selected by the Speaker of the House.

(b) VACANCIES.—A vacancy in the Council shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment was made. A vacancy in the Council shall not affect the powers of the Council.

(c) CHAIRPERSON.—The members of the Council shall elect a Chairperson from among the members of the Council.

(d) COMPENSATION.—Members of the Council shall serve without compensation.

(e) TRAVEL.—While away from their home or regular places of business in the performance of duties for the Council, all members of the Council shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, at a rate established by the Council not to exceed the rates authorized for employees of agencies under section 5702 and 5703 of title 5, United States Code.

(f) LOCATION.—The Council shall be located in Washington, D.C.

SEC. 1107. COMMISSION STAFF.

(a) EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR.—The Council shall appoint an Executive Director who shall be compensated at a rate established by the Council not to exceed the rate of basic pay prescribed for level V of the Executive Schedule under section 5316 of title 5, United States Code.

(b) ADDITIONAL PERSONNEL.—With the approval of the Council, the Executive Director may appoint and fix the compensation of such additional personnel as the Executive Director considers necessary to carry out the duties of the Council.

SEC. 1108. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

There are authorized to be appropriated $5,000,000 for fiscal year 1991 and such sums as may be necessary for fiscal years 1992 and 1993 to carry out the provisions of this title.

TITLE XII—STUDENT ATHLETE RIGHT-TO-KNOW

SEC. 1201. SHORT TITLE.

This title may be cited as the "Student Athlete Right-to-Know Act".

SEC. 1202. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) education is fundamental to the development of individual citizens and the progress of the Nation as a whole;

(2) there is increasing concern among citizens, educators, and public officials regarding the academic performance of student-athletes at institutions of higher education;

(3) an overwhelming majority of college presidents (86 percent) in a survey by the U.S. News and World Report believe that the pressure for success and financial rewards in intercollegiate athletics interferes with the educational mission of the United States' colleges and universities;

(4) more than 10,000 athletic scholarships are provided annually by institutions of higher education;

(5) prospective student athletes and their families should be aware of the educational commitments prospective colleges make to athletes; and

(6) knowledge of the graduation rates of student-athletes would assist prospective students and their families in making an informed judgment about the educational benefits available at a given institution of higher education.

SEC. 1203. REPORTING REQUIREMENTS FOR INSTITUTIONS OF HIGHER EDUCATION.

(a) REPORTS TO THE SECRETARY.—Each institution of higher education which receives Federal financial assistance and is attended by students receiving athletic scholarships shall annually submit a report to the Secretary which contains—

(1) the number of students at the institution of higher education who received athletically related student aid for football, basketball, and all other sports, broken down by race and sex;

(2) the number of students at the institution of higher education, broken down by race and sex;

(3) the graduation rate for students at the institution of higher education who received athletic scholarships for football, basketball, and all other sports, broken down by race and sex;

(4) the graduation rate for first-time, full-time students, broken down by race and sex;

(5) the average graduation rate for the 4 most recent graduating classes of students at the institution of higher education who received athletically related student aid for football, basketball, and all other sports, broken down by race and sex;

(6) the average graduation rate for the 4 most recent graduating classes of all students, broken down by race and sex; and

(7) the average graduation rate for the 10 most recent graduating classes of students at the institution of higher education who received athletically related student aid for football, basketball, and all other sports, broken down by race and sex.

(b) STUDENT NOTIFICATION.—When an institution described in subsection (a) offers a potential student-athlete athletically related student aid, such institution shall provide to the student and his parents, his guidance counselor, and coach the information contained in the report submitted by such institution pursuant to subsection (a).

(c) SPECIAL CIRCUMSTANCES.—If an institution of higher education described in subsection (a) finds that the information collected pursuant to subsection (a), because of extenuating circumstances, does not provide an accurate representation of the school's graduation rate, the school may provide additional information to the student and the Secretary.

(d) COMPARABLE INFORMATION.—Each institution of higher education described in subsection (a) may provide supplemental information to students and the Secretary showing the graduation rate when such graduation rate does not include students transferring into, and out of, such institution. The Secretary shall ensure that the data presented to the student and the data submitted to the Secretary are comparable.

SEC. 1204. REPORT BY SECRETARY.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall, using the data required under section 1203, shall compile and publish a report containing the information required under section 1203, broken down by—

(1) individual institutions of higher education, and

(2) athletic conferences recognized by the National Collegiate Athletic Association and the National Association of Intercollegiate Athletics.

(b) REPORT AVAILABILITY.—The Secretary shall make available copies of the report required under subsection (a) to any individual or secondary school requesting a copy of such report.

SEC. 1205. INFORMATION.

The Secretary may, at his discretion, obtain the information required by section 1203 from a private, not-for-profit organization when, in the Secretary's opinion, such collection will reduce the paperwork burden imposed on higher education institutions.

SEC. 1206. WAIVER.

The Secretary shall waive the requirements of this Act for any institution of higher education which is a member of an athletic association or athletic conference that voluntarily publishes graduation rate data or has already agreed to publish the data that, in the opinion of the Secretary, is substantially comparable to the information required under this Act.

SEC. 1207. DEFINITION DEVELOPMENT.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of Education, through the Commissioner of Education Statistics and in consultation with State governments and institutions of higher education, shall develop definitions of the term "graduation rate" and other student outcome measures as such terms apply to postsecondary education.

(b) DEFINITION.—For the purposes of this section the term "institution of higher education" has the same meaning given such term in section 1201(a) of the Higher Education Act of 1965.

SEC. 1208. DEFINITIONS.

For the purpose of this title—

(1) The term "athletically related student aid" means any scholarship, grant, or other form of financial assistance whose terms require the recipient to participate in an institution of higher education's program of intercollegiate athletics in order to be eligible to receive such assistance.

(2) The term "institution of higher education" has the same meaning given such term by section 1201(a) of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 1141(a)).

SEC. 1209. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by this title shall take effect on October 1, 1991.

TITLE XIII—EFFECTIVE DATES

SEC. 1301. EFFECTIVE DATE RULE.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Except as otherwise provided, the amendments made by this Act shall be effective upon the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) SPECIAL RULE.—(1) The amendments made by sections 503, 505, 506, and 703(b) shall take effect for award year 1990-1991 and thereafter.

(2) The amendments made by title VI and section 515, 701, and 703(a) shall take effect for award year 1991-1992 and thereafter.

TITLE XIV—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 1401. DRUG TESTING.

Part B of the Drug-Free Schools and Communities Act of 1986 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 5128. DRUG TESTING.

"(a) PROGRAM AUTHORIZED.—(1) The Secretary is authorized to make grants to States for use by the Governor of the State to fund a program of drug testing for student athletes in secondary schools in the State in accordance with the provisions of this section.

"(2) Grants awarded pursuant to paragraph (1) shall be awarded on the basis of the number of secondary school students in the State.

"(b) LOCAL GRANTS.—(1) Each Governor of a State receiving funds pursuant to subsection (a) shall use such funds to make grants to eligible schools within the State to pay the costs of testing student athletes for drug use.

"(2) Funds awarded pursuant to paragraph (1) shall only be used to test secondary school athletes who—

"(A) voluntarily choose to participate in a random drug testing program; and

"(B) attend eligible schools.

"(c) STATE APPLICATION.—(1) The Governor of each State desiring a grant under this section shall submit an application to the Secretary at such time, in such manner, and accompanied by such information as the Secretary shall reasonably require.

"(2) Applications submitted pursuant to paragraph (1) shall—

"(A) describe the drug testing program for which financial assistance is sought; and

"(B) contain assurances that the State will implement the drug testing program for which financial assistance is sought within 6 months of the date the funds become available to the State.

"(d) LOCAL APPLICATION.—Each eligible school desiring a grant pursuant to subsection (b) shall submit an application to the Governor of the State in which such eligible school is located at such time, in such manner, and accompanied by such information as the Governor shall require.

"(e) DEFINITIONS.—For the purposes of this section—

"(1) The term 'Governor' includes the chief executive officer of any State;

"(2) the term 'eligible school' means a secondary school that—

"(A) the Governor of the State in which the school is located has determined to be a school at risk of experiencing a serious drug problem;

"(B) has a drug and alcohol abuse problem as demonstrated by appropriate data;

"(3) the term 'secondary school' has the same meaning given such term in section 1471(21) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965; and

"(4) the term 'Secretary' means the Secretary of Education.

"(f) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated $5,000,000 for fiscal years 1991, 1992, and 1993 to carry out the provisions of this section.".

SEC. 1402. DRUG ABUSE RESISTANCE EDUCATION PROGRAM.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of Education is authorized to award grants to local educational agencies in consortium with entities which have experience in assisting school districts to provide instruction to students grades kindergarten through six to recognize and resist pressures that influence such students to use controlled substances, as defined in schedules I and II of section 202 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 812), the possession or distribution of which is unlawful under such Act, or beverage alcohol, such as Project Drug Abuse Resistance Education, that meet the requirements of subsection (b).

(b) REQUIREMENTS.—A local education agency in consortium with an entity shall not be eligible for a grant under subsection (a) unless such local education agency in consortium with an entity will use assistance provided under such grant to provide or arrange for the provisions of services that shall include—

(1) drug abuse resistance education instruction for students grades kindergarten through six to recognize and resist pressures to experiment that influence such children to use controlled substances, as defined under subsection (a), or beverage alcohol, including instruction in the following areas—

(A) drug use and misuse;

(B) resistance techniques;

(C) assertive response styles;

(D) managing stress without taking drugs;

(E) decisionmaking and risk taking;

(F) media influences on drug use;

(G) positive alternatives to drug abuse behavior;

(H) interpersonal and communication skills;

(I) self-esteem building activities; and

(J) resistance to gang pressure;

(2) classroom instruction by uniformed law enforcement officials;

(3) the use of positive student leaders to influence younger students not to use drugs; and

(4) an emphasis on activity-oriented techniques designed to encourage student-generated responses to problem-solving situations; and

(c) APPLICATION.—The Secretary shall not make a grant under subsection (a) unless—

(1) an application for the grant is submitted to the Secretary;

(2) with respect to carrying out the purpose for which the grant is to be made, the application provides assurances of compliance satisfactory to the Secretary;

(3) the application otherwise is in such form, agreements, assurances, and information as the Secretary determines to be necessary to carry out this section; and

(4) the application contains an assurance that the applicant will provide funds, either in cash or in kind that are not less than 10 percent of the amount of the grant under subsection (a);

(d) SUPPLEMENTAL FUNDS.—Amounts received under subsection (a) by the entity shall be used only to supplement, not to supplant, the amount of Federal, State, and local funds expended for the support of projects of the type described in subsection (b); and

(e) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out this section, $10,000,000 in fiscal year 1990, and such sums as may be necessary for each of the 3 succeeding fiscal years.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill, as amended, was passed.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I would like to commend Senator KASSEBAUM for her able work on S. 695. This legislation marks the first that we have worked together on education issues on the floor. I am happy to say that the new education firm of Pell and Kassebaum is carrying on in the great tradition of the old Pell and Stafford firm. Both partnerships have worked to strengthen and uphold the Federal commitment to education. I look forward to what I hope will be a very long partnership with Senator KASSEBAUM as we work together to provide the kind of assistance that will make this Nation's education the finest in the world.

In addition, I would like to thank the staff of each of the members of our committee. They have spent many hours in working together on this bipartisan package. I know I speak for all my colleagues when I extend our sincere appreciation for their efforts.

In that regard, I am most appreciative of the work of my own staff, including David Evans, Ann Young, Mike Epstein, Sarah Flanagan, Marisa Quinn, and Merry Richter. In addition, I would like to thank Susan Hattan, Becky Rogers, and Lydia Spencer of Senator KASSEBAUM's staff, Terry Hartle and Amanda Broun of Senator KENNEDY's staff, Laurie Chivers of Senator HATCH's staff, and Joan Gilman of Senator DODD's staff.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, we have just completed action on S. 695, the Educational Excellence Act. I just want to say how pleased I am that the Senate has taken this action on President Bush's initiatives in education.

I want to express again my appreciation to Chairman PELL, majority leader MITCHELL, and others on both sides of the aisle who have moved along this effort. I would also like to express my appeciation for the many hours spent by my staff, Susan Hattan, Becky Rogers Voslow, and Lydia Spencer, throughout the consideration of this legislation. I would like to recognize as well the excellent work done by David Evans, Ann Young, Sarah Flanagan, Marisa Quinn, and Merry Richter with Senator PELL's staff and by the many other staff members who contributed to the success of this effort.

As has been said many times on the floor over the past 2 days, education is a top priority. It is the key to our ability to meet the demands of the present day and the challenges of the future. Failure to keep education at the forefront will mean failure to grow and progress. Senate enactment of this legislation underscores our commitment to quality education.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I rise in support of this measure, and I commend the Labor and Human Resources Committee for proposing a package of initiatives to improve and enhance the quality of our Nation's education system.

Improving this country's educational system is critical to the future and strength of our Nation. Report after report documents that our country is falling short of achieving an educated and competitive population. International comparisons of educational achievement indicate that students in other nations on the average attain higher levels of reading, comprehension, and computation proficiency. How is this poor showing by American students reflected in the marketplace?

American businesses are having a hard time finding qualified people to hire. The New York Telephone Co. had to test 60,000 people on an entry-level exam to hire just 3,000 people. Eighty-four percent of those tested failed the exam. Chemical Bank in New York must interview 40 applicants to find 1 applicant who can be trained successfully as a teller. Chrysler Corp. had to incorporate graphics on its assembly line because so many workers could not read the words "bad hood fit" on the button they were supposed to push when they detected an ill-fitting hood. I could go on and on with other examples from America's business community, but the point is this, America needs seriously to reconsider its attitude and approach to addressing the education of our country's young people.

We not only need a minimally competent work force that can read, write, and compute basic math and science equations, but we need a work force that possesses the advanced skills and training to lead the way in the increasingly technical and complicated global marketplace. If we are to remain competitive and to retain a position of leadership in the world, we must invest in the future of our young people.

S. 695 is a start in this direction. The initiatives contained in S. 695 are much-needed programs, but we need to do more, much more. This bill is just the tip of the iceberg compared to what we must do to reform our education system. A much-quoted study by the Economic Policy Institute confirms that when spending for higher education is removed, the United States ranks 14th of the 16 industrialized nations for public spending for grades K-12. That is a disgrace. Japan, West Germany, Great Britain, Canada, Italy, and France, to name a few, all spend more than we do on elementary and secondary education.

Remember the old adage, you get what you pay for? Well, that is what we are getting—students who have trouble reading, and writing, and who possess only the most basic math skills. If we are to have citizens who can perform at the top of their fields and contribute to our increasingly complicated world, we must do more than this small effort. To achieve the goals that President Bush proposed in his State of the Union Address—U.S. students as the first in the world in math and science achievement; high school graduation rates at no less than 90 percent; every American performing as a skilled, literate worker, and every school offering a disciplined, drug-free environment—we have to do more than the proposals in S. 695. S. 695 is a start. S. 695 represents a step in the right direction. I support S. 695, but I hope that we do not stop with this bill. Because if we do no more than this bill, our students will not be the first in the world by the beginning of the next decade. And they ought to be.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I join all Senators in commending the managers, the distinguished Senators from Rhode Island and Kansas, for their leadership in this area. This is an important education legislation. I am pleased that the Senate was able to act promptly on it.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for morning business until 3:45 p.m. with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each; that Senator GORE be recognized first to address the Senate for up to 5 minutes, and upon the conclusion of his remarks, Senator GORTON be recognized to address the Senate for up to 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader has propounded a unanimous-consent request. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1990

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I rise to address two subjects very briefly. First of all, this morning with the senior Senator from Massachusetts, Senator KENNEDY, taking the leading role, a press conference was conducted in the Senate Office Building to formalize the introduction of the Civil Rights Act of 1990. I would like to say a couple of words about it.

Coretta Scott King was there, along with a bipartisan group of Senators and Members of the other body, to announce the introduction of this bill. I am proud to be an original cosponsor of this legislation, and I would like to urge my colleagues who have not already joined in as supporters and cosponsors to actively consider doing so.

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 is necessary to continue forward progress on civil rights in the United States of America. The Supreme Court has issued a series of decisions which now threaten that progress. For example, they recently decided that although discrimination in hiring is prohibited, racial discrimination after someone is hired is not subject to the same kind of scrutiny. That decision, in this Senator's opinion, is simply wrong. Those and other decisions have raised many concerns which are addressed in this legislation.

Mr. President, 25 years ago, when the Voting Rights Act passed on this floor, the center of opposition was to be found in the part of the country from which I come. Twenty-five years later, the opposition to the Civil Rights Act of 1990 will not be in the South. The reason is that we are prouder of progress on civil rights than the people of any other part of this Nation. We have been through the fire. We know how important it is not to reopen the bitter arguments and hostilities and hatreds and debates of the past. We know how important it is to continue moving forward.

In this year, 1990, we are witnessing a wave of freedom, an expansion of what we mean by individual dignity and freedom for men and women all over the world. Whether you look at Eastern Europe or South Africa or the thus far unsuccessful revolution in China, one hears the words of Thomas Jefferson; one sees the strategy of Martin Luther King, Jr.; one is moved by the sounds of young men and women singing "we shall overcome."

American ideas, our commitment to liberty and justice and civil rights, have been the real motivating force in this revolution of freedom all over the world. It is, therefore, appropriate that here at home, we continue the historic progress on civil rights, which has made those freedoms real for people who have too often been subject to discrimination throughout our Nation's history.

So I call upon all Members of this body to look carefully at the bill introduced today and actively consider joining as cosponsors of that legislation.

THE CLEAN AIR ACT

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, if I can turn to another subject in the time I have remaining, I deeply respect those who have been conducting the negotiations and the dialog with the administration on the subject of clean air. I am a supporter of the legislation, and earlier I said that one of the reasons I think the bill is a good one is that it takes the first steps toward a posture of confronting the global environmental problems, including global warming.

One of the provisions which puts this body on record as taking such steps is the provision limiting CO_2 emissions from mobile sources for the first time. I think that provision is extremely important. But I hear of tentative conclusions to remove that provision from the bill. I hope those reports do not turn out finally to be true. I understand, as I say, the difficult choices that supporters have to make in judging whether or not the overall legislation can pass or not, depending upon amendments that come under consideration. I do understand that.

But I believe the problems we are facing in the global environment and particularly the challenge of global warming is so serious that we should keep the provision on CO_2 limits in this legislation. I hope we shall do so.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GORTON. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. GORTON pertaining to the introduction of S. 2099 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GLENN. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. GLENN pertaining to the introduction of S. 2090 are located in today's RECORD under

"Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator is recognized for 5 minutes.

ASBESTOS AND AIR TOXICS

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, title III of the 1990 Clean Air Amendments creates a new adventure for the Federal bureaucracy. This title introduces an ambitious program to regulate air toxics. Because of the behind-the-door negotiations now underway, it is difficult to criticize the specifics of this section. But, I feel we need to step back and examine its basic assumptions.

Title III attempts to regulate hazardous air pollutants. The proponents claim that the air toxics controlled by this title are generally cancer-causing substances, though other health and environmental problems may also result from the release of these substances. The bill lists 191 original substances to be regulated, with the implication that other substances can be added later.

The 1970 Clean Air Act, which is still our basic building block, contains a provision which was supposed to control toxic emissions. We all know that section 112 has been a failure, and should be replaced. However, there is a difference of opinion as to why it failed. And, there is definite disagreement over the solution developed by the Environmental Committee.

The committee has proposed a two-phased program to control emissions of substances known to cause or can be reasonably expected to cause damage to public health or the environment. The first phase would require controls based on available technology. The second phase would require controls based on a perceived threat to health.

A perceived health threat is an interesting concept. At some point during this debate, it would be useful to go through the list of 191 substances and to obtain for each substance an explanation of the health risk and of the research which documents the risk. Some risks are obvious. Others are simply suspected. The remainder are merely believed to have some risk.

Clearly, we need to limit emissions for any carcinogenic substance. That was the intent of old section 112. But it has not worked, and a new approach is necessary. But, the committee approach appears to be drafted by some Earth First Luddite who believes that American industry is intent on releasing as may toxic substances as they can put in their smokestacks. Title III more closely reflects that type of overreaction than it does public policy based on sound science.

An excellent example of the cost of basing public policy on bad science is the asbestos issue. In Casper, WY, there are two public high schools. Kelly-Walsh High School, the older of the buildings, has asbestos materials in its insulation. Under the 1986 Asbestos Hazard Emergency Response Act, local public schools are required to remove asbestos because it is a health hazard. As a result, the school has been closed since last summer to allow for asbestos cleanup.

All Kelly-Walsh students were transferred to Natrona County High School. We can imagine the confusion and hardship caused by doubling enrollment overnight. Natrona is now on a double-track system. Although classes run from early in the morning to late in the evening, students will still be 7 or 8 days short of the State minimum attendance requirements at the end of the school year. For the past 2 days, we have been discussing excellence in education. But, what has happened to the quality of education for Casper students?

Last week, we received more bad news. The earliest that Kelly-Walsh can reopen is next fall. The cost of the cleanup, to the local school system, is $4 million. The Wyoming congressional delegation is actively supporting Casper's application for a Federal grant to assist with this expense.

But the bottom line is that there is no sign of relief from the requirements of this law. In fact, we are now looking at legislation to actually expand the cleanup requirements to other public buildings—the cost of which is estimated at $100 to $150 billion.

The disruption and cost would perhaps be worth it if there was a clear health risk. Last month, Science magazine carried an article regarding the latest scientific research on asbestos. There are basically two forms of asbestos and the health risks differ between them. The basic conclusion of the article is that the form of asbestos found in buildings is not the type that poses the health risk.

Once again, politics has preceded science. And on a much grander scale, that is the dilemma we now face with the air toxics title of the clean air bill. In the meantime, Kelly-Walsh High School remains closed. The education of the students has been disrupted and possibly diminished. And the local school system will spend millions of dollars removing a material which may pose no health threat.

I ask, Mr. President, those who advocate this kind of a cleanup to tell those students what benefit they got from a cleanup of a risk that did not exist, over what benefit they might have gotten had they been able to continue their education uninterrupted with that money spent on books, teachers, and classroom equipment.

I ask unanimous consent that the article on asbestos entitled, "Asbestos: Scientific Developments and Implications for Public Policy" and a newsstory on Kelly-Walsh High School be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DISTRICT DECIDES TO KEEP KW CLOSED FOR YEAR AFTER NEW ASBESTOS FOUND

(By Tom Rea)

CASPER.—Discovery of new asbestos contamination means Kelly Walsh High School will not be reopened before next fall, school officials say.

Kelly Walsh was closed for safety reasons Aug. 22, after cancer-causing airborne asbestos fibers were found in a basement journalism classroom and nearby utility tunnels.

The new discovery is expected to push asbestos cleanup costs above $4 million.

Family schedules have been disrupted throughout Natrona County this school year because of double session classes at Natrona County this school year because of double session classes at Natrona County High School for both KW and NC students.

District officials had hoped to reopen the school this school year, but a target date of December was postponed to March after additional contamination was found later in the fall.

Now the building will not reopen this school year, a decision that will require continuing the double sessions.

It could take two to three months to let bids and clean up the new contamination, officials said, which does not leave enough time to reopen the high school before the end of the school year.

"This is a very disappointing announcement for a school board to make," Board Chairman Steve Kinner said at a press conference Wednesday. But it is one that "cannot be avoided if we are to continue to protect the health, safety, and welfare of students, staff and patrons" at Kelly Walsh, he said.

But Kinner noted that many people have told him they prefer to maintain the present schedule for the rest of the school year. Students and families say they already have adjusted their schedules to fit the double sessions, he said.

The new contamination which ranges from three to 14 times the maximum allowed under federal law, was confirmed Sunday in the high school's E wing, a group of 11 classrooms and a teacher's room north of the east courtyard which contains portable classrooms.

Kelly Walsh and NCHS students' days under the double sessions are now about an hour shorter than they used to be, and 15 minutes shorter than the state minimum.

Supt. Jake Dailey said the current schedule will leave students seven or eight days short of the state minimum by the end of the school year. He said he will ask the state for an emergency waiver of the schedule requirements.

Projected costs for the cleanup before Wednesday were $3.9 million. Ken Gorder of the Gorder/South Group, asbestos consultants to the school district, said Wednesday that it should cost less than $300,000 to clean up E wing.

Officials had expected to open the high school by early March after removing contamination in ductwork above F wing and the cafeteria. More expensive cleanup of D wing and the library was not to begin until summer.

In an attempt to recover the costs of cleanup, the school district has asked for emergency help from the Legislature.

The district has also brought one suit against a bonding company and two asbestos abatement contractors, claiming poor work in 1986-88 caused the contamination and a second suit against its own insurance company.

The recently discovered contamination was found when "investigations were conducted of the former contractors' work" in preparation for the litigation, Kinner said.

Gorder said the new contamination is concentrated around "relief vents" in ducts which exhaust air to the outside of the building. Other contamination has been found under lockers in E wing, he said.

But no contamination was found in E wing in August when the entire school was tested, Gorder said later Wednesday. Asked why contamination would show up now when it did not before, Gorder said "That's exactly what we don't understand."

But the recent tests "weren't any more stringent (or) any more numerous" than those done last year, he said.

At that time, air was run through the ventilation system for only three or four hours, while tests to confirm the recently discovered contamination ran the system for "a couple of days," Gorder said.

No contractors have been working in the E wing area since August, he said. Areas where abatement and remodeling work has been going on since then have been sealed off from the rest of the high school, he said.

Whether the new results are linked to the ventilation system's having been turned off for months and then turned back on, to the different lengths of time the air was run throught the system for the tests, or to some other factors entirely, "we really don't know," Gorder said.

And the long-term financial results of paying off the cleanup costs could be serious, board member David Driggers said. Asbestos expenses could cut into funds the board would normally use to pay salaries, buy books, and keep small elementary schools open over the next 10 years, he said.

And recent research showing asbestos may be less harmful than it was previously thought to be is so far having no effect on federal law, Driggers and Dailey said.

"There is a health risk" from asbestos, Driggers said, but only at "1,000 to 10,000 times the concentration" federal law mandates in schools. Federal law applies much stricter asbestos standards to schools than it does to other public buildings. But new laws are about to go into effect applying to businesses and other public buildings as well, Dailey said.

"I don't think until there's school districts across the nation" facing a crisis like Casper's "will there be enough outcry at the federal level" to change the law, Driggers said.

ASBESTOS: SCIENTIFIC DEVELOPMENTS AND IMPLICATIONS FOR PUBLIC POLICY

(By B.T. Mossman, J. Bignon, M. Corn, A. Seaton, J.B.L. Gee)

(Asbestos is a commercial term for a group of fibrous minerals often associated with the development of pulmonary interstitial fibrosis (asbestosis), lung cancer, and malignant mesothelioma in occupationally exposed individuals. The pathogenicity of different forms of asbestos varies—long, thin, amphibole fibers are most pathogenic, particularly in the induction of mesothelioma. Available data do not support the concept that low-level exposure to asbestos is a health hazard in buildings and schools. The concentration of asbestos fibers in air, type of asbestos, and size of fibers must be considered in evaluation of potential health risks.)

Asbestos engenders both fear and panic in U.S. society. Observation that asbestos-containing materials (ACM) have been used in schools, buildings, and hospitals, and the Asbestos Hazard Emergency Response Act (AHERA), a mandate from the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) that requires inspection of the nation's public and private schools for asbestos, have resulted in the explosive growth of asbestos identification and removal companies. By EPA estimates, extension of EPA reqirements to approximately 733,000 public and commercial buildings containing asbestos will cost $53 billion, discounted at 10% over 30 years [1]. Because of uncertainties regarding the amount of asbestos and its condition in these buildings, estimates for removal of asbestos are as high as $100 to $150 billion [2].

Asbestos was shown to cause asbestosis at the turn of the century. Its association with the causation of lung and pleural tumors in asbestos miners and workers was demonstrated in the 1950s and 1960s, respectively [3]. An important issue is whether these diseases are also hazards to the general population exposed to airborne levels of asbestos in schools and other buildings. Does available evidence support the concept that asbestos causes disease in the nonoccupational environment? What are the mechanisms of asbestos-induced fibrogenesis and carcinogenesis? Most importantly, have recent data been adequately considered in formulating policies in the United States for regulation and banning of asbestos? In this article, we summarize recent developments and discuss their implications for public policy.

PHYSICO-CHEMICAL CHARACTERISTIC OF ASBESTOS

"Asbestos" is a broad commercial term for a group of naturally occurring hydrated silicates that crystallize in a fibrous habit. The legal definition of a fiber as promulgated by the EPA and other U.S. regulatory agencies is one that possesses a >3:1 aspect ratio. However, this definition has been criticized by mineralogists [4].

Asbestos fibers in ores are not respirable until released and made airborne during mining and processing. The family of asbestos minerals can be subdivided into serpentine and amphibole fibers. Chrysotile, which accounts for over 90% of the world's production of asbestos, is the most common fibrous serpentine, whereas the amphiboles, a chemically diverse group of less industrially important minerals, include the fibrous minerals and crocidolite, amosite, anthophyllite asbestos, actinolite asbestos, and tremolite asbestos. Tremolite, actinolite and anthophyllite, which occur in both fibrous and nonfibrous forms, have been only rarely mined for use as commercial asbestos. Both the fibrous and nonfibrous forms of these amphibole minerals are sometimes found as contaminants of commercial deposits of chrysotile, talc, vermiculite, and other minerals [4]. The nonfibrous forms of crocidolite and amosite are referred to as riebeckite and grunerite, respectively.

The various types of asbestos fibers differ in their chemical composition, morphology, and durability. Therefore, the biologic effects should be considered individually for each fiber type. Identification of specific types of asbestos in air samples requires sophisticated technology such as transmission electron microscopy, x-ray diffraction, or energy dispersive x-ray spectroscopy. The rod-like amphiboles appear to penetrate the peripheral lung more readily than chrysotile fibers, which are curly, can occur in bundles, and can be intercepted at airway bifurcations. The chemical makeup of each fiber type is complex, and fibers may consist of a variety of trace metals and organic compounds acquired in ores or during processing.

Asbestos is attractive to industry because of its resistance to heat and chemicals, high tensile strength, and lower costs compared to man-made materials. Although use of spray-on asbestos as a fire-proofing material or insulation has been banned in this country, as well as in several European countries, asbestos is incorporated currently into cement construction materials (roofing, shingles, and cement pipes), friction materials (brake linings and clutch pads), jointing and gaskets, asphalt coats and sealants, and other similar products. As a result of these applications, an estimated 20% of buildings including hospitals, schools, and other public and private structures contain ACM [1]. Asbestos in buildings does not spontaneously shed fibers, but physical damage to ACM by decay, renovation, or demolition can cause release of airborne fibers [5].

DISEASES ASSOCIATED WITH OCCUPATION EXPOSURE TO ASBESTOS

Occupational exposure to asbestos can cause four types of disorders: asbestos; lung cancer; mesotheliomas of the pleura, pericardium, and peritoneum; and benign changes in the pleura [3]. Asbestosis, a pulmonary interstitial fibrosis with excessive deposition of collagen, caused progressive lung stiffening, impaired gas exchange, disability, and death in many workers exposed before the enforcement of occupational standards. Lung cancers, that is, tumors arising in tracheobronchial epithelial or alveolar epithelial cells, have occurred in asbestos workers in most cases 20 or more years after their first exposure to asbestos. In general, lung cancers have been found in asbestos workers who are smokers and only rarely in nonsmokers [6]. A number of epidemiologic studies have indicated that the relation between the development of lung cancers and cumulative exposure to asbestos is approximately linear, but wide variations in slope of the line occur apparently related to fiber type and industrial usage [7]. Death rates from lung cancers in asbestos workers, as measured by standard mortality ratios (SMRs), the observed mortality of a cohort divided by the mortality of a control population, are lowest in chrysotile miners and workers manufacturing friction materials. In contrast, lung cancer deaths are higher in those mining and working with amphibole asbestos. Textile workers in a South Carolina plant in which chrysotile was used exhibited a striking increase in lung cancers with duration of exposure when compared to Canadian chrysotile miners and millers. Solvents and oils in textile production might act as cocarcinogens in the development of these lung tumors [7].

Diffuse malignant mesothelioma is a fatal tumor arising from mesothelial cells or underlying mesenchymal cells in the pleura, pericardium, and peritoneum.[8] The time between diagnosis and initial occupational exposure to asbestos commonly exceeds 30 years. Smoking evidently does not enhance risk of mesothelioma in asbestos workers.[3] Although mesotheliomas are extremely rare malignancies, that is, only 1648 were recorded from 1973 to 1984 in one survey covering approximately 10% of the U.S. population,[9] they may account for as much as 18% of the proportional mortality in crocidolite workers.[10] Mesotheliomas also have been observed after household exposure of family members of asbestos workers and in individuals living in close proximity to asbestos mines.[11] Although mesothelioma has been considered by some as a disease pathognomonic of exposure to asbestos, approximately 20 to 30% of mesotheliomas occur in the general population in adults not exposed occupationally to asbestos.[12] Mesotheliomas are rarely found in children.

Diagnosis of mesotheliomas is a challenge as the tumor may resemble metastases of other tumor types occuring in the pleura or peritoneum and assume a wide variety of microscopic appearances. Thus, death certificates may either underestimate (because these tumors are attributed to cancers of the gastrointestinal tract and other organs) [13] or overestimate the incidence of mesotheliomas. In France, mesotheliomas are overestimated by a factor of 3 on death certificates in comparison to the mesothelioma registry.[14]

A number of benign pleural changes that rarely cause functional impairment have been observed in asbestos workers. These include pleural effusions, pleural fibrosis, pleural plaques, that is, accumulations of acellular collagen on the diaphragm and chest wall, and pseudotumors of infoldings of the lung often associated with plaques. These pleural changes may reflect exposure to asbestos but have no demonstrated relation to the development of mesothelioma.

Tumors of the gastrointestinal tract, larynx, and other organs including the kidney, ovary, pancreas, pericardium, eye, and lymphatic system, have been reported in some cohorts of asbestos workers.[13 15] In general, the enhanced SMRs for these tumors are not statistically distinguishable from normal SMRs and have not been confirmed in most cohorts. Both laryngeal and gastrointestinal tumors have other etiologies such as smoking, alcohol, diet, and intestinal polyposis that confound the interpretation of epidemiologic data.

THE AMPHIBOLE HYPOTHESIS

The association of mesothelioma with asbestos exposure was first described in 1960 in the northwest Cape area of South Africa where long, thin crocidolite fibers were mined.[16] Since then, an increased incidence of mesothelioma has been reported in a number of occupational settings including factories that presumably used only chrysotile. Within the past decade, sophisticated technology has allowed examination of the types of fibers in the lung tissue of these workers. Results revealed that many chrysotile-exposed workers showed an appreciable lung burden of amphibole fibers, which were used for brief periods in the workplace.[17] The persistence of amphiboles in human lungs may be attributed to their increased ability to penetrate the peripheral lung, lack of clearance, or durability. In contrast, chrysotile has been found postmortem in smaller amounts than expected in the lungs of asbestos workers.[18] It disappears with time most likely because magnesium and silica are leached from the fibers.[19] Recently, the lung content of asbestos and nonasbestos fibers has been compared in diagnosed cases of mesothelioma, lung cancer, and cardiovascular disease (controls) from the western coast of France, a region containing shipyards.[20] The number of amphibole fibers (crocidolite and amosite) was significantly higher in lungs from mesothelioma patients, whereas numbers of chrysotile and nonasbestos fibers were similar in all groups. These data suggest that the lung burden of chrysotile and nonasbestos fibers bears no relation to the occurrence of these cancers.

Several recent studies indicate that the risk of pleural mesothelioma is lower where chrysotile is used without admixture or contamination by amphiboles.[21] For example, a gradation of death rates from mesothelioma has been observed in both male and female asbestos-exposed cohorts. Mesothelioma has been responsible for approximately 6 to 8% of the proportional mortality in men working with mixtures containing crocidolite or amphibole (crocidolite or amosite) in comparison to less than 1% of the proportional mortality in men working with chrysotile.[10] In female cohorts, the proportional mortality from mesothelioma was higher for amphibole exposure (10.6%) and lowest for chrysotile exposure (0.2%). Thus, these data suggest that amphiboles are the major cause of mesotheliomas in asbestos workers.

Chrysotile miners and millers in Quebec who were supposedly exposed only to chrysotile have developed few mesotheliomas.[22] However, recent fiber analyses on the lungs of both these workers and chrysotile factory workers showed the presence of tremolite.[23] This amphibole in the fibrous form has been implicated as the causative agent of mesothelioma and lung cancers in miners exposed to vermiculite heavily contaminated with tremolite.[24] Although tremolite composes less than 1% of the asbestos dust in the Quebec mines and mills, the relative ratio of tremolite to chrysotile fibers in the lungs of Canadian miners and millers is related directly to their risk of developing mesothelioma.[25]

For the reasons above, the few mesotheliomas observed in Canadian chrysotile workers appear to be attributable to fibrous tremolite, an observation compatible with other evidence that amphiboles are the most pathogenic asbestiform minerals. Likewise, recent data on London asbestos factory workers show that the severity of asbestosis and carcinoma of the lung (as well as mesothelioma) correlates with the lung burden of crocidolite and amosite asbestos and that the proportions of chrysotile and nonasbestos fibers are decreased in comparison to matched control patients.[26] A British cohort exposed since 1970 to chrysotile at airborne levels not exceeding 0.5 to 1.0 fiber per cubic centimeter in the manufacture of friction materials showed no excess of deaths from lung cancer, other asbestos-related tumors, or chronic respiratory disease.[27] These and other data [7,17,21,38] suggest that amphiboles are more potent than chrysotile in the induction of fibrotic lung disease and associated lung cancers.

EXPERIMENTAL MODELS OF ASBESTOS-INDUCED LUNG DISEASE

Several studies have shown that mesotheliomas are induced in a dosage-dependent fashion after intrapleural and intraperitoneal injection of asbestos and other asbestos-like fibers into rodents.[29] Chrysotile was as carcinogenic as the amphiboles by these routes of administration. However, differences have been observed between the carcinogenicity of fibrous and nonfibrous materials. For example, in one study, fibrous tremolite was carcinogenic after intrapleural injection, whereas nonfibrous tremolite was noncarcinogenic at identical concentrations ([30]). Although the natural route of exposure to fibers by inhalation was circumvented in these experiments, they were useful in indicating that fibers longer than 8 μm and less than 0.25 μm in diameter have the most marked carcinogenic potential, that is, the "Stanton hypothesis." These data have been supported by the results of inhalation studies in rats in which short ($\leq$5 μm in length) and long fiber preparations of amosite and chrysotile asbestos have been compared [31]). In contrast to the batches of amosite and chrysotile asbestos containing many long fibers, short fibers of amosite produced neither asbestosis nor pulmonary tumors. Short chrysotile produced a small amount of pulmonary tumors. Short chrysotile produced a small amount of asbestosis and malignancies, but these were attributed to contamination of the short chrysotile preparation by longer fibers. Fewer long than short fibers of both types were present in the lungs of all rats at the termination of exposure, but, regardless of size, fewer chrysotile fibers remained in the lung. These results support the observations that chrysotile fibers, in comparison to amphibole fibers, are cleared more rapidly from human lungs [17]). This phenomenon and limited alveolar penetration of curly chrysotile bundles (rather than their inherent absence of carcinogenicity) may account for the apparent lack of association of chrysotile fibers with the development of mesothelioma in human cohorts.

The exorbitant costs of inhalation experiments with animals preclude long-term studies to determine the carcinogenic potential of asbestos at low-level exposures. The development of malignancies in rodents approaches the 2- to 3-year life-span of these animals [32], a period of too brief to reflect the consequences of the long-term solubility of chrysotile in the human lung.

MECHANISMS OF ASBESTOS-INDUCED INFLAMMATION AND FIBROGENESIS

Both epidemiologic and experimental data support the concept of a threshold for chrysotile-induced pulmonary fibrosis. In a sheep model of asbestosis, inflammation and histopathologic evidence of disease were not observed after less than 100 mg of chrysotile were injected into the trachea of the sheep.[33] After brief, intense inhalation of chrysotile, the sheep accumulated alveolar macrophages (AMs) at areas of deposition of fibers.[34] These cell types are viewed as "effector" cells of disease as they produce a mixture of fibroblast growth factors, chemotactic factors, and fibronectin. Prostaglandins, plasminogen activator, a heat-stable factor similar to platelet-derived growth factor (PDGF), lysosomal enzymes, and active oxygen metabolites, one or more of which may cause proliferation or functional impairment of neighboring epithelial cells and fibroblasts in the lung, were released after exposure of AMs to asbestos in vitro.[35]

These substances might mediate both acute and chronic inflammatory reactions in man and animals after inhalation of asbestos. In support of this hypothesis, AM-derived growth factor (AMDGF), PDGF, superoxide (O_2), and H_2O_2 were spontaneously released from AMs recovered by bronchoalveolar lavage from patients with asbestosis.[36] Similarly, AMs lavaged from both mice and sheep that had an earlier intratracheal injection of chrysotile released enhanced amounts of a growth factor that stimulated proliferation of a human embryonic lung cell line (WI-38).[37]

In one study, AMs from both normal individuals and patients with idiopathic pulmonary fibrosis expressed a 4.2-kilobase messenger RNA complementary to c-sis, a proto-oncogene coding for the B chain of PDGF.[38] The amounts were approximately fourfola higher from AMs of patients with pulmonary fibrosis. Because PDGF is mitogenic to mesenchymal cells, which possess functional PDGF receptors, elevated levels of PDGF in lung tissue or fluids could induce lung fibroblasts to divide or to produce exorbitant amounts of collagen, the hallmark of the fibrotic lesion. Quiescent human mesothelial cells also undergo DNA synthesis after exposure to PDGF and a broad spectrum of other growth factors.[39]

Within the past few years, several laboratories have focused on active oxygen species (AOS) as causative agents of both asbestosis and asbestos-related malignancies. Increased amounts of superoxide (O_2) have been produced after rodent AMs were exposed in vitro to long asbestos fibers, whereas generation was minimal after shorter fibers and nonfibrous particles were introduced.[40] Smaller fibers and particles are incorporated into phagolysosomes by AMs, whereas longer fibers are incompletely phagocytosed, a process liberating more AOS.

The observation that exogenous administration of scavengers of AOS prevents asbestos-induced cell death to cultures of tracheal epithelial cells and lung fibroblasts [41] suggests that AOS are intimately related to asbestos toxicity even in the absence of AMs. Fibers may induce generation of AOS after phagocytosis or by extracellular mechanisms. For example, recent studies with asbestos in cell-free systems have demonstrated by electron spin resonance that chrysotile, crocidolite, and amosite generate AOS in the presence of H_2O_2 or physciological saline [42]. Under these circumstances, Fe^{2+} on the surface of the fiber appears to drive a modified Haber-Weiss (Fenton) reaction that results in production of the toxic hydroxyl radical (OH^-) from H_2O_2 and O_2. These reactions result in lipid peroxidation, which is prevented by incubation of asbestos with the iron chelator, desferroxamine [43].

At high concentrations, AOS are cytotoxic to cells of the respiratory tract, but at low concentrations they induce functional changes in rodent lung fibroblasts that may be critical to the pathogenesis of asbestos-inducted fibrotic lung disease. For example, after addition of xanthine and xanthine oxidase (a chemical generating system producing O_2^-), rat lung fibroblasts in vitro produced increased amounts of cell-associated collagen in a pattern similar to that observed after their exposure to crocidolite asbestos [40, 44]. In an inhalation model of rapid-onset asbestosis, osmotic pumps containing polyethylene glycol (PEG)—conjugated catalase, the enzyme scavenging H_2O_2 were implanted subcutaneously into rats before they were exposed to crocidolite for 20 days [45]. This procedure boosted levels of catalase in the sera and lungs of these animals and ameliorated both the inflammation and the severity and extent of fibrotic lesions that normally develop after inhalation of asbestos. This study was the first successful experimental approach to the prevention of asbestos-associated lung disease. Moreover, the results support the concept of a cause and effect relation between AOS and the development of asbestosis.

MECHANISMS OF ASBESTOS-INDUCED CARCINOGENESIS

Carcinogenesis is a multistage process that classically has been described in two stages [46]. The "initiation" stage corresponds to a heritable genetic change (point mutation) induced in a cell by a carcinogenic substance. It is followed by the "promotion" stage, a series of events in which the initiated cell undergoes proliferative and genotypic changes conferring the malignant phenotype. During the past few years, the identification of a number of protooncogenes has resulted in a new understanding of the successive genetic events involved in the process of malignant transformation. Increased expression of these genes may cause the production of growth factors or growth-factor receptors. Loss of other genes (antioncogenes) also appears to contribute to the carcinogenic process. These findings indicate that the distinction between genetic and epigenetic events in carcinogensis is not simple, especially because chromosomal rearrangements or deletions associated with point mutation and activation or loss of genes can happen at any stage in the process of cell transformation.

Whether the multistage model is directly applicable to asbestos-associated carcinogensis is unclear. Unlike most carcinogens, asbestos does not cause base substitution and frameshift mutations in bacteral-mutation assays.[47] Of the 23 agents designated as group 1 human carcinogens by the International Agency for Research on Cancer (IARC), only asbestos and conjugated estrogens were nongenotoxic as defined by both the Ames test and rodent bonemarrow assays for detection of chromosomal aberrations or micro-nucleated erythrocytes.[48] Although asbestos was weakly mutagenic in Chinese hamster lung cells,[49] it was not mutagenic in liver ephithelial cells or in Syrian hamster embryo (SHE) fibroblasts.[50] Asbestos did not cause morphologic transformation of C3H 10T½ cells,[51] but transformed both BALB/c#3T3 and SHE fibroblasts.[52] Glass fibers and nonfibrous silica (albeit at much higher concentrations) also were active in the SHE bioassay. In this system, longer, thinner fibers were more potent in the induction of transformation and chromosomal anomalies, an observation consistent with the increased malignant potential of these fibers in comparison to shorter fibers or particles after their administration intrapleurally, intraperitoneally, or by inhalation to rodents [29, 30].

In these and other in vitro studies, the biologic effects of fiber types have been assessed comparatively on a mass (milligrams of fibers per dish) rather than a numerical (numbers of fibers of a given size per dish) basis. Cytotoxicity and cytogenetic effects of chrysotile, crocidolite, and erionite (an aluminosilicate fiber) recently were compared in Chinese hamster lung fibroblasts (V79 cells).[53] Numbers of chrysotile fibers required to produce cytotoxic or cytogenetic changes were several orders of magnitudes higher in comparison to erionite, the most potent fiber, or crocidolite, a fiber of intermediate potency. These results are consistent with the higher tumorigenic potential of erionite in rodent inhalation experiments.[54]

In some studies, asbestos appears to augment the mutagenic and carcinogenic effects of chemical carcinogens and radiation. For example, both crocidolite and chrysotile increased the frequency of mutation and transformation in rodent epithelial cells and fibroblasts exposed to benzo[a] pyrene (BaP) [50] and radiation or radon alpha particles.[51] However, synergistic effects of asbestos and BaP were not observed in two studies with SHE and rat mesothelial cells, respectively,[52, 55].

The particulate nature of asbestos and its capacity to bind nucleic acids has prompted transfection studies in which asbestos was used as a vehicle for introducing DNA or RNA into a number of cell lines.[56] Under these circumstances, asbestos was intermediate in rank in comparison to a number of other insoluble facilitators including calcium phosphate, talc, and kaolin, none of which have been associated with the induction of cancer.

After addition to human or rat mesothelial cells, both chrysotile (in rats) [57] and amosite (in humans) [58] have caused aneuploidy and altered growth characteristics after repeated passaging. Injection of rat mesothelial cells into nude mice after a single exposure to chrysotile did not cause tumors in animals, but multiple exposures (36 times) to chrysotile and repeated passaging resulted in turmorigenic cell populations.[57] In contrast, human mesothelial cells displaying chromosomal abnormalities and growth alterations after duplicate exposures to cytotoxic concentrations of amosite were not tumorigenic in nude mice.[58] Asbestos promoted the proliferation of mesothelial cells both in organ cultures of human mesothelium exposed to asbestos in vitro and in mice given intraperitoneal injections of asbestos.[59]

Asbestos fibers come in contact with the chromosomes of rat mesothelial cells [60] and the mitotic apparatus of V79 [53] and SHE [61] cells in vitro. These interactions might induce chromosomal misaggregartion or abnormalities. Several investigators have examined chromosomal aberrations in human mesotheliomas, but changes appeared inconsistent from tumor to tumor. The most common abnormalities involved inversions, translocations, and deletions of chromosomes 1, 3, 7, 9, 17, and 22 [62]. Constitutively enhanced expression of the PDGF-B gene, the proto-oncogene c-sis, was observed in human mesothelioma cell lines when compared to normal human mesothelial cells [63].

In comparison to human mesothelial cells, human bronchial epithelial cells in vitro are relatively resistant to asbestos. In one study, concentrations of chrysotile, crocidolite, or amosite asbestos approximately ten times as high as that required for mesothelial cells were required to achieve a comparable increase in toxicity (as measured by a 50% decrease in colony-forming efficiency of human bronchial epithelial cells) [64]. In another study, aneuploidy was not increased significantly over a range of concentrations of either crocidolite or chrysotile asbestos [65]. This latter observation and the demonstration that insertion of asbestos into rat tracheal grafts can cause the development of carcinomas following insertion of subcarcionogenic amounts of the polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbon, dimethylbenzo [a]anthracene [66], suggest that asbestos is a promoter in the development of lung cancers. In support of this concept, both crocidolite and chrysotile asbestos induced a number of biochemical and proliferative alterations in both rodent and human tracheal epithelial cell and organ cultures that were similar to those observed in mouse skin that had been treated with the tumor promoter 12-O-tetradecanoylphorbol-13-acetate (TPA)[67]. The repertoire of these asbestos-associated proliferative changes, which were masked in tracheal epithelial cells in a high-serum containing medium or by addition of transforming growth factor-type B (TGF-β_1)[68], included enhanced incorporation of ^{3}H-thymidine, increases in colony-forming efficiency, and the development of squamous metaplasia, that is, conversion of differentiated mucociliary cells to keratinizing cells resembling epidermis. Induction of ornithine decarboxylase (ODC), a rate-limiting enzyme in the biosynthesis of polyamines that is increased in mouse skin after exposure to TPA but not after addition of nontumor promoting phorbol derivatives, also occurred in a dosage-dependent fashion in tracheal epithelial cells exposed to long, thin, asbestos and glass fibers. In contrast, nonfibrous particles and shorter fibers did not increase ODC activity at similar concentrations.[69]

Until quite recently, it was unclear how asbestos triggered proliferation in tracheal epithelial cells. However, several pieces of data suggest that mechanisms of cell signaling by asbestos are similar to those observed with TPA, a soluble tumor promoter that binds directly to protein kinase C (PKC), a calcium- and phospholipid-dependent enzyme that activates a limb of the phosphoinositide signal-transduction pathway[70]. Mitogenic concentrations of crocidolite asbestos caused increased accumulation of diacylglycerol in tracheal epithelial cells[71] and subsequent activation of PKC[72], presumably by activation of membrane phospholipases. The increased production of inositol tris- and tetrakisphosphates appeared responsible for the generation of diacylglycerol, which preceded increased cell division. Abrogation of crocidolite-induced ODC activity in tracheal epithelial cells by inhibitors of PKC and calcium channel antagonists[69] suggests that PKC is related causally to asbestos-associated cell proliferation.

Mechanisms other than tumor promotion by asbestos also may explain interactions between smoking and asbestos; these mechanisms could be important in the development of lung cancers in asbestoes workers[7, 73]. For example, smoking impaired clearance of amosite asbestos from rodent lungs and increased retention of fibers in airway epithelial cells[74]. Both cigarette smoke and asbestos induced AOS in a synergistic fashion in vitro and damaged isolated bacteriophage DNA[75]. AOS liberated from asbestos fibers also catalyzed the oxidation of 6-hydroxybenzo[a]pyrene to a more mutagenic and carcinogenic radical[76]. Because crocidolite and chrysotile asbestos adsorbed BaP and acted as vehicles to increase both uptake of these lipophilic carcinogens and formation of DNA adducts in tracheal epithelial cells[77], fibers might facilitate the initiation of lung tumors by BaP.

PUBLIC POLICY

The available experimental and epidemiological data indicate that both fiber type and size are important determinants of the pathogenicity of asbestos. Although asbestos has caused disease in the workplace[78] and such occurrence has resulted in calls for regulations to protect workers[79], recent epidemiologic data are concordant with the suggestion that exposure to chrysotile at current occupational standards does not increase the risk of asbestos-associated diseases[17, 21, 27, 28]. Unlike most other countries, particularly in the European community, which have more stringent requirements for regulation and importation of amphiboles, federal policy in the United States does not differentiate between different types of asbestos.

Does airborne asbestos present a risk to the health of individuals in schools and other buildings? The available data do not indicate that asbestos-associated malignancies or functional impairment will occur as a result of exposure to most airborne concentrations of asbestos in buildings. First and foremost, the levels of airborne asbestos in buildings, even with damaged ACM, are magnitudes lower than concentrations in the unregulated workplace in the past and approximately 1/100 of the permissible exposure of 0.2 fibers per cubic centimeter of air in the U.S. workplace[80]. Before the enforcement of occupational standards, workplace concentrations of 100 or more fibers per cubic centimeter of air were not uncommon[81]. In contrast, surveys of asbestos in schools and public buildings show that the mean airborne concentrations are several thousand-fold lower (Table 1). With few exceptions, the type of asbestos fiber found predominantly in buildings is chrysotile. Accumulating evidence indicates that this asbestos type is probably not associated with the occurence of mesotheliomas at low levels of exposure. For example, recent analyses on the fiber concentrations in lungs of asbestos workers showed that chrysotile workers with mesothelioma had 400 times the median lung fiber burden in comparison to workers exposed to amphiboles. Data indicate that mesotheliomas in chrysotile workers appeared at lung burdens comparable to that required for the development of asbestosis, a disease associated with occupational exposure to asbestos in the past unregulated workplace[82].

Transmission electron microscopy of air sample is essential for the identification and quantitation of finer asbestos fibers. In the United States and United Kingdom, the direct transmission electron microscopy method is advocated to determine airborne asbestos fiber concentrations in buildings. In France, the indirect transmission electron microscopy technique is used, and concentrations are expressed on a mass (milligram) basis. The limit for detection of fibers by phase-contrast microscopy is approximately 0.01 fibers per cubic centimeter of air, a concentration higher than that reported in most schools and buildings (Table 1). Moreover, phase-contrast microscopy cannot be used to identify types of fibers (asbestos or nonasbestos) or to detect fibers less than 0.5 μm in diameter, twice the diameter of fibers associated with the greatest biological activity and induction of tumors in rodents (diameters <0.25 μm, that is, Stanton fibers).[29, 30] Such long, thin asbestos fibers are rarely found in air samples of buildings[81, 83]. As shown in Table 1, fiber concentrations from recent studies in buildings are comparable to levels in outdoor air, a point surely relevant to assessing the health risks of asbestos in buildings. Airborne concentrations of asbestos in buildings reported in the 1970s were somewhat higher, presumably because of earlier, less sophisticated sampling and analytical techniques.

Table 1: Summary statistics for average airborne fiber concentrations in U.S. schools[88] and buildings.[89] The data used in the calculation of each statistic are the average concentrations (expressed as number of fibers greater than 5 μm in length per cubic centimeter of air) in a building (for indoor samples) or the concentration outside each building [for outdoor samples[89]]. By visual inspection, category 1 buildings contained no asbestos-containing material (ACM), category 2 buildings contained ACM in primarily good condition, and buildings in category 3 showed at least one area of significantly damaged ACM. In the study on public buildings, 387 indoor and 48 outdoor air samples were evaluated. No asbestos fibers were detected in 83% of the 387 samples. The sample size is given in parentheses below each heading.

Recent epidemiologic studies of deaths from mesothelioma in the general population also suggest that risk from asbestos in buildings is miniscule[9, 10, 84]. In comparison to lung cancers (an average of 130,000 cases per year in the United States, largely attributed to smoking), an estimated 1,500 cases of mesothelioma per year occur in the U.S. population[85]. The data on death rates from pleural or peritoneal mesotheliomas over the past 10 to 20 years indicate that mesotheliomas are increasing in males over 65 years of age who have a past occupational history of exposure to asbestos.[84] By contrast, death rates from mesothelioma in females of all ages have declined slightly or remained constant. These results support the concept that asbestos in buildings is not an important risk factor, as one would expect increased mesotheliomas in both males and females in this case. A recent French study did not show increased risks of asbestos-associated malignancies, pleural plaques, or functional impairment of the lung (effects clearly present in asbestos workers) in persons exposed for 10 years to airborne asbestos in buildings.[86] Although this survey is still in progress, no mesotheliomas have been observed to date among approximately 15,000 permanent occupants.

Although the validity of extrapolating from high to low dose levels has never been confirmed empirically in the evaluation of asbestos, calculated lifetime risks from mesotheliomas and lung cancers attributable to asbestos in schools and other buildings have appeared in recent years[85, 87]. The linear dose-response equations in these models have been used with the assumption that there is no threshold for disease, a hypothesis which is open to question. Moreover, the range of estimated risks varies from study to study. With the exception of one analysis,[85], differences between the pathogenic potential of chrysotiles and amphiboles have not been considered in these assessments, and the importance of fiber size has been ignored. Regardless, examination of combined data from published risk estimates shows that risks of asbestos-related total deaths (both lung cancers and mesotheliomas) due to exposure in schools are magnitudes lower than commonplace risks in modern-day society (Table 2).

Table 2. Estimates of risk from asbestos exposure in schools in comparison to other risks in U.S. society. Data from six published risk estimates [87] in which total deaths (lung cancer and mesotheliomas) attributable to asbestos exposure over a lifetime were estimated per 1 million students exposed to 0.00024 fibers per cubic centimeter air (the mean airborne concentration in schools, Table 1) for five school years, beginning at age 10. Estimates indicate that the annual rate is 0.005 to 0.093 deaths per million students for an average life expectancy of 75 years. Modified with permission from Weill and Hughes.[90]

The AHERA ruling of 1986 brought asbestos to the attention of the U.S. public and instilled fears in parents that their children would contract asbestos-related malignancies because of high levels of airborne asbestos fibers in schools. Panic has been fueled by unsupported concepts such as the "one fiber theory," which maintains that one fiber of inhaled asbestos will cause cancer. As a result of public pressure, asbestos often is removed haphazardly from schools and public buildings even though most damaged ACM is in boiler rooms and other areas which are inaccessible to students or residents.[1] The removal of previously undamaged or encapsulated asbestos can lead to increases in airborne concentrations of fibers in buildings, sometimes for months afterwards,[83] and can result in problems with safe removal and disposal. Asbestos abatement also has led to the exposure of a large new cohort of relatively young asbestos removal workers. While these people should be protected by careful regulation of the circumstances of removal, they are often exposed under suboptimal working conditions.

As a result of the AHERA ruling, public and private schools are required to inspect for asbestos and inform parents if ACM are present. Although the law does not require or set standards for the removal of asbestos, schools, often with little expert advice, must submit a management plan detailing how they will deal with damaged asbestos and can be fined a maximum of $5000 per day for lack of compliance to deadlines. The EPA has recommended bulk sampling of ACM to determine the presence of asbestos and visual inspection to determine the course of action, rather than measurement of airborne levels of fibers—data that are far more important in determining the need, if any, for removal of ACM.

The available data and comparative risk assessments (Table 2) indicate that chrysotile asbestos, the type of fiber found predominantly in U.S. schools and buildings, is not a health risk in the nonoccupational environment. Clearly, the asbestos panic in the U.S. must be curtailed, especially because unwarranted and poorly controlled asbestos abatement results in unnecessary risks to young removal workers who may develop asbestos-related cancers in later decades. The extensive removal of asbestos has occurred less frequently in Europe.

Prevention (especially in adolescents) of tobacco smoking, the principal cause of lung cancer in the general population, is both a more promising and rational approach to eliminating lung tumors than asbestos abatement. Even acknowledging that brief, intense exposures to asbestos might occur in custodians and service workers in buildings with severely damaged ACM, worker education and building maintenance will prove far more effective in risk prevention for these workers.

CLEAN AIR ACT OF 1989

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I would like to say at the outset of my comments on the clean air bill presently before us that I very much appreciate the work of the distinguished chairman of the Environment and Public Works Subcommittee on Environmental Protection, Senator MAX BAUCUS; as well as that of the committee's ranking member, Senator JOHN CHAFEE. Their diligence has produced a much needed bill at a time when the American people are demanding that we rid our cities of smog, protect our forests and lakes from acid precipitation, and control our emissions of hazardous air pollutants.

I support the American people in their fight for cleaner, healthier air. I am sure the rest of my Senate colleagues also favor clean air, and so it is most important that we cooperate with each other to pass an equitable and effective bill. There are divisions between us that must be reconciled before we can deliver to the American people the bill they demand. These divisions are neither partisan nor philosophical. Members on both sides of the aisle want healthier air, and none among us is ideologically against the Government passing laws to achieve that end.

Mr. President, what divides us is a polarizing debate that has slipped into "all-or-nothingism." Balancing our environmental goals with what is technologically and economically possible is a most difficult task. Indeed, because the task is so difficult, some have chosen not to seek balance at all. But may I remind my colleagues that we will never have a healthy environment with a sick economy. The truly life-threatening pollution in the economically weak states of Mexico, Poland, and the Soviet Union stands as proof of this fact.

I am speaking before my fellow Members today to plead that a spirit of cooperation prevail in this debate. It is counterproductive to label any of our colleagues a "dirty air Senator" simply because he or she dares to say that some pollution controls do not produce enough environmental benefit to justify their cost. By all indications, the American people are ready to pay the price for healthier air. But please hear me when I say the people will demand that they get what they paid for in air pollution controls. The new awakening to environmentalism will come to a sudden screeching halt if this Congress sells the people a bill of goods in the clean air bill, and that would be too bad because I happen to think it is important.

Some of my colleagues do not feel compelled to argue for a balanced bill because they do not believe critics of the bill, or they do not represent constituencies that would suffer from shutdowns in the coal, steel, automotive, chemical, or like industries. But I tell you, their constituents depend on the products of those industries that Illinois, and other States like mine, produce. Is it our purpose now to do serious economic harm to the industrial heartland that built this country and gave us the highest standard of living in the world? Despite the fact that it is obviously not our purpose to do that, we may unnecessarily wreak havoc on our economy if we do not inject more balance into the bill before us.

Foremost among the provisions of the bill in need for balance is title IV, the acid rain control section. The bill requires nine States that generate about half of the sulfur dioxide in the country to make three-quarters or better of the sulfur reductions. I support the idea of making the lowest cost emission reductions first, and I acknowledge that there is great potential to make these reductions in the nine States targeted by the bill. It only seems fair, however, that if these nine States are asked to make a disproportionate share of this country's investment in acid rain control, that the other beneficiaries of the investment share in the cost. I accept the premise that the polluter should pay, but I would add that the polluter must pay in proportion to the pollution it emits. This bill violates the very polluter pay principle that its sponsors tout. A very conscious decision has been made to target utility plants in the Midwest to curb our nationwide sulfur and nitrogen oxides emissions. Someone unfamiliar with the facts would assume that these plants were our only source of sulfur and nitrogen oxides—but it is not true. The State of Texas—and I am not picking on Texas—has the largest overall emissions of nitrogen oxides, and it emits more—listen to this, Mr. President—sulfur dioxide than my own State of Illinois. Yet, Texas is exempted from any reduction requirements and costs associated with the national effort to curb acid rain. It is not fair that certain polluting States should get a free ride on my State's investment to control a national problem. If we are going to target just a few of the emitters of acid rain precursors, then we must spread the burden nationally. This is no different than the savings and loan bailout. Very few States were actually responsible for the S&L crisis, yet the entire country paid to bail out the industry. We did this because the vitality of the thrift industry is important to the whole country—not just California or Texas. Well, the whole country wants clean air, and we cannot expect my folks in Illinois and a few other States to pay the whole cost.

As a consequence of the inequity of the acid rain title, nearly 20,000 of my constituents are expected to lose their coal mining and related jobs. Hundreds of thousands of my constituents will experience utility rate increases of 20 to 25 percent which amounts to several hundred dollars per year. And my constituents will do this to control a problem where the benefit will be realized in the far away mountains of New England, while they continue to pay to subsidize cheap electric rates for customers of northwestern hydro projects, and cheap water rates for western farm irrigation. I ask my colleagues, where is the justice?

There are other areas of the bill that, I dare say, are also out of balance. I do not pretend to be an expert in the very technical field of environmental science and pollution control. It makes sense to me, however, that our industries that emit toxic and hazardous pollutants invest in the best pollution control devices and techniques that are available.

I am pleased that the Senate bill has taken this approach by requiring maximum achievable control technology [MACT]. I am told that MACT technology is expected to reduce toxic emissions from 90 to 95 percent. Let us do this, and then, if real human populations are still at risk, let us do what is reasonable to reduce emissions even more. Let us not, however, shut down important industries to this country's economic independence without some reasonable scientific certainty that a real human population is at risk, and therefore make such shutdowns necessary. If we begin shutting down our coking and steel plants is there anyone here that would deny that those activities will go on somewhere else in this world? Is the environmental community satisfied to simply stop the population here, only to send it to some poor Third World country that would jump at the chance to increase their exports of coke and steel? I promise you that the other nations that manufacture that which is no longer economic to make in this country, will do so without the strict controls that we already require today. The reality is that we live in both a global economy and a global environment. Can we really accomplish our environmental purposes if we do not keep U.S. businesses internationally competitive? I submit that we cannot, and that the residual risk provision in this bill could make this country's great new export the exportation of pollution, along with American jobs. Shut downs will come back to haunt us in the form of a deteriorating global environment.

My friends and colleagues, I simply want to say today, we can work out a bill that will give us clean air without pitting region against region. We should not attempt to have one region profit at the expense of another. Let us together fashion a bill, that will leave as our legacy, air that is fresh and healthy, as well as a robust economy.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. DOLE] is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to the Senator from Illinois, and I hope there is some way we can resolve the problem. I know it is a very difficult problem with the States he mentioned. I know they are on that particular item right now in a private session trying to figure out some way to resolve it.

(The remarks of Mr. DOLE pertaining to the introduction of S. 2094 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am very glad that the attention of the Chamber is pointed at the problem of help for Eastern Europe. The Lord knows that the changes have been fantastic in the last week and in fact, some, have occurred in the last few days. Whether the help they need will be more technical help, or advice, or more material, or dollars, remains to be seen.

A group of us in the Foreign Relations Committee have introduced a bill on that subject. I am delighted to hear that the administration has sent up its bill. I might add that it did seem a little premature to move ahead tomorrow. For that reason, I have postponed the meeting of our committee until after the recess. I hope that such a period of time will enable us to blend together the two bills in the best way possible in as nonpartisan a way as we can with as many people on both sides of the aisle showing support.

I must say, I yearn for the kind of situation that existed in the days when I first joined the committee, in 1964. It was truly nonpartisan. And I would like to see us move in that same direction.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. Let me thank the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island and indicate for the record that this is exactly the type of response you would expect from the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island—fair and objective.

Hopefully we can, as he indicates, have a hearing, have the Secretary of State or whoever he may recommend, and come together with some bipartisan bill, as I think we almost did in the aid to Poland. It was pretty bipartisan, although we had our political differences. I suggest that if we do that, is is going to be properly grounded, and it will be a much better program. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, what is the parliamentary situation?

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In answer to the inquiry by the Senator, time for morning business has expired.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes in order to introduce a bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. BUMPERS. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. BUMPERS pertaining to the introduction of S. 2093 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LIEBERMAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I ask that I might be permitted to speak for 10 minutes as if in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ASSISTANCE TO PANAMA

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I am tremendously pleased and delighted that we have moved so expeditiously, at the request of the President and the Foreign Relations Committee, in seeing to it that S. 2073 will be introduced. S. 2073 is a bill to authorize United States assistance and trade benefits to Panama and to authorize certain assistance to support the transition to democracy in Eastern Europe. I believe, it will be passed, if not unanimously, nearly unanimously, later today. I think it is important that we act expeditiously; that we send a signal to the free world and to the Panamanian people who are in need.

This bill will authorize up to $42 million for economic assistance, $10 million for housing guarantee programs, and an additional $1.2 million in law enforcement assistance to train civilian law enforcement forces in Panama which are the new public forces.

Mr. President, I think most important is a strong section of the bill which will require that no later than April 15 of this year the President submit a detailed report to the Congress as it relates to the specific actions being undertaken by the Panamanian Government to: One, modify the existing bank secrecy laws in order to facilitate detection and prosecution of criminal activities; second, and I think most important, the inclusion of an exchange-of-information agreement between the United States and Panama; and, third, agreements entered into by the Government of Panama, or in the process of negotiation, that are designed to deter illegal financial transactions and to facilitate the early detection and prosecution of such illegal activities.

It is important, Mr. President, that there be a strong signal from Panama that it will be rejecting the money-laundering activities in which so many of its banks have engaged. Some indications were that as many as 30 percent of the banks, these large financial institutions, may have been involved in money laundering for the drug cartel.

Certainly, the United States has no right to insist that they enact legislation that goes beyond what other countries have enacted, but we certainly have every right to expect that Panama enter into an agreement similar to those that we have entered into with other countries such as the Swiss and the Cayman Islands, and to enact legislation to see to it that their banks do not become money havens or money laundering centers for the Colombian drug cartel.

So I commend the committee for seeing to it that this legislation carries that mandate. We are anxious to assist in the restoration of an economy that has been shattered and we recognize the necessity of providing immediate housing assistance. I was there, Mr. President. I saw those who were impoverished, who were homeless, who were living in tent cities, who were living in an airport hangar, and a whole family in a little 9-by-6 cubbyhole. They were still, notwithstanding the tremendous sacrifice and the loss of their home and their merger possessions, grateful to the United States for liberating them. Some told me, "We were exiles; prisoners in our own country."

But we do have a responsibility to assist in their economic recovery and to assist these poorest of the poor in obtaining decent shelter. I believe, Mr. President, that important as that is, we also have to be mindful that the Panamanians cannot be permitted to slip back so that some can avail themselves of the richest of the cartel and slip into that kind of business as usual mentality.

So I commend the committee and its adoption of this legislation and the adoption of those provisions contained in S. 2073 that will see to it that money laundering does not become the business of the day.

Also, Mr. President, I think it is extremely unfortunate that some newspaper accounts have characterized the leader, President Endara, and others, as being opposed to changes in money laundering provisions. There have been innunedoes and the outright accusations in some accounts that somehow they are doing this because of their connections to the banking industry.

I have been told that President Endara indeed does not have a stake in any bank, is a private lawyer, and may have represented some. I tell you that is far different than the kind of thing that we have been hearing and reading about—that somehow the Government is opposed because they represented banks, or are involved in banks, engaged in money laundering activities. That is the furthest thing from the truth.

These men have placed their lives on the line. They stood up to a dictator. We saw Billy Ford and we saw Endara beaten down, and they almost lost their lives. They had no troops. They were there alone standing for democracy. They took incredible risks. I think it is absolutely the wrong kind of thing to cast the kind of aspersions that have been cast on their integrity.

Certainly there may be some in the banking community who are resisting and would like to attempt to do business as usual. I met with them about 10 days ago.

I have every confidence in speaking to the two vice presidents, Arias Calderon, Billy Ford, and to President Endara. They are committed to bringing democracy to Panama in a pluralistic way. They all represent different parties. They are working together. They are putting aside their political differences and they are committed to seeing to it that the cartel, and the fruits of the illegal drug enterprise, do not once again reestablish in Panama.

I think the media does a terrible disservice in attempting to put any kind of inference in that they are looking to protect the cartel and the banks that have engaged in this activity. That is not the case.

I believe that the day we pass this legislation, we will be moving forward in a very constructive manner. This is only the first initial emergency package. Certainly we will have to do more.

I think the Panamanian people recognize theirs is going to be a difficult lot in restoring their economic vibrance and vitality. But it is a price that they are willing to pay; a price for liberty and democracy. We have made it available.

I thank the President. I yield the floor. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERREY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, for the information of Senators, following consultation with the distinguished Republican leader, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the chairman and ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee, and the administration, I will mometarily propound a unanimous-consent request governing consideration of H.R. 3952, legislation to provide assistance to Panama.

I believe we have this worked out in a way that is acceptable to all. I do not now have any request for a rollcall vote and, accordingly, it is our intention that the bill be considered and then approved by voice vote. If any Senator requests a vote, and I am not encouraging such request, indeed, I actively discourage it, it would mean we have to delay the vote for a while because several Senators are not immediately available and they would have to have time to be present for the vote.

If we can proceed with this matter, as I have suggested, by voice vote, there will be no further rollcall votes this evening and this will complete action for the day. Then we will return tomorrow morning.

PROVIDING URGENT ASSISTANCE FOR DEMOCRACY IN PANAMA

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of H.R. 3952, a bill to provide urgent assistance for democracy in Panama, and that it be considered under the following conditions: That no amendments, motions, or points of order be in order with respect to the consideration of the bill; that it be considered under a time limitation of 15 minutes—5 minutes under the direction and control of Senator BYRD; 10 minutes under the control of the managers equally divided between Senator PELL and Senator HELMS or their designees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I thank my colleagues and I now yield the floor for whichever Senator wishes to proceed the first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 3952) to authorize certain United States assistance and trade benefits for Panama, and for other purposes.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, yesterday, our committee, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, reported unanimously S. 2073, to provide $42 million in emergency humanitarian assistance to Panama, and to remove the sanctions in law against Panama, thereby restoring Panama's eligibility for a package of loans, guarantees, and private investment incentives totaling $500 million.

Equally importantly, this bill authorizes up to $10 million of funds to be made available immediately to provide Eastern European countries assistance for their upcoming multiparty elections this spring.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee bill is identical to the companion bill passed by the House of Representatives earlier today, and which we are seeking to pass today so that the measure can go to the President for his signature without any delay

Let me take a moment to summarize the provisions of the bill for my colleagues.

Title I authorizes up to $32 million of prior year economic assistance funds to Panama for this fiscal year, notwithstanding the Brooke-Alexander amendment which prohibits Foreign Assistance Act [FAA] assistance to a country in arrears more than 6 months on FAA loans. It also waives the requirement in the annual Appropriations Act that reobligated funds must be made available for countries in the same region as the original obligation, thus allowing $15 million in 1985 funds originally obligated for Sudan and $15 million in 1987 funds originally obligated for Somalia be reobligated in Panama. I should note that an agreement has been reached among my colleagues on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, members of the Senate Appropriations Committee, and the administration to restore $30 million to Africa in the so-called Panama supplemental which we will be considering later this year.

The bill further authorizes up to $10 million in off-budget housing investment guarantees and authorizes Trade Credit Insurance Program funding to support additional Exim lending to private sector borrowers for fiscal year 1990 to Panama, notwithstanding the Brooke-Alexander amendment.

The bill also authorizes up to $1.2 million for the Administration of Justice [AOJ] program for training civilian law enforcement forces in Panama in human rights, civil law, and investigative and civilian law enforcement techniqus, nowithstanding section 660 of the FAA, which prohibits FAA assistance for police training. The administration has provided very specific information as to how it intends to implement this aspect of the legislation, and I ask unanimous consent that a letter from Assistant Secretary Mullins be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, DC, February 6, 1990.

Hon. CLAIBORNE PELL,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate.

This is to confirm information given to members of your staff regarding an interim program of assistance to the Panamanian police that we intend to implement through the International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program of the U.S. Department of Justice (ICITAP). This assistance would fall within the terms of section 102(b)(1) of the legislation currently under construction for urgent assistance to democracy in Panama.

The Government of Panama has requested U.S. assistance in establishing a truly professional law enforcement institution to replace the Panama Defense Forces. The assistance required falls into two basic categories—institutional development and individual training.

Based on its assessment of training needs and specific requests of the Minister of Government and Justice, ICITAP proposes to initiate activities in Panama by focusing on the following areas: (1) development of and technical assistance to implement recommendations to restructure basic police functions, e.g., the internal organization of police precincts or ozone stations, recruiting or screening of new officers, administration of central functions such as maintenance of criminal and fingerprint records, and establishment of an Office of Professional Responsibility; (2) courses in basic police skills, including patrol and traffic, minimum use of deadly force and mechanics of arrest, as well as more advanced courses for mid-level managers and executive-level seminars; and (3) equipment, training and technical assistance to enable the Technical Judicial Police to perform basic forensic and crime laboratory analyses and to develop crime scene processing capabilities, including fingerprint equipment and supplies, crime scene response equipment and equipment for firearms identification, drug analysis, serology, questioned documents and toxicology.

While priorities by activity may change over the next few months, present plans indicate the following approximate level of funding for each of these activities:

Assistance in reorganization	$250,000
Courses	700,000
Forensic development	250,000
Total	1,200,000

A tentative course list is attached for your information.

At the conclusion of these activities, approximately 1000 police officers and investigators will have been trained for a total of 1700 student weeks of training. Instructors will be trained along with regular officers to enable Panamanians to begin training, with technical assistance as needed, in patrol and traffic, techniques and mechanics of arrest, and basic police skills for recruits.

The program will be funded with $1.2 million of the $7 million in Economic Support Funds earmarked for FY 1990 for programs under section 534(b)(3) of the Foreign Assistance Act and section 599G of P.L. 101-167. In the supplemental appropriations bill for Panama, we will be seeking replenishment of these funds for previously planned programs in other countries of the region.

Officials of the Departments of State and Justice directly involved in the implementation of the administration of Justice program will continue their periodic briefings of committee staff and will be prepared to answer questions concerning the ICITAP program in Panama as it develops.

Sincerely,

JANET G. MULLINS,
Assistant Secretary, Legislative Affairs.

Mr. PELL. Also related to the program of assistance to develop a civilian Panamanian police force, the bill authorizes use of the military assistance pipeline for Panama ($5.5 million in MAP and $3.8 million in unused FMS concessional credits) for procurement of law enforcement equipment, primarily police uniforms and radios, and sets a $500,000 ceiling on the procurement of lethal weapons, restricting any procurement of lethal weapons to those appropriate for standard civilian law enforcement purposes.

Section 102 of the bill waives application of the requirement in the Foreign Assistance Act that the President certify that Panama is fully cooperating in the war on drugs for 1988 and 1989, citing United States vital national interests and the Endara government's indicated willingness to cooperate fully. The effect of this is to restore Panama's eligibility for Exim Bank financing, Public Law 480, and other non-FAA assistance.

Section 103 of the bill deems conditions of the Narcotics Control Act to have been satisfied upon enactment of this act, allowing preferential tariff treatment under the generalized system of preferences.

Section 104 requires a Presidential report on or before April 15, 1990, to the Congress detailing specific actions being taken by the goverment of Panama to modify Panama's existing bank secrecy laws.

Title II of the bill authorizes up to $10 million of fiscal year 1990 ESP funds to support open and free multiparty national or regional elections in Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia.

Mr. President, there is no question that Panama needs immediate assistance to meet basic human needs, trade, and investment opportunities for the private sector, and substantial new resources to reactivate the economy after 2 years of economic deterioration. The legislation before us will begin to repair the war damage and reconstruct the Panama economy. It will assist in the vitally needed efforts to replace Panama's corrupt and discredited military forces with an efficient, civilian police force. It will also lend vitally needed support to develop truly democratic institutions in Eastern Europe. I urge all of my colleagues to join with me in supporting this emergency legislation.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The President pro tempore, the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I wish to point out that the Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations, under the able leadership of Senator LEAHY, participated in identifying the sources from which the appropriations contained in this important measure will be transferred. There is one section of H.R. 3952, however, that does not contain the usual requirement that the President notify the appropriate congressional committees of the precise use of these funds prior to expending them. That section provides $10 million for assistance to Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia.

My concern about this matter has been expressed to the Acting Secretary of State, Lawrence S. Eagleburger, that I could not support the bill without his assurances that reprogramming procedures would be followed, even though the pending measure does not specifically require that those procedures be followed. Ordinarily, I would offer an amendment to insert language into the bill requiring that the usual reprogramming procedures should be followed. But, in this instance, it is my understanding that these funds are urgently needed and that it is the wish of the leadership that the House measure, H.R. 3952, be passed without amendment, enabling the legislation to be forwarded to the President for his signature.

I would still offer an amendment, Mr. President, were it not for the fact that the House of Representatives has recessed until February 20. There would be no opportunity for them to take up any Senate amendments to H.R. 3952 until their return.

Therefore, in this instance, which I want to clearly state for the record that it not be considered a precedent, I have received from Secretary Eagleburger his assurances, that I will ask at the close of my remarks be printed in the RECORD, that he will forward a letter to me within 48 hours, in which he will state that the President will not expend these funds for Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia until after he has notified the appropriate congressional committees pursuant to applicable reprogramming provisions.

With those assurances, I have no objection to passage of the legislation under these extenuating circumstances. I shall not ask for a rollcall vote. And, of course, as I have indicated, I will not offer an amendment.

But I shall read into the RECORD, now, the assurances that I received from Mr. Eagleburger.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, DC, February 7, 1990.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is to advise that pursuant to your request, I will forward to you a letter within 48 hours which will state that the $10 million, in H.R. 3952, for Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia will be expended only after the President has notified the congressional committees specified in Section 634(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 in accordance with the procedures applicable to reprogramming under that section.

Sincerely,

LAWRENCE S. EAGLEBURGER,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me indicate to the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the Acting Secretary made the same assurances to me and indicated he would be contacting the distinguished Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. If the distinguished minority leader will yield, I know the distinguished Republican leader has urged the administration, through Mr. Eagleburger, to give these assurances. That is what I was told and I want to express my appreciation to the Republican leader for his understanding of our concerns and for his efforts to help to allay those concerns.

Mr. DOLE. I thank my friend from West Virginia. He is correct. I appreciate the Acting Secretary moving as quickly as he was able to and I am pleased the bill is on the floor.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I rise in support of the provision of the House bill which restores trade benefits for Panama under the Generalized System of Preferences [GSP] and the Caribbean Basin Initiative [CBI]. This morning the Finance Committee reported an original bill containing the identical provision to the House bill with respect to GSP and CBI benefits.

In 1988, under the authority granted to the President by the Narcotics Control Trade Act, President Reagan suspended GSP and CBI treatment for Panama because of its involvement in drug production and trafficking. With the new Endara government in Panama, President Bush has now certified to Congress that Panama is cooperating fully with the United States to control drug production, trafficking, and money laundering.

Under the current law, GSP and CBI benefits cannot be restored to Panama until the end of a 45-day layover period which gives Congress the opportunity to disapprove the President's certification. Because the administration wants to restore Panama's GSP and CBI benefits as soon as possible, it is asking Congress to pass legislation that would make the requirement for the 45-day waiting period unnecessary in this case.

Normally, I would have reservations about the Congress giving up the prerogatives granted to it by law. However, this is obviously an exceptional case. We have a new regime in Panama, one which we expect will be much more cooperative than the last in helping us in the war on drugs. That is why I believe we should act quickly to jumpstart that economy.

My second concern about this matter is that the administration failed to consult with the Finance Committee in the formulation of the legislation. The Narcotics Control Trade Act is part of the 1974 Trade Act and clearly in the jurisdiction of the Finance Committee. Yet I learned of the administration's desire to pass legislation in this area almost by happenstance. I therefore objected to the legislation being taken up unless the Finance Committee had an opportunity to consider the matter.

At the request of the administration, I scheduled a markup in the Finance Committee on this legislation. This morning the committee met and approved an original bill providing for the restoration of GSP and CBI benefits for Panama. The language of the committee bill is identical to the provision in the House bill which restores these trade benefits. Therefore, based on the committee's approval of identical language, I accept the provision of the House bill that is within the Finance Committee's jurisdiction and urge the Senate to support the legislation.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, It has been over 6 weeks since United States forces invaded the country of Panama and ousted the dictator Noriega. At that time, President Bush stated his intention to provide immediate humanitarian assistance to the Panamanian people and to lift the sanctions imposed against the corrupt, drug-running regime of Manuel Noriega. But Panamanian people have yet to receive that emergency assistance and United States sanctions against Panama remain in place.

While I continue to have reservations about the invasion of Panama, I believe that we have a deep responsibility—and that it is in our own fundamental interest—to move as quickly as possible to restore economic vitality and political stability in Panama. The best and fastest way to help the people of Panama rebuild their economy is for the United States to lift, without further delay, our sanctions against Panama.

Last week, I introduced a joint resolution lifting all sanctions against Panama. Today's emergency assistance package to Panama includes virtually all the provisions in that resolution and I hope the Congress will move swiftly to enact this important legislation.

The current legal requirements for the lifting of sanctions by the United States against Panama are complex and have already resulted in unnecessary delays of United States assistance to Panama. Right now there are emergency funds and supplies that could be being used for the Panamanians people but for the existence of the sanctions. Once lifted, the Panamanians will be eligible for benefits under the Overseas Private Investment Corporation, the Generalized System of Preferences, the Caribbean Basin Initiative, and the Commodity Credit Corporation, as well as multilateral loans, food aid, and a sugar quota with the United States. We would also be in a position to provide assistance and training to the newly formed police force in Panama.

Time is precious to people who have lost their jobs and homes and there is no reason for the Panamanian people to wait any longer for the assistance they deserve.

The Endara government has requested emergency economic aid and negotiations to reduce trade barriers. This $40 million down payment on a larger package of assistance is an important first step toward stabilizing the Panamanian economy.

The aid will be used to replace housing for the families who lost their homes during the invasion, to initiate an emergency works program for Panama City and Colon, to assist small businesses affected by the looting, and to provide technical support for agencies of the Panamanian Government, including law enforcement assistance.

For years, the Panamanin banking system has been a haven for money launderers. This bill will help put an end to such abuse of Panama by requiring the President to monitor actions undertaken by the Government of Panama to modify bank secrecy laws in order to facilitate detection and prosecution of criminal activities.

The bill also waives Presidential certification requirements regarding antinarcotics activities in Panama and restores certain forms of foreign assistance and preferential treatment under the Generalized System of Preferences and the Caribbean Basin Recovery Economic Act. These benefits will help Panamanians invest in the long-term recovery of their nation.

Finally, I am pleased that the bill authorizes $10 million to support the process of democratic transition in Eastern Europe countries and Yugoslavia. Our strong support for the process of democracy has always been in the best of America's tradition and this package will help to strengthen the free institutions being developed in those nations.

United States' interests in Panama and Eastern Europe are vast. We should lose no time in moving to restore economic prosperity and political stability to people—to friends—who have suffered so long.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, the pending legislation is an emergency aid package designed to clear away the legislative debris left over from 2 years of U.S. sanctions against the Noreiga regime. It is also intended to be the first effort to assist the Endara government with immediate recovery efforts, including assistance to provide emergency shelter to displaced Panamanians in the Chorrillo neighborhood, and materiel and training to assist in the efforts to replace the Panamanian Defense Force with a Panamanian police force under civilian control.

Specifically, the $42 million of economic assistance includes the following: $22.5 million in shelter related assistance, including $10 million in AID housing guarantees; $7 million in emergency employment/public works assistance to deal with the more than 25 percent unemployment rate; $5.5 million in technical assistance designed to assist the Endara government in establishing a fiscal management program; $5 million for small business rehabilitation; and $2 million to assist in the strengthening of administration of justice, including training of the new police force by civilian law enforcement experts.

In addition, the legislation provides:

Authority to the administration to reallocate United States military assistance and credits obligated to Panama in earlier fiscal years (estimated at $10 million) but never expended, to be used to purchase uniforms and radios for the new police force. However, this same provision places a ceiling on the amount of lethal assistance which may be provided to the new force at $500,000.

Waives the Brooke-Alexander prohibition contained in the Foreign Assistance Act which prohibits assistance to countries who are in arrears in their debt obligations to the United States.

Provides deobligation/reobligation authority to AID to transfer unused funds from one region to another.

Deems as met provisions of the antinarcotics certifications required with respect to economic assistance and for purposes of trade preferences conferred under the generalized system of preferences and CBI.

Mandates a report on Panamanian bank secrecy laws no later than April 15 by the President to inform the Congress on steps being taken by the Endara government to prevent Panama from being used as a center for money laundering and other illicit financial activities.

Concerns which remain:

That the PDF not be recreated under another name.

That bank secrecy laws which acted as a magnet for illegal financial transactions, including narcotics-related moneys, not remain unaltered.

That the civilian bureaucracy receive the same kind of scrutiny that the military side is receiving to remove corrupt elements there.

That Panamanians begin quickly to reinvest in their own economy—bringing back the billions of dollars which fled Panama during the crisis.

Finally, this package is only a very small part of what the Bush administration has announced it intends to do for Panama. The administration has spoken of a second $1 billion package. Mr. President, I would urge the executive branch to move forward quickly to transmit that request to the Congress.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise today to support strongly the aid package to Panama. After achieving complete success in obtaining the initial four objectives of the United States operation in Panama, it is now essential for the United States to assist the people of Panama in every reasonable way to establish the democratic society to which they are so strongly and enthusiastically committed.

The tasks that lie ahead are challenging, and the United States must remain steadfast in its commitment to assist the Panamanian people with establishing the democratic institutions and open society that they deeply desire and richly deserve. I am confident that the Panamanian people will work diligently and tirelessly to establish democracy in their country and restore their economy to a prosperous state.

It is incumbent on the United States to provide immediate as well as sustained, long-term assistance to Panama. This aid package will do just that. It will provide immediate humanitarian assistance, trade and export credits and loans, restoration of the sugar quota, as well as technical assistance to the Panamanian banking sector. The package will also provide support to Panama to assist that country in drawing down the arrearage it owes to several international financial institutions.

This Senator is committed to the long run in supporting the people of Panama to achieve their democratic aspirations. We in this country have that responsibility and obligation, and I am pleased to support this measure.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the legislation now before the Senate will provide emergency humanitarian assistance to Panama. This assistance is made necesesary by the years of tyranny to which the people of Panama were subjected under the Noriega and Torrijos regimes.

Make no mistake about it, the American liberation of Panama was a tremendous victory for the people of Panama and for the forces of freedom and security throughout this hemisphere.

President Bush acted prudently, decisively, and fully within his rights under international and United States law to ensure the safety of American citizens and to rid the Panamanian people of an oppressive and diabolical dictator.

Despite the clear success of the United States liberation action, our thoughts and prayers are with the families of those brave American soldiers who lost their lives in Panama. Loss of life is always painful and regrettable.

But I hope that the families of those brave young men find some consolation in the fact that their boys were serving our Nation with courage, dignity, and commitment.

Mr. President, as I noted previously, this legislation is intended to provide urgent humanitarian aid to the Panamanian people. Specifically, this legislation will provide $42 million for housing, public works, small business rehabilitation, and technical assistance.

In addition, in light of the commitment of the Endara government to assist United States efforts to combat drug trafficking, the legislation revokes the Presidential certification that Panama was not fully cooperating with United States drug interdiction efforts.

Also included in the legislation is the transfer of $10 million from the Poland-Hungary aid package enacted last year to provide assistance for the free elections scheduled to take place in other Eastern European countries later this spring.

Mr. President, this legislation also includes two provisions added at the committee level at my request to emphasize our concern about Panama's previous role in money laundering and to assure that the election aid provided to Eastern Europe is used only for bona fide free elections and is distributed so as to benefit a range of political parties.

As my colleagues are no doubt well aware, Panama's bank secrecy laws were used during the Noriega years to facilitate the laundering of drug money and other illegal financial transactions. The Endara government is to be commended for freezing those bank accounts believed to be implicated in narcotics-related and other illegal transactions.

However, regardless of the best intentions of the Endara government, the bank secrecy laws on the books in Panama may still lend themselves to criminal abuse.

In order to express our concern that bank secrecy laws be revised to prevent money laundering of drug monies, I was pleased to work with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] in developing section 104 of this bill.

Specifically, this section officially commends the Endara government for its efforts thus far to combat money laundering in Panama. In addition, it includes the requirement that a report be submitted by President Bush no later than April 15 of this year detailing the actions being undertaken by the Panamanian Government to modify existing bank secrecy laws in order to facilitate detection and prosecution of criminal activities.

I was pleased to work with the chairman of our committee, Mr. PELL, on the second provision added at my request which addresses the $10 million in the bill for aid to Eastern European democracy. The provision clarifies that the election aid be provided only to those countries in Eastern Europe which have had, or are scheduled to have free multiparty elections, and that the aid be used to support a wide range of political parties.

Mr. President, the proper role of foreign aid—if there is one—is to provide emergency humanitarian assistance. The proposal before our Senate would do just that.

The major media has been quick to conclude that the United States is obligated to assist the Panamanian people because of the damage done by the United States military action. But then again, the major media can always be counted upon to blame America first.

But the fact is, blame for the predicament faced by the Panamanian people should be laid where it belongs—on the doorstep of the Torrijos and Noreiga regimes.

President Bush simply had no other option but to send forces into Panama. Noriega declared himself in a state of war with the United States. American lives and security interests were clearly at stake.

This liberation brings to a close a shameful 12-year period of United States history when our Government became willing partners of a corrupt regime in Panama. When the treaties were being debated in 1978, it was already apparent that the Panama Government was in the hands of drug traffickers.

Omar Torrijos was the classic tinhorn dictator at the time, and his righthand man was none other than Manuel Noriega. It was well-known that Noriega ran the drug operations for Torrijos and his brothers.

I discussed this on the Senate floor, calling both of them by name—both in public session and in more detail in a closed secret session which I asked for. Unfortunately, our Government chose not to listen until it was much too late.

Militarily, the operation was executed with precision. We owe a debt of gratitude to the men and women of our Armed Forces. It was moved by the countless television images of Panamanian citizens embracing our soldiers.

In fact, there is a petition circulating now in Panama asking President Bush to keep American troops there. According to a recent poll 92 percent of the Panamanian people support the United States action.

Finally, Mr. President, when all is said and done, the liberation of Panama and the historic transition to democracy is a tribute to our former Ambassador, Arthur Davis. These changes could not have come about without Ambassador Davis' skill in handling the Panama crisis over the last few years. He maintained a close relationship with the leaders of the democratic opposition; and his ability to keep them together in the dark hours when there seemed to be no hope made him a central figure for democratic change.

He was, in fact, regarded as a hero by the people of Panama. Both Ambassador Davis, and his predecessor Ambassador Ted Briggs, had the knowledge and foresight—when the bureaucrats in Washington were praising Noriega—to uphold the finest ideals of freedom.

When others were making excuses, and giving supposed pragmatic reasons to support a gangster, these dedicated Ambassadors were quietly working within the system to expose the real Noriega regime. Their work exemplifies the most professional traditions of our diplomacy.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join in supporting this bill. It will have overwhelming, bipartisan support—as it should.

A new dawn has emerged in Panama. Operation Just Cause has toppled Noreiga, and led to the establishment of a government supported by the Panamanian people—committed to democracy—and determined to throw out the drug cartel's puppet politicians and secret bank accounts.

We have an obligation to help the healing and building process in Panama.

Our policy of sanctions against Noreiga was the right one—but it did bring devastation to the Panamanian economy. Operation Just Cause was the right move—but the resulting fighting and unrest did cause widespread physical damage and dislocation.

Of course, we also have an enormous stake in Panama. It anchors the southern end of Central America—where the stuggle for democracy goes forward.

It is home for the Panama Canal—which remains an enormously important strategic waterway.

And Panama hosts thousands of Americans—soldiers and civilians—whose welfare and safety are always uppermost in our minds.

This is a modest package—a good beginning. It lifts the sanctions, and provides some immediately needed humanitarian assistance, to the tune of $32 million. It will provide some assistance and training to insure that Panamanian forces can insure security.

Panama is back on the right track—this package will help keep it there.

We will need to do more—but, again, this is the right first step.

I commend the Foreign Relations Committee—Chairman PELL, ranking member HELMS, and the membership; and the Finance Committee—Chairman BENTSEN, ranking member PACKWOOD and the membership. They worked quickly, effectively, and in a bipartisan way.

I commend the administration, too, for moving forward on this expeditiously, and working with the leadership and the relevant committees on the bill.

Most of all, I offer congratulations to the people of Panama. They have their future back again, and I am pleased and proud that the United States is going to help them make it a good future.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, title II of this legislation provides assistance to support transition to democracy in Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia. I feel strongly that we must make sure that these funds are used effectively by political parties to fight for freedom behind the Iron Curtain. Fighting for freedom in Communist countries is not an easy task given the power of the Communist Party, the secret police, and—in Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary—the presence of tens of thousands of Soviet military occupation forces.

The managers of the bill have agreed on two limitations on these funds which can help the democratic processes develop in Communist countries.

First, the President must certify that the country where funds are being expended has had, or is scheduled to have, open and free multiparty elections at the national level or at the regional level.

Second, these funds must benefit substantially a full range of non-Communist political parties in the countries where such funds are used.

If we are going to assist non-Communist political parties by providing funds for such basics as telephones, fax machines, copying machines, printing equipment, and personal computers then these funds should be given on an even handed basis.

It appears that extensive U.S. assistance has been granted to political organizations, including the Solidarity labor union, which are on the political left but that political parties which are on the right of the spectrum have been cut out or neglected.

The phrase "full range of non-Communist political parties" means from the liberal to the conservative in the political spectrum such as the Republicans and Democrats in the United States or the Conservatives and Labor in the United Kingdom or the Christian Democrats/Christian Social Union and Social Democrats in West Germany.

Specifically excluded are parties with Communist—that is, Marxist-Leninist—ideologies and programs and parties with Nazi ideologies and programs.

Parties which are on the liberal or left side of the spectrum are more well known than the conservative parties in Eastern Europe. For reference, examples of conservative parties in Eastern Europe include: the Confederacy of Independent Poland [KPN]; the Christian Democrats and Christian Social Union in Czechoslovakia; the Independent Smallholders Party and FIDESZ in Hungary; and the Peasants Party in Romania. In my view parties such as these clearly fall under the definition of "full range of non-Communist political parties."

The phrase "benefit substantially" means that U.S. assistance would be apportioned equitably between liberal parties and conservative parties. Obviously, there must be balance. Liberal Senators would not want these funds slanted in favor of conservative parties and conservative Senators would not want these funds slanted in favor of liberal parties. Assistance must be extended in a balanced manner to all parties which are qualified so that the full range of the non-Communist political spectrum is assisted in an equitable and balanced manner.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I agree with my distinguished colleague that the assistance provided in title II must benefit substantially a full range of non-Communist political parties by apportioning the assistance in an equitable manner.

I thank the Senator. I yield back any time I have.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

BILL INDEFINITELY POSTPONED—S. 2073

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar No. 441, S. 2073, the Senate companion bill, be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

PROVIDING URGENT ASSISTANCE TO DEMOCRACY IN PANAMA

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I understand there are only about 3 minutes left on this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Three minutes fifty seconds.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of the bill before us, which will help Panama begin the process of rebuilding its shattered economy. But, while providing assistance to Panama in its time of need is important, I believe the assistance which is contained in this bill for Eastern Europe is equally as important.

As part of the new SEED II bill, authored by Senator PELL and the other Democrats on the Foreign Relations Committee, I have proposed that $10 million be immediately reprogrammed to assist the six Eastern European nations—as a appropriate—organize multiparty elections. Two of these nations, East Germany and Hungary, have scheduled their races for as early as March.

In my judgment, Mr. President, there are few higher priorities for American foreign policy than helping those countries that have lived under the iron fist of totalitarianism. By helping East European nations develop truly democratic institutions, we are helping to ensure that the Iron Curtain shall never fall again across Eastern Europe.

It would be folly indeed for Americans to sit on the sidelines as mere spectators, cheering democracies in Eastern Europe. Instead, Mr. President, we must do all we can to facilitate their transition to democracy.

Although I am hopeful that the SEED II bill can be acted upon quickly, I felt it important to attach my proposal on election assistance to the legislation now before us, because the need, as it is with Panama, is so urgent.

As drafted, we will be providing the President the authority to use $10 million from existing foreign aid money to help these emerging democracies, primarily through the National Endowment for Democracy. It is our hope that this money will be immediately available to those citizens' groups, opposition party and media organizations that desperately need basic equipment such as typewriters, computers, fax machines and telephones to conduct their elections.

However, this $10 million should be considered only a down payment. I believe we must not only help in the election process, but we must also provide sustained support for Eastern Europe's transition to democracy over the next several years to help those countries develop effective legislative and judicial systems. That is why I am hopeful that we can work with the administration to cover other countries and provide greater long-term assistance.

We created organizations like the National Endowment for Democracy precisely for this moment in history. I have met with several of the leaders of the opposition in Hungary and Czechoslovakia, and I can assure my colleagues that there is a need for such assistance. When I asked the Czech delegation which recently visited Washington what can we do most to help now, their immediate response was "Help us down the path of democracy by providing resources to organize our election".

It seems to me that it is our duty not to fail these countries now. We must give them our help and the benefit of over 200 years of American experience with democracy and its institutions. It would be a tragedy if we let this critical moment pass without doing all we can; $10 million is a very small price relative to the outcome.

I thank the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee for his leadership on this and many other issues that face this Nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

The question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill (H.R. 3952) was passed.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the motion to lay on the table is agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATE VISITS AND MEETINGS WITH FOREIGN LEADERS DURING RECENT RECESS

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, during my years in the Senate, I have made it a practice to spend much of the time while the Senate is in recess traveling through Pennsylvania. I hold open house/town meetings, visit schools, and take the opportunity to listen to the views of my constituents on State needs and problems, particularly those that can be addressed through Senate action. I have visited all 67 counties of my State many times. This is invaluable to my staying in close touch with the wide spectrum of interests that I represent.

This past recess was no exception. After the Senate went into recess on Wednesday, November 22, I went home to Philadelphia. Over the next several weeks I visited, in chronological order, Pittsburgh, Butler, New Castle, Mercer, Franklin, Oil City, Erie, Pottsville, Bloomsburg, Sunbury, Lewistown, Harrisburg, Scranton, Allentown, Bethlehem, Media, Coatesville, and Lancaster.

As a U.S. Senator, I represent national interests as well. As a member of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence and the Foreign Operations Subcommittee on Appropriations, it is my responsibility to address national security, foreign aid and other international issues including terrorism, drug trafficking, nuclear, chemical and conventional weapons proliferation, U.S. hostages, and the volatile situation in the Middle East.

To address some of these concerns, in January 1990 I spent 18 days in discussions with leaders in the Soviet Union, India, Pakistan, and the Middle East. This statement reports some of the highlights of those meetings. I have already had an opportunity to discuss this trip with President Bush, Secretary of State Baker, Chief of Staff Sununu, National Security Adviser Scowcroft and many of my Senate colleagues.

For most of the trip, I was accompanied by my distinguished colleague from Alabama, Senator RICHARD SHELBY, who serves on the Senate Armed Services Committee. The fact that we represent different regions of the Nation and different political parties lent strength to our common concerns on many national security issues, as we expressed them to foreign leaders.

In the Soviet Union, we explored improved bilateral cooperation on terrorism and international drug trafficking. We met with Customs and law enforcement officials, including the new Soviet Minister of Internal Affairs Vadim Viktorovitch Bakatin. Mr. Bakatin was selected by President Gorbachev, and his attitude certainly reflects a new, refreshing style among Soviet officials. He appeared to have little faith in bureaucracy and expressed the view that the effectiveness of law enforcement could not be measured by statistics, but only by the level of acceptance and cooperation that the population accorded its police. Minister Bakatin responded favorably to my suggestion of the need for an International Criminal Court to try terrorists and drug traffickers, saying "the idea is quite necessary and will be realized sooner or later." I will continue to press this concept in both bilateral and multilateral meetings.

Regarding the broader situation in the Soviet Union, there is much uncertainty. Glasnost appears to be in full flower, but perestroika lags seriously behind. There is great uncertainty about the fate of the Baltic States and other Soviet Republics, the future of the Soviet economy, the outcome of ethnic strife between the Armenians and Azerbaijanis and the very survival of President Gorbachev. There are few answers, and the whole world is watching closely as events unfold. Ambassador Jack Matlock briefed us in detail on United States-Soviet affairs and introduced us to a number of Soviets with whom we had interesting and productive discussions.

From the Soviet Union, we traveled to Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, where we met with the Saudi Defense and Foreign Ministers and pursued the predominant theme of our trip, which was Mideast regional security and the peace process. We noted and welcomed a more aggressive Saudi role as a moderating force in the region, as witnessed by their recent hosting of the Taif conference to promote a peaceful settlement in Lebanon.

We registered our concern with Saudi officials about their purchase of CS-2 missiles from China. While it is clear that the CS-2's were purchased to counter the perceived missile threat from Iran, it is notable that they also pose a potential threat to Israel. We had a lively discussion with Prince Turki, the Director of North American Affairs for the Saudi Foreign Ministry, who expresed deep concern about Israel's purported nuclear capabilities, and in his view, Israel's unwillingness to submit to inspections. I told Prince Turki that I would raise his concern with Prime Minister Shamir and I have done so. Prime Minister Shamir responded that he had proposed regional inspections many years ago in the United Nations and was interested in discussing arms control with inspections to guarantee compliance.

Our visits to India and Pakistan largely concerned nuclear proliferation issues and the war in Afghanistan. We raised our concerns about proliferations with the new political leadership in India, including the new Prime Minister V.P. Singh and key members of his Cabinet. India, of course, exploded a "peaceful" nuclear device in 1974, and this event continues to create concern in the region. India has numerous border disputes with Pakistan and China, and Indian officials point out that China has a nuclear capability and Pakistan may well be on the verge of having one. The good news to be reported is that India and Pakistan have concluded a "no attack" treaty—both sides have agreed not to attack each other's nuclear facilities.

Regarding free trade, we raised strong concerns about India's alleged pirating of drugs and other products without abiding by United States patent and copyright restrictions. These practices have resulted in loss of income to major drug companies, several of which are headquartered in Pennsylvania. These drug companies spent millions of dollars on research and development and now find that their products are being copied abroad through "reverse engineering" and other means. My sense is that much United States pressure, like the exhortations from Senator SHELBY and myself, must be brought to bear before United States property rights will be adequately respected in nations like India.

In Pakistan, we met with Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto, a dynamic and capable young leader. We had visited Ms. Bhutto 2 years earlier in Karachi and she reciprocated by visiting us in the Senate before her election, so our conversations covered a wide range of matters which we had discussed before. After our discussions with the President of Pakistan, Ghulam Ishaq Khan, and Prime Minister Bhutto, I was more convinced than ever of the importance of maintaining our extensive foreign aid to Pakistan. Pakistan has enormous problems and has been a very important ally in that region.

In talks with Pakistan civilian and military officials we stressed United States concerns about nuclear proliferation and the need to stand by the Afghan freedom fighters. Pakistani leaders suggested that the Soviet defeat and troop withdrawal in Afghanistan gave the initial impetus to glasnost and perestroika and the resulting changes in the U.S.S.R. We observed that despite the Soviet troop withdrawal from Afghanistan their enormous logistics support has stalemated the valiant efforts of the mujahideen. The United States should continue to negotiate with the Soviet Union to stop the influx of armaments into Afghanistan from foreign sources and to set the stage for elections to establish self determination there.

Ours was the first congressional delegation in several years to meet with President Saddam Hussein of Iraq. He is an imposing figure who exudes strength and confidence, which would be expected from a leader whose nation has recently emerged with the upper hand from an 8-year war with Iran.

Our discussions were cordial and candid. When I suggested his participation in regional security and peace talks with Israel, President Saddam Hussein responded that he needed to first concentrate on peace between Iraq and Iran, but he did not rule out Iraqi participation in regional meetings.

President Saddam Hussein expressed concern and annoyance that the United States specifically limits the number of Soviet Jewish immigrants in order to force them to go to Israel. I told him politely but firmly that he was misinformed—that the United States placed limits on immigrants from all nations. I added that as the son of Russian Jews, I had, in part, successfully opposed such restrictions in the Senate.

As this was my first meeting with President Sadam Hussein, we did not cover every sensitive issue. However, a substantive dialog was opened. Given his misapprehension regarding United States immigration policy, there is an obvious need for more contracts by the United States with Iraqi officials. I hope to meet with him again, and I urge my Senate colleagues to do the same.

In Damascus, I found President Assad of Syria cordial, thoughtful, and firm in his convictions on where he wished to lead his country. He showed pragmatism in his position that a Mideast peace conference could be convened by the United States and the Soviet Union rather than by all five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council. When I informed Prime Minister Shamir of President Assad's willingness to attend an international conference convened only by the United States and the U.S.S.R., Mr. Shamir noted the change in position, appeared interested, and noted that some time back he had personally favored such an international conference.

I have had three lengthy meetings with President Assad—in 1988, 1989, and again this year. In more than 10 hours of talks, many subjects have been discussed, including terrorism, Lebanon, United States hostages, and the plight of Syrian Jews. Following my latest meeting with President Assad, I visited Rabbi Abraham Hamrah at the Ifrange synagogue in Damascus and spoke with Jewish schoolchildren.

In Cairo, after a visit to the tomb of former President Anwar Sadat, we met with President Hosni Mubarak. President Mubarak is forceful and direct in his advocacy of the Mideast peace process. Largely through his efforts, Egypt has been brought back into the Arab League, where hopefully it will be able to exert its pragmatic diplomacy on Iraq, Syria, and the other nations critical to regional security. Egypt, of course, already has made peace with Israel; the Camp David accords were a first critical step, and now the process should go foward. I urged President Mubarak to meet with Prime Minister Shamir, but President Mubarak said that such a meeting should be delayed until positive results would assuredly come from the meeting.

When I arrived in Israel on January 17, I was immediately confronted with a report that my distinguished colleague Senator BOB DOLE had called on Congress to support an amended foreign aid strategy, one of whose major components would be a cut of 5 percent in aid to Israel, Egypt, and three other countries in order to increase aid to Eastern Europe. In response to United States and Israeli news media inquiries, I publicly stated my opposition to Senator DOLE's proposal, opposition which I later restated in a speech to the Senate. This is not the time, in the midst of delicate regional negotiations being encouraged by Secretary of State Baker, to withdraw support from our allies. It is the wrong signal to send, especially to Israel, which faces enormous additional costs as a result of a continuing emigration from the Soviet Union.

We paid our third visit to Elias Freij, mayor of Bethlehem on the West Bank. As we all are aware, the Palestinian intifada continues in the West Bank and Gaza. In my view, exclusive and excessive attention to this situation has kept Mideast leaders from addressing broader issues of regional security and peace with Israel. This is the core of the message that I brought to Presidents Assad and Saddam Hussein, and to the Saudis. I believe that if Syria, Iraq, Jordan, and Saudi Arabia could be persuaded to join Egypt in negotiations with Israel to discuss regional stability and peace, the issues of the Palestinians and the intifada would then fall into place.

Regarding negotiation on the future of the West Bank and Gaza, the composition of the Palestinian delegation remains an issue. I, for one, remain unconvinced of the sincerity of Yassir Arafat and the PLO. Public statements by PLO leaders continue to claim that their peace offensive is merely a tactical ploy to cover their long-term plan for the "liberation of the Palestinian homeland." Also, I see increasing evidence of PLO activation of terrorist gangs attempting to infiltrate Israel, encouragement of violence in the West Bank and Gaza, and a persistent campaign of intimidation against Palestinians who are suspected of being less than ethusiastic about the PLO.

I am actively studying the possibility of a revised proposal for an international conference to be convened by the United States and the Soviet Union in light of President Assad's shift in willingness to accept that format and possible interest by Prime Minister Shamir.

As noted earlier, I discussed my trip with President Bush and other senior administration officials upon returning to the United States. Without speaking for the President, I believe he was genuinely interested in my finding and is determined to pursue the Mideast peace process.

Returning to the United States through Ramstein Air Base in the Federal Republic of Germany, I met with senior military personnel responsible for electricity and heat generation at the air base and at the nearby Army facilities in and around Kaiserslautern. I encouraged their use of anthracite coal from northeastern Pennsylvania and bituminous coal from southwestern Pennsylvania in their future energy planning. I described the important role that coal plays in U.S. national security planning, and our need to be free of dependence on foreign oil, particularly from the volatile Mideast.

Mr. President, world events are moving at an unprecedented pace. Despite the difficulties, there are numerous opportunities to promote democracy and peace, and the members of the Senate must be prepared to lend their informed advice and assistance to the administration in the formulation and execution of our foreign policies.

From our meetings with Soviet officials, I believe that there is an opportunity for agreement and greater cooperation on combating international drug dealing and terrorists. Our friendship with Pakistan and India can be of assistance in promoting a better relationship between those two important nations on border disputes and in dispelling the threat of nuclear confrontation in that region.

While these visits are very instructive in helping to decide on the allocation of substantial United States foreign aid and other complex international issues, the visits to Syria and Iraq were especially useful on the value of greater contacts between members of the Unites States Senate and House and Syrian and Iraqi officials. It is important to strengthen bilateral relations between the United States and Syria and the United States and Iraq. The results of our meetings in Syria and Iraq were so useful that I will extend my comments on our trip to those countries in separate floor statements.

PLO TERRORIST ACTS AGAINST ISRAEL

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I had intended to attach a report on PLO terrorism against Isarel compiled by the Prime Minister's Bureau of the State of Israel to my trip report which I have just presented to my colleagues in the Senate, but I now consider it preferable to append that report on PLO terrorism to this supplemental floor statement in light of the attack on an Israeli tour bus in Egypt on February 4, resulting in the killing of 8—later raised to 9—Israelis and the wounding of 17 others.

In my trip last month to the Mideast, I discussed the Palestinian issue with many Mideast leaders including President Mubarak of Egypt, President Assad of Syria, President Saddam Hussein of Iraq, Mayor Elias Freij of Bethlehem and Israeli officials including Prime Minister Shamir, Deputy Prime Minister Peres, Minister Ariel Sharon and Minister Yitshak Moda'i. President Mubarak articulated the generally held Arab view that the PLO constitutes the appropriate representative of the Palestinians. Prime Minister Shamir emphatically insisted that the PLO could not represent the Palestinians in discussions with Israel because of the PLO's record of terrorism and public statements by PLO leaders that their peace offensive is only a tactical ploy in their effort to destroy Israel.

I personally continue to have grave doubts about the PLO because of the involvement of Yasser Arafat and the PLO in the murder of the U.S. Ambassador and the Charge' d'Affaires in the Sudan in 1974 and their involvement in the hijacking of the Achille Lauro and the murder of Mr. Leon Klinghoffer in 1985. Ultimately, the question of the composition of the Palestinian delegation is something that must be worked out by the negotiating parties. It may be that the laborious efforts of Secretary of State Baker, President Mubarak, and Prime Minister Shamir will lead to an agreement on the composition of the Palestinian delegation acceptable to all sides.

In my discussion with Israeli officials, I asked about their view of the PLO record on terrorism in terms of PLO deeds and PLO statements in the period since Yasser Arafat made his pronouncement in Geneva in December 1988. Shortly after Arafat made that renunciation of terrorism he threatened to kill Mayor Freij of Bethlehem, who had suggested an end to the bloodshed in the West Bank and Gaza. Soon after Mayor Freij, a christian Arab, proposed a truce, Arafat was heard to say: "Whoever thinks of stopping the Intifada before it achieves its goals, I will give him 10 bullets in the chest." Mayor Freij then withdrew his proposal. On January 14, 1989, I met with Mayor Freij in his office in Bethlehem. We discussed the threat and his withdrawal of his truce proposal. From my discussion with Mayor Freij, there was no doubt in my mind that Arafat's threat caused Mayor Freij's change of position. Notwithstanding the fact that this statement by Yasser Arafat had been tape recorded and was conclusively established to be Arafat's voice, Yasser Arafat denied making the statement.

In response to my request to Israeli officials on the PLO activities and statements since December 1988, the Israeli Prime Minister's Bureau made available to me a lengthy 29-page report on their conclusion on PLO terror in the period from December 15, 1988, to December 15, 1989. I believe this report to be of sufficient importance to be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that it be so included at the conclusion of this statement.

While I obviously cannot attest to the accuracy of the incidents set forth in this report, it does state the position of the Israeli Prime Minister's Bureau and expresses the Israeli state of mind on this subject.

There is, however, no doubt on the accuracy of the report on the February 4, attack on the Israeli bus and the murder of 9 Israelis and the wounding of 17 others. I ask unanimous consent that the news account in the New York Times of February 5, 1988, be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the end of the statement. While the initial report in the New York Times does not conclusively establish who was responsible for the terrorist attack, it is important to note the immediate comment of Minister Ariel Sharon who is quoted as saying, "I believe these are PLO terrorists. I cannot believe for a moment, though it has happened in the past, that it could be Egyptians." A New York Times article on February 7, 1990, reported Egyptian authorities stating that the men suspected of being the terrorists were Palestinians. I ask unanimous consent that the February 7, Times article be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the conclusion of this statement, along with the news accounts of the February 4, attack, and also the report from the Prime Minister's Bureau, because I believe they should be considered in evaluating the Israeli position about PLO participation in the Palestinian delegation.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 5, 1990]

8 KILLED AND 17 WOUNDED IN RAID ON BUS OF ISRAELI TOURISTS IN EGYPT

(By Alan Cowell)

CAIRO, February 4.—Assailants armed with rifles and grenades attacked a tour bus carrying a group of Israeli academics and their wives on a main highway east of Cairo today, killing 8 Israelis and wounding 17 others, Israeli and Egyptian officials said.

The attack was among the worst on Israelis in Egypt since the two countries signed a peace treaty in 1979, and Western diplomats said it would bring new uncertainty to the latest United States Middle East peace diplomacy.

[In Washington, the State Department called the attack a "horrible act of terrorism" and said it was "an obvious attempt by the enemies of peace to halt efforts at reconciliation and dialogue," Reuters reported.]

FUNDAMENTALISTS' RALLYING CRY

A man claiming to represent a previously unheard-of Egyptian group calling itself the Organization for the Defense of the Oppressed of Egypt's Prisons called an international news agency here to take responsibility for the attack, but there was no immediate way to verify the claim.

The caller, speaking Arabic with an Egyptian accent, said the attack had been carried out to protest torture in Egyptian prisons. Reporters who heard the call quoted him as saying, "God is great," the rallying cry of Islamic fundamentalists. Western and Israeli officials said they had no direct knowledge of who was responsible.

Israeli officials said an Israeli military airplane would evacuate some of the wounded, who were initially taken to a hospital in the Cairo suburb of Heliopolis.

At the scene of the attack, 30 miles east of Cairo and close to 10th of Ramadan City—one of a string of new towns built to ease congestion in the capital—the bus could be seen toppled onto its side, with its windows smashed. The police did not permit reporters to examine the bus, which was operated by an Egyptian company.

Israeli officials said the bus, carrying 31 academics from Israeli universities and scholarly institutions and their family members, had been on its way from Rafah on Egypt's border with the Israeli-occupied Gaza Strip to Cairo via the Suez Canal port city of Ismailia.

The officials said it was normal practice for buses carrying Israelis to be escorted by the Egyptian police as far as Ismailia. But from there it proceeded alone.

Israeli officials said a car swerved in front of the bus and masked attackers opened fire with assault rifles, possibly causing the bus to fall onto its side as the driver swerved. Then the attackers lobbed hand grenades into the wreckage and sped off, the officials said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The Egyptian Interior Ministry said two men speaking Arabic with a non-Egyptian accent launched the attack from a white Peugeot sedan. After forcing the bus to halt, they opened fire on the passengers with automatic weapons and threw four grenades two of which exploded. Then, they fled, the ministry's statement said.

ATTACK "SERIOUS AND SHOCKING"

The Israeli Prime Minister, Yitzhak Shamir, told Israeli television that the attack was "serious and shocking."

"This attack proves that hatred for Israel still exists and is running wild in the area," Mr. Shamir said. "I hope the Egyptian authorities will take all measures to find the attackers and punish them."

Hundreds of thousands of Israelis have visited Egypt since the 1979 peace treaty—the only one between Israel and an Arab country—and their presence has become routine.

In 1985, however, a crazed Egyptian soldier opened fire on Israeli tourists at the resort of Ras Burka on the Sinai peninsula killing seven. An Israeli official said that while the 1985 attack seemed to have been undertaken by "a soldier who was mad at the time," today's killing was apparently a planned and premeditated attack.

From 1984 to 1986, anti-Government Egyptians armed with automatic weapons carried out a series of attacks on Israeli diplomats, killing two and wounding others. Those on trial on charges related to those attacks include Khaled Abdel Nasser, son of the late President Gamal Abdel Nasser.

In Israel, Trade and Industry Minister Ariel Sharon, who is strongly opposed to Prime Minister Shamir's approach to American peace diplomacy, blamed the Palestine Liberation Organization for today's attack.

"I believe these are P.L.O. terrorists," he said. "I cannot believe for a moment though it has happened in the past, that it could be Egyptians."

Mr. Sharon opposes efforts by the United States to bring the Egyptian and Israeli Foreign Ministers together with Secretary of State James A. Baker 3d for talks to arrange direct negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians on the future of the Israeli-occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Egyptian officials told newspapers here before today's killings that the talks could take place within days in Geneva. After the attack, however, it is unclear whether any Israeli official will feel politically able to discuss the possibility of a direct encounter with Palestinians as long as the identity of the assailants remains unclear.

"Who knows?" said an Israeli official. "It could be Egypt's Revolution, fundamentalists. All these groups are trying to hurt us." The official was referring to dissident Egyptian movements opposed to the policies of President Hosni Mubarak and his slain predecessor, Anwar Sadat, who signed the peace treaty with Israel in 1979.

ATTACK ON ISRAELIS UPSETS PALESTINIANS IN EGYPT

(By Alan Cowell)

CAIRO, February 6.—The Egyptian authorities said today that the men they suspected of killing nine Israelis in a rifle and grenade attack on a tour bus near here on Sunday were Palestinians. That has come as no comfort to a dwindling minority of 40,000 Palestinians whose roots here, once firm, have weakened with time.

"Many Palestinians who used to look at Egypt as the refuge feel some resentment at the loss of Egypt as that major haven of support," a senior Palestinian said. He said he feared that the Egyptian dragnet for the killers might draw in innocent people.

The police say the hunt for those who killed the Israelis, who were slain on a main desert highway east of Cairo, has narrowed to a Palestinian who used a Jordanian passport to hire the car used by the assailants. Along with the 9 who died, 17 Israelis were wounded in the attack. A faction of the Islamic Holy War terrorist group in Lebanon took responsibility for the raid.

PASSPORT IS DISCOVERED

The passport was discovered in an apartment close to where the abandoned car was found, in a village just north of Cairo. The photograph in the passport has been circulated to the police, who have been ordered to check hotels, car-rental companies and apartment agencies. The driver of the bus was also a Palestinian, police officials said, and he has been detained for questioning about whether he cooperated with the assailants. A second attacker is being sought.

The use of a Jordanian passport is seen by Western diplomats as significant. With Egypt, Iraq and Yemen, Jordan is a member of the Arab Cooperation Council, whose nationals are not required to have visas to enter the four countries. More then half of Jordan's population is of Palestinian origin.

On Monday, when the Shiite fundamentalist group in Lebanon took responsibility for the attack, it used a Syrian radio station often associated with a Palestinian extremist movement, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, General Command.

[In Jerusalem, the authorities identified the dead as Eugenia Weisbard, 72 years old, of Tel Aviv; Zeev Shiftan, 70, of Jerusalem; Zvia Schumert, 67, of Jerusalem; Aya Meiri, 66, of Tel Aviv; Issachar Binyamini, 72, of Tel Aviv; Ruhama Berliner, 48, of Mevasseret Zion; Eli MIron, 39 of Bat Yam; Leah Berditchev, 57, of Moshav Ein Vered, and Shmuel Horowitz, 57, of Har Adar.]

For some of the Palestinians who live in Egypt and seek to avoid confrontation with the Government, the attack and the identification of Palestinians as the assailants is a burden.

"We do not want to be singled out, either as a community or as individuals, as terrorists," said a Palestinian businessman who asked not to be identified. "We don't want ordinary Egyptians to come to regard us as people who have brought bloodshed to their land."

P.L.O. DENOUNCES ATTACK

The Palestine Liberation Organization representatives, Sayed Kamal, denounced the assault, and reaffirmed P.L.O. policies prohibiting armed actions outside Israel and the occupied territories. But unease among other Palestinians reflects a sense that their position in Egypt has been eroded by economic pressures, as it has in other Middle Eastern countries.

The contrast is particularly striking in Cairo. Under Nasser, the first wave of Palestinian refugees after the creation of Israel had special status. Many of the leaders of the P.L.C., including Yasir Arafat, the chairman, were educated here and began their political careers as students. Moreover, said Dr. Nabil Shaath, a prominent Palestinian, in an interview before the assault, Nasser gave Palestinians the same work, property and rights as Egyptians.

"The community probably never exceeded 100,000, but its quality has deteriorated in terms of education," he said. At one time, 40,000 of the 100,000 Palestinians were in Egyptian universities. Now, he said, "the majority are very poor and because they are uneducated have little mobility."

HARD TIMES UNDER SADAT

"Many feel this is part of a much broader Egyptian problem, that Egypt is not in an economic condition that allows largess." said Dr. Shaath, a businessman and a member of the Palestine National Council, which the P.L.O. calls a parliament in exile.

Under Anwar el-Sadat in late 1970's, Palestinians lost the rights they were given by Nasser. Many have embarked to universities as far-flung as Romania and Sri Lanka, the Philippines and India.

But some Palestinian institutions survive. In a Cairo suburb, 2,000 patients, half of them Palestinians, are treated at the Palestine Hospital, run by the Red Crescent Society, whose chairman is Fathi Arafat, the younger brother of the P.L.O. chairman. The hospital is in the same Cairo suburb, Heliopolis, as the Egyptian hospital where Israeli wounded were treated after the attack on the bus.

P.L.O. TERROR—A YEAR SINCE ITS RENUNCIATION (DECEMBER 15, 1988-DECEMBER 15, 1989)

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

The P.L.O. continues with its terrorist activities inside Israel and on its borders in violation of its undertakings in Geneva in December 1988 and in violation of the U.S. conditions to the dialogue with P.L.O.

In the past year the following terrorist attacks took place:

13 terrorist attacks by "Fatah" inside Israel in its pre-1967 borders.

17 border attacks by P.L.O.-affiliated organizations, (including 2 Katyusha rocket attacks on Kibbutzim in the Jordan Valley and 15 infiltration attempts across all borders, including 2 by "Fatah").

125 Palestinian were murdered on directives of the "Unified Command" (an organ operated by P.L.O. in the territories).

UNITED STATES' POLICY CONCERNING P.L.O. TERRORISM

In 1984 the United States re-affirmed and codified its policy regarding P.L.O. in the U.S. Congress Amendment to the Foreign Aid Bill, Title XIII, section 1302.

It added a stipulation demanding that the P.L.O. renounces terrorism: "In accordance with that policy no officer or employee of the United States Government and no agent or other individual acting on behalf of the United States Government shall negotiate with the Palestine Liberation Organization or any representatives thereof (except in an emergency or humanitarian situation) unless and until the Palestine Liberation Organization recognizes Israel's right to exist, accepts United Nations Security Council resolutions 242 and 338, and renounces the use of terrorism".

The codification went into effect on October 1, 1985.

On December 15, 1988 the United States began contacts with the P.L.O. based on the assumption that Arafat's declaration in Geneva justified this move.

On Dec. 16, 1988 Ambassador Pickering conveyed to the Government of Israel the U.S. "Talking Points" regarding the U.S.-P.L.O. dialogue.

The Talking Points stipulated that "no American Administration can sustain the dialogue if terrorism continues by the P.L.O. or any of its factions".

Furthermore, the P.L.O. was required to "publicly disassociate yourselves from terrorism by any Palestinian group operating anywhere".

The U.S. also stipulated that "in the event of a terrorist action by any element of the P.L.O. or one or more of its members—we expect that you not only condemn this action publicly but also discipline those responsible for it, at least by expelling them from the P.L.O.".

Not only has the P.L.O. failed to fulfill these requirements but Arafat's own "Fatah" organization, in particular, has itself engaged in terrorist acts, as will be demonstrated in the following report, and it has, furthermore, encouraged and lauded these attacks, even in the midst of the dialogue.

Ambassador Pickering also informed the Government of Israel that Arafat had told the U.S. that he does not control the violence in the areas of Judea, Samaria and Gaza, and that the U.S. accepted this statement by Arafat.

The P.L.O. may or may not have ignited the violence, but there is no doubt that the P.L.O. directs and finances the activities of those who are leading and inciting it (namely, P.L.O.'s "Unified Command" in the territories).

It should be noted that this is not the first time that the P.L.O. has violated its commitment to renounce terrorism.

On November 1985 Arafat declared in Cairo that the P.L.O. would renounce terrorism (except in the "occupied territories").

However, since his November 1985 "Cairo Declaration" until his December 1988 "Geneva Declaration"—"Fatah" itself, commanded by Arafat, organized and carried out terrorist activities throughout Israel (in its pre-1967 borders) and abroad, including a major attack on an American airliner flying over Athens, on April 2, 1986 (See appendix).

On Dec. 19, 1988 Arafat responded to a question on Viennese Television on his "renunciation" of terror by stating: "I did not mean to renounce (terrorism) . . . Actually, I only repeated what our Palestine National Council had accepted. . . . I am still now committed to what I said in Cario in 1985".

ARAFAT'S "FATAH" TERRORIST APPARATUSES

The P.L.O. is an umbrella organization which encompasses several groups. By far the largest group with para-military characteristics is "Fatah".

Arafat, as commander of "Fatah", maintains centralized control over the organization through orders and instructions, approval of plans, and allocation of the funds necessary for the execution of terrorist operations.

The apparatuses involved with terrorist activities under "Fatah" are:

1. The "Western Sector"

This is the major operational body within "Fatah", which carries out terrorist activities within Israel's borders as well as occasional attacks abroad.

In the past, the "Western Sector" was headed by Khalil Al-Wazir ("Abu Jihad"), one of "Fatah's" senior leaders, thus indicating the importance of this apparatus within the terrorist community. Currently, Arafat himself commands the "Western Sector".

Within this body operates the "Committee 77" (headed previously by Basem Sultan and Muhammad Bheis). Its main function is to activate "Fatah's" "Islamic Jihad" special branch.

2. "Force 17"

The prime role of this apparatus is to provide personal security for Arafat and senior members of the P.L.O. and for P.L.O. delegations around the world.

Over the years this apparatus assumed an additional task, namely, the execution of terrorist attacks both in and out of Israel, as well as the elimination of Arab-Palestinian opponents to "Fatah" (like the murder of a Palestinian cartoonist in London in July 1987; (see appendix).

The commander of this apparatus is one of Arafat's closest associates, Mahmoud Al-Natur (alias "Abu Tayyib").

3. The "Hawari Apparatus"

This is a specialized strike force for the purpose of carrying out operations outside of Israel.

In the past it was a section within the "Central Security and Intelligence Apparatus" of "Fatah". Currently it is operating directly under Arafat's command.

The head of this apparatus is a senior "Fatah" activist named Abdallah Abd Al Hamid Labib (alias "Colonel Hawari") who has been a close confidant of Arafat for many years.

A number of members of this group have already been tried and found guilty for terrorist activities in various European countries. "Hawari" himself was recently sentenced in France (in absentia) to ten years imprisonment.

Among members of the "Hawari Apparatus" are also former members of another radical terrorist group known by the name of "May 15".

Another member of this apparatus is the terrorist Muhammad Rashid who is in jail now in Greece and whose extradition was requested by the U.S. Government, for his responsibility for the 1982 attempt to blow up a Pan-American airliner over Honolulu (in which attack a civilian passenger was killed).

TERRORIST ACTS BY "FATAH" INSIDE ISRAEL IN ITS PRE-1967 BORDER SINCE DEC. 15, 1988

Since December 15, 1988 we have recorded thirteen acts of terror against civilians (involving explosives, hand-grenade and Molotov Cocktails) committed by members of "Fatah", within Israel's pre-67 borders.

The following list documents these acts.

In April 1989 a cell of terrorists was uncovered in the district of Jenin (Samaria). The terrorists, ten in number, all residents of the village of Arabeh, were members of the "Fatah"/"Force 17" apparatus.

The members of the cell were recruited in Amman (Jordan) during 1987-1988 and committed the following acts of terrorism after mid-December 1988, on instructions of their superiors in Amman:

Feb. 24, 1989: A Molotov Cocktail was thrown at a private car on the Nazareth-Yafi'a road.

Mar. 23, 1989: A Molotov Cocktail was thrown at a private car on the Kibbutz Kfar Hakhoresh-Yafi'a road.

Mar. 29, 1989: A handgrenade was thrown at a public bus on the Nazareth-Afula road.

In June 1989, a terrorist cell was uncovered in the district of Bethlehem. The terrorists, residents of the village of Teqoah, were members of "Fatah"/"Western Sector" apparatus. They were recruited in Amman in 1988, and instructed by their superiors after mid-December 1988 to commit acts of terrorism.

May 16, 1989: An explosive device was placed in the Liberty-Bell Park in West Jerusalem.

In June 1989, a terrorist cell was uncovered in the district of Tulkarm (Samaria). The terrorists, residents of the village of Al-Zawiya near Qalqilia, were members of the "Fatah"/"Force 17" apparatus.

They were recruited in Amman in 1988 and instructed by their superiors, after Mid-December 1988, to commit acts of terrorism:

Mar. 20, 1989: An explosive device was placed at a bus station near the "Beilinson" hospital in Petah-Tikva.

Mar. 21, 1989: Another explosive device was placed at the same location.

Mar. 31, 1989: An explosive device was placed at the entrance to a Jewish Synagogue in Kfar Avraham (near Petah-Tikva).

Apr. 16, 1989: An explosive device was placed near an apartment house in the town of Pardes Kats.

Apr. 30, 1989: An explosive device was placed at the Jabotinsky Street in the city of Ramat Gan.

May 15, 1989: An explosive device was placed at the industrial zone of Segula (near Petah-Tikva).

Jun. 5, 1989: An explosive device was placed in Hakovshim Street in Tel Aviv.

Another terrorist act committed by this cell could be added to the above list though it caused no damage inside Israel:

Jun. 15, 1989: An explosive device—intended to be placed in Tel Aviv—exploded in the hands of the perpetrator, during the preparation stages, in his village, causing him injury.

In October 1989 a terrorist cell was uncovered in the district of Jenin (Samaria). The terrorists, residents of the town of Jenin and the villages Siylat Al-Hartiya and Deir Abu-Dha'if were members of "Fatah". They were recruited in Jordan prior to Dec. 15, 1988 and instructed by their superiors to commit acts of terrorism after this date:

Apr. 11, 1989: An explosive device was placed in an irrigation installation in the village of Ram-On (near Afula).

Not included in this list are ten of "Fatah" operatives who were arrested before they were able to carry out their plans.

TERRORIST ATTACKS ACROSS ISRAELI BORDERS BY P.L.O.-AFFILIATED ORGANIZATIONS SINCE DECEMBER 15, 1988

Since December 15, 1988 we recorded seventeen attacks across all isreali borders, perpetrated by P.L.O-affiliated organizations.

These attacks take two forms:

a. "Katyusha" rocket attacks fired from outside Israel's borders on civilian targets within the country.

b. Infiltration attempts.

The following list records these attacks.

A. "Katyusha" Rockets

Two rocket attacks were perpetrated by the "P.F.L.P." ("The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine", headed by George Habash). Both attacks were launched from Jordanian territory.

The first attack took place on the night between the seventh and eighth of August 1989. The "P.F.L.P." took responsibility for the attack claiming that it was aimed at Kibbutz Ma'oz Hayim in the Jordan Valley.

The second attack took place on the night between the sixth and the seventh of September 1989. The "P.F.L.P." took responsibility for the attack claiming that it was aimed at Kibbutz Tel-Katzir.

(The rockets fell near a neighbouring Kibbutz-Sha'ar Hagolan).

In a third "Katyusha" attack (on May 27, 1989) on the town of Metulah in the upper Galilee, the "P.F.L.P." was one party to a coordinated attack perpetrated by three organizations: "Hizballah", "P.L.F." ("Palestine Liberation Front") Tal'at Ya'qub faction, and the "P.F.L.P.".

B. Infiltration Attempts

The following table lists seventeen infiltration attempts across all Israeli borders perpetrated by P.L.O.-affiliated organizations.

The P.S.F. ("Popular Struggle Front" headed by Samir Ghosheh) and the P.L.F./Tal'at Ya'qub Faction (headed by Yousef Al-Miqdah) participated in Algiers P.L.O. conference in November 1988 and were party to the decisions taken there.

On Nov. 19, 1989 P.L.O.'s organ "Falastin Al-Thawra" announced the re-unification of the two factions of the "P.L.F." (the "Abu Abbas" faction and the "Tal'at Ya' qub" faction), "thanks to Arafat's efforts."

Thus, since mid-November 1989, both organizations are part of P.L.O.

Nevertheless some observers consider the "P.S.F." and the "P.L.F."-Tal'at Ya'qub faction to be more inclined to the more radical grouping of Palestinian terrorist organizations.

Even if we omit the attacks committed by these organizations, we are still left with ten mainstream-P.L.O. attacks of this type.

MURDER OF PALESTINIANS UNDER P.L.O'S "UNIFIED COMMAND" DIRECTIVES SINCE DECEMBER 15, 1988

Since December 15, 1988 one hundred and twenty five Arab residents of Judea, Samaria and Gaza were murdered by the "Hit Squads" operating under the directives of P.L.O.'s "Unified Command" in these territories.

In the leaflets issued by this organ (which consists of delegates from the major organizations of P.L.O.)—dates are determined for the "escalation of attacks" against "collaborators" "civil administration officials" and "municipal committees".

These murders serve the P.L.O. as a means of preventing Palestinian public figures from moving in the direction of peace. These victims serve as a warning to others not to deviate from the P.L.O. line.

Among the victims are Civil Administration workers, Mayors or municipality workers, council workers and Mukhtars, Health Department band Hospital workers, Arabs working in Israel or trading with Israelis etc.

Arafat himself threatened "any Palestinian leader who proposes an end to the Intifada" that he "exposes himself to the bullets of his own people and endangers his life. The P.L.O. will know how to deal with him". (Radio Monte Carlo, Jan. 2, 1989 and Al-Qabas, Kuwait Jan. 1, 1989).

This threat was specifically aimed at the well-known Mayor of Bethlehem, Elias Freij, who only suggested a few days earlier that there be a "ceasefire" between Israel and the Palestinians, in the territories.

Arafat (in a press conference in Amman/Jordan according to A.P Aug. 22, 1989 and in interviews in "Al-Qabas", Kuwait, Oct. 11, 1989 and in "Al-Ray", Jordan, Oct. 10, 1989) Abu Iyad (in a press conference in Tunis according to A.F.P Aug. 29, 1989) and Basam Abu-Sharif (in an interview to the B.B.C/Arabic service and in the Arab weekly "Al-Dustur" Sept. 19, 1989)—all took responsibility for these murders in the name of P.L.O., and justified them.

ATTACKS BY MOLOTOV COCKTAILS ON ISRAELI PUBLIC BUSES UNDER P.L.O.'S "UNIFIED COMMAND" DIRECTIVES SINCE DECEMBER 15, 1988

Since December 15, 1988 thirteen Israeli public buses were burnt as a result of repeated attacks by use of Molotov Cocktails. In the leaflets issued by P.L.O.'s "Unified Command", dates are determined for intensive attacks of this type.

On October 30, 1988 a woman and her three infant children were burnt to death as a result of a Molotov Cocktail attack on a civilian bus en route from Beit Shean to Jerusalem.

Arafat justified this attack in the Saudi Arabian newspaper Al-Majallah (on April 5, 1989) saying that the attack was carried out by way of a Molotov Cocktail rather than a gun.

KNIFE ATTACKS UNDER P.L.O.'S "UNIFIED COMMAND" DIRECTIVES SINCE DECEMBER 15, 1988

Since December 15, 1988 five Israelis (all civilians) were murdered in stabbing attacks (and 16 others were injured).

In the leaflets issued by P.L.O.'s "Unified Command" dates are determined for attacks of this type.

On March 21, 1989 an Israeli doctor, M. Schelinger (age 75) was stabbed to death by an Arab resident of Gaza, while walking on Bin-Nun Street in Tel-Aviv. Two other civilians were injured.

On May 3, 1989 two elderly Israeli pensioners, K. Vardy and N. Levi, were stabbed to death while sitting at a bus stop in the center of West Jerusalem, by an Arab resident of Ramallah. Four other civilians (including a woman) were severely injured.

In an interview with Radio Monte Carlo on May 4, 1989 Arafat related to these murders, stating: "We shall continue wave after wave until the Palestinian flag will fly over Jerusalem".

On July 14, 1989 an Israeli construction company owner Z. Schlein (age 60) was murdered in the village of Gan-Yavneh near the town of Ashdod, by two Arab residents of Gaza, member of a local "Fatah" cell.

On September 7, 1989 a building laborer, M. Eshtamkar, was stabbed to death at his working place in the center of Tel-Aviv by his colleague, an Arab resident of Ramallah (who two days later committed a knife attack on a civilian bus driver en route from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem in order to roll the bus over into a deep ravine, for the second time within one month).

Enclosed (in the appendix) are some examples of P.L.O.'s leaflets directives regarding murder of Palestinians, stabbing and Molotov Cocktails attacks.

P.L.O.'S UNDERSTANDING OF ITS COMMITMENT TO THE "GENEVA DECLARATION" REGARDING TERRORISM

Arafat has reiterated again and again that he has "neither changed his policy nor submitted to the American demands" ("AlQabas", Dec. 21, 1988).

When asked, on April 1989, about the infiltration attempts by P.L.O. in South Lebanon and whether he opposes such acts he said: "I want to stress that the P.L.O. gave no promise nor made any agreement to stop military actions in Southern Lebanon". (Al-Majallah Apr. 5, 1989).

In a statement he made to the Emirate of Dubay television on Mar. 3, 1989 one day after the D.F.L.P. infiltration attempt—and again to A.P. on Jul. 6, 1989, Arafat declared that the attacks will continue; "The P.L.O. will not stop the armed struggle" he said "and I did not ask anybody to refrain from military operations".

Abu Iyad (Salah Khalaf) also stated, that it is "unthinkable" that anyone will demand that the P.L.O. "put down its guns" (Agence France Presse Dec. 18, 1988), and stressed that "the P.L.O. has never obligated itself to stop the armed struggle, and it shall not renounce it" (Al-Jazirah, Mar. 9, 1989 and to the U.A.E. daily "Al-Ittihad" Aug. 17, 1989).

He further clarified that "Arafat's declaration in Geneva did not relate to military targets, and if Reagan thinks that such attacks will be stopped—then the dialogue with P.L.O. should be terminated immediately, because the attacks will continue until the flag of Palestine will fly over Jerusalem" (Reuter's Dec. 17, 1989).

A few days after the "P.F.L.P." and "D.F.L.P." infiltration attempts of February 1989 Faroug Al-Qaddumi, Head of the Political Department of P.L.O. declared that "the P.L.O. is not ready to condemn any operation for which Palestinian organization and factions had taken responsibility" (Al-Sharq al-Awsat and Reuter's Feb 28, 1989).

In several interviews, Abu Iyad drew a distinction between the murder of old men, women and children and attacks on military targets (Al-Qabas and Der Spiegel Jan. 5, 1988; Radio Monte Carlo Mar. 4, 1989; Al-Jazirah Mar. 9, 1989 and "Al-Majallah" Mar. 1, 1989), stating: "We informed the U.S. of our definition of terrorism. It is an act in which civilians of any nationality, including Israelis, are killed". (Radio Monte Carlo, Mar. 4, 1989).

But on Feb. 2, 1989 he made a contradictory statement in which he referred to the "Fatah" border attack of Mar. 7, 1988 (in which a public bus was hijacked and three civilians, two of them women, were murdered)—as a military operation, and stated that such operations will continue:

"The P.L.O. has decided to build up its range of military operations in the occupied land. We have a conception with regard to military operations; such operations are executed in specified zones like the "Dimona operation". As for operations of the skyjacking type—these will not be currently executed".

In none of the above mentioned cases has Arafat or his lieutenants disassociated themselves from these actions or moved to expel the individuals or organizations involved from the P.L.O., or attempted any kind of disciplinary action—as demanded by the U.S.

The recent Tel-Aviv-Jerusalem bus terrorist action of Jul. 6, 1989 demonstrates P.L.O.'s understanding of its commitment in this respect.

On Jul. 6, 1989 an Arab resident of Gaza, named Abd al-Hadi Suleiman Ghanayem, while a passenger on the Tel-Aviv-Jerusalem bus, over-powered the driver and forced the bus off the highway into a deep ravine.

The bus burst into flames; sixteen people were killed (among them an American woman) and 25 were injured (among them seven American citizens).

The "Islamic Jihad" took responsibility for the incident.

P.L.O.'s news agency ("Wafa") qualified the attack (on Jul. 9, 1989) as "an heroic act of a new type".

Arafat's political advisor, Basam Abu Sharif, claimed on Radio Monte Carlo on the day of the attack, that this was not a terrorist act but "a natural human reaction".

P.L.O.'s Radio broadcast from Bagdad, on Jul. 12, 1989 also qualified the attack as an "heroic act", and stated:

"The act has proven that the Zionist entity is a foreign implant and intruder in this region". It further declared that "The Jewish entity has no right to exist"; "It is an entity beyond the realm of history and reason, and beyond the long standing established realities of this part of the world".

The "Fatah" Conference Resolutions (of August 1989).

On Aug. 8, 1989 the "Fatah" Conference passed new resolutions which contradict, still further, Arafat's "Geneva Declaration"—:

Resolution No. 5 calls for the "continuation, intensification and escalation of the armed struggle in order to liquidate the Zionist occupation of our Palestinian land".

Resolution No. 13 establishes a special committee for the prevention of immigration of Jews to Israel.

APPENDIXES

THE P.L.O.'S "PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT" FACTION LED BY "ABU ABBAS" TAKES RESPONSIBILITY FOR AN ATTEMPTED TERROR RAID ON KIBBUTZ MISGAV-AM (Oct. 6, 1989)

"Al-Nahar" (Lebanon), 9 October 1989.

"The 'Palestine Liberation Front" announced that a squad belonging to the "Unit of Nahariya Martyrs" was intercepted on 7 October 1989 by a joint patrol of Israeli forces and the South Lebanese Army near the town of Al-Taibeh.

The squad was on its way to attack Misgav Am.

The squad fought the force for some time, using machine guns and anti-tanks missiles, and thereby causing the disabling of an armored personnel carrier and casualties among the men on it.

The "Front" announced that its fighters "succeeded" in forcing a way open for themselves and withdrew towards Wadi Al-Litani".

LEAFLET FOUND WITH TERRORISTS OF THE "PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT"/"ABU ABBAS" FACTION ON THEIR INFILTRATION ATTEMPT OF OCT. 6, 1989

THE PALESTINE LIBERATION FRONT

The measures of oppression and terrorism which you use against our masses in the occupied land only strengthen our resolution to confront you.

Here we are, the fighting men of the Palestine Liberation Front from the unit (named in honor) of the martyr commander Faud Zeiden Abu Al-Umreyn, coming with full resolution and intention to confront you in order to fight you on the soil of our homeland which you defile with your occupation, and to remove the hardships suffered by our people who are persevering and standing fast against you, and to prove to you once again that the capacity of the Palestinian figher is capable of reaching into your own home, whatever scientific measures you may use to prevent us from reaching our occupied land, (you will find that) our will and resolution are stronger than these preventive measures.

SOLDIERS OF ISRAEL

Our right to Palestine is an historical right which is confirmed by all conventions and laws, so go away from it, and if not, it will forever be burning under your feet.

DISPATCH FROM A "FATAH" OPERATIVE IN JORDAN TO RECRUITS IN THE TERRITORIES TO COMMIT ACTS OF TERRORISM UNDER THE NAME OF "THE EAGLES OF THE REVOLUTION" (AUGUST 18, 1989)

In the name of Allah the Compassionate and Merciful

To the rebel brother Abu Zaitun Bilal,

[A series of greetings]

You know that I went to Tunis and the messenger came while I was staying there, and therefore he was delayed. When I returned to Jordan I found that not even a cent was left. However, within a night, I obtained money and at the nearest opportunity ten thousand dollars or ten thousand dinars will reach you. But I requested that there be dinars, and I hope that so it shall be and the matter will not last long. Believe me that I asked for you the amount that you requested, but the lack of money is the basic reason [for the delay].

As to the military activity, we want it to take place on two levels: the first against agents, as you made clear in your letter, and we want you to focus on a few undesirable figures, such as Kamal Al-Wahidi, Gamal Al-Bilawi, Al-Abd Salaha who was shot in the past, Hanan Halifa who lives in the area of Al-Jadida near the home of the al-Ziara family, and in addition the man who was found in the orchard of Abu Sharkh, and the owner of the cafe near the prison, Abu Kamal, with whom intelligence officials meet. The second level will be against the enemy directly, such as with hand grenades. You may buy grenades if you can, for it is most vital during this period.

We want, after every killing of an agent, that you send to the press communication offices a letter in which you will write that the "Eagles of the Revolution" movement put the agent on trial and that he was shot and executed, having been judged by the people for having collaborated with the enemy. The letter must be written with the left hand and must not have any fingerprints on it so that [its writer] will not be exposed.

We want you to act in this manner so that we will not cast responsibility for that act on the Organization [the P.L.O.] under these circumstances due to the negotiations which are taking place with the United States on political matters.

Also in military activity against the enemy, one must write [sign] in the same name and only one sentence, [i.e.]: The "Eagles of the Revolution" movement carried out the armed attack against the [vehicle] of the enemy and destroyed it, etc.

We do not want anyone to know who delivered the letter [to the media] or who asked the office to deliver it or who sent it to the agency of the world press.

Brothers, as for the liquidations we hope that you will exercise great caution on this level, and first of all that there will be names suggested [that will be dealt with] who are well known to people, so that we will not be accused and no excuse will be given to people to talk about anarchy.

There is a man by the name of Abdallah Al-Husein, who lives opposite Al-Nur, who is one of the greatest drug dealers. It is very important that you be careful, and try to liquidate the people who are known to be agents, and not people who only you know, for that is insufficient, and it is important that the people know them, so that they will not have doubts about [the value] of your action.

We want, my brothers, for you to make sure that also the military activity against the enemy will continue, and that the squads will be composed of one person or two, that every person or every squad will be assigned to carry out [an action] against [specific] official targets.

(Area chart and designated sites in the Gaza district in which arms and combat equipment are stashed.)

My brothers, I do not want to obligate you in terms of the scanty communications with us. [However] there is no need for the messenger to arrive at the office, for everyone comes there: the agent as well as the [loyal] nationalist come there. The current messenger knows the telephone number and it is the second [number]: 832117. The messenger should guard it well, should call and stay at a distance from the office so as to safeguard his security and the security of the entire squad.

We strengthen your hands and highly value your position, and we are determined in our decision to continue along the path.

My brothers, there were good decisions at the Conference [the "Fatah" Conference of Aug. 1989] for new leaders as well as new blood emerged in the movement in the "Central Committee" and in the "Revolutionary Council" during the movement's Conference.

We hope that this new [phenomenon] will be an expression of the glory of your struggle and the struggle of everyone for the liberation of the stolen land.

Revolution until victory, until victory, until victory.

Your Brother, Halim.

AUGUST 18, 1989.

"THE POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE" (GEORGE HABASH) CLAIMS RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE ATTACK ON THE SETTLEMENT OF MAOZ HAIM (ON AUGUST 7, 1989)

1. In a declaration of the "Popular Front" organization today (August 8, 1989), it was said that the organization yesterday fired two rockets from Jordanian territory towards the settlement Maoz Haim. The attack resulted in the wounding of a number of Israelis. "The occupation forces launched flares and searched in the area for our fighters." The declaration stated that the terrorists returned safely to their base, after achieving all the mission's goals. (Reuter in Damascus, August 8, 1989)

2. "The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine" announced that a squad of its fighters on the Jordanian border shelled on August 8 the settlement of Maoz Haim. The announcement added that the rockets hit their targets accurately and that all the members of the squad returned to their bases safely. (Radio Monte Carlo, August 8, 1989)

3. The military spokesman of the "Popular Front" organization (George Habash) said on August 8 in Damascus that the squad named after the martyr, Jabar Amar (of the Popular Front), fired from the Jordanian border, on the night of August 7-8, two rockets on Maoz Haim. (Kuwait News Agency, August 8, 1989)

THE ARREST OF TERRORISTS WHO ARE MEMBERS OF THE "POPULAR FRONT FOR THE LIBERATION OF PALESTINE" (GEORGE HABASH) FOR FIRING KATYUSHA ROCKETS TOWARDS MAOZ HAIM ON AUGUST 8, 1989

1. Reuters reports, based on official Jordanian sources, that Jordan arrested on October 5 a number of people who are members of the "Popular Front" (George Habash) for the firing of Katyusha rockets into Israel on September 7, 1989. (Radio Monte Carlo, October 5, 1989)

2. A reliable source stated, on October 6, that a number of people belonging to the Jordanian faction of the "Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine" (George Habash) were arrested on the night between October 4-5 in Amman by the Jordanian authorities. A source close to the Popular Front in Amman added that 8 members of the Front were arrested, among them two who were responsible for the Jordanian faction, Hamdi Matar (Abu Samir) and Azmi Khouajah (Abu Issam). The six others who were arrested are—according to the same source—Ahmed Dahbur, Abu Muhammad Almragha, Ahmed Almahsiri, Majd Alkhouajah, Abbu Kifah and Nabil Najem. (Agence France Presse, October 6, 1989)

3. It is reported that a number of members of the "Popular Front" (George Habash) were arrested today in Jordan in connection with the firing of Katyushas on Israel from Jordanian territory on September 7.

4. Diplomats reported that between 7 to 17 members of the organization were arrested. (Reuter from Amman, October 5, 1989)

EXAMPLES OF P.L.O.'S "UNIFIED COMMAND" 'S DIRECTIVES TO ATTACK ARAB CIVILIANS IN JUDEA, SAMARIA AND GAZA AND TO USE MOLOTOV COCKTAILS AND KNIVES

Leaflet 34, February 11, 1989:

The 13th of February is set as the day of escalating attacks on the collaborators, traitors, the Cadre of (Arab) workers in the Civil Administration, and members of Local Municipal Councils.

Leaflet 39, April 30, 1989:

May 13, 1989, is set as a special day for the escalation of attacks and confrontations with Molotov Cocktails and knives.

Leaflet 41, June 11, 1989:

June 19 and 20, 1989, are set as days for the escalation of the struggle by way of increased use of Molotov Cocktails and knives.

B. TERRORIST ACTIVITIES BY "FATAH" INSIDE ISRAEL (IN ITS PRE-67 BORDERS) AND ABROAD—POST ARAFAT'S "CAIRO DECLARATION" OF NOV. 1985

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

Terrorist activities were carried out by "Fatah" members in several countries. The major cases to be mentioned are:

Apr. 2, 1986—Four passengers were killed and ten injured in an explosion on a T.W.A. airliner on its flight from Rome to Athens. (Among the victims were a woman and her child who were sucked out of the plane). The perpetrators were members of the "Fatah"/"Hawari Apparatus".

Aug. 22, 1986—Four members of the "Fatah"/"Hawari Apparatus", armed with explosives, were arrested in Casablanca, planning to attack Jewish targets while Israeli Prime Minister (at the time Shimon Peres) was visiting Morocco.

July 22, 1987—A Palestinian cartoonist working in the Kuwayti newspaper "Al-Qabas", was murdered in London by members of the Fatah/"Force 17" apparatus.

CROSS-BORDER ATTACKS

Fifteen infiltration attempts across Israel's borders were made during 1988 by "Fatah" members for the purpose of attacking Israeli communities. Thirteen attempts were made from the northern border and two from the Egyptian border.

In one of these attacks, a group of "Fatah" terrorists succeeded in penetrating the southern border near Mount Harif in the Negev, hijacked a public bus, murdered two women and a man, and injured another eight passengers—all civilians.

It is worth noting that 1988 was a peak year in "Fatah's" attempts to attack Israel across its borders.

TERRORIST ATTACKS WITHIN ISRAEL—CAR BOMBS

Three car bombs were placed during the above-mentioned period by "Fatah" members, but discovered prior to explosion.

The first was discovered in Hebron, on February 1986. It was intended to explode in the Beer-Sheva market.

The second was found in Jerusalem on March 3, 1988, aimed at Secretary of State G. Shultz who was visiting the area at the time.

"Fatah" took responsibility for the act.

The third car-bomb containing two gallons of gas exploded in a car park in the town of Kfar Saba, in March 1988.

HAND-GRENADES

In October 1986 hand-grenades were thrown at the "western Wall;" causing one death and 67 injuries.

In October 1987 a hand-grenade was thrown at the Carmel-Center of Haifa (but failed to explode).

In August 1988 a hand-grenade was thrown at the "Nordau Mall", in the center of Haifa, injuring 25 people (including children).

MOLOTOV COCKTAILS

During March and April of 1988 Molotov Cocktails were thrown at public buses near Kibbutz "Sha'ar Ha'amakim" by Arab Israelis, members of "Fatah".

EXPLOSIVE DEVICES

Explosive devices were placed by "Fatah" members during 1986 in a Jerusalem supermarket and at public bus stations in the city.

ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION OF PRO-JORDANIAN PERSONALITIES

During 1986 attempts were made by "Fatah" member in order to assassinate Zahran Hassuna, Mayor of Kabatia, and Farida Rsheid, relative to the Royal Jordanian family.

MURDERS

In March 1987 a Jewish resident of Ramleh was murdered by a member of the "Fatah"/"Force 17" apparatus.

In May 1988 an elderly Jewish woman (a holocaust survivor) was murdered in her home at the village of Shafir near the town of Kiryat Malachi, by members of the "Shabibah"—"Fatah's" youth movement.

Mr. SPECTER. I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. ROCKEFELLER:

S. 2086. A bill to extend the current duty suspension on certain glass ceramic kitchenware; to the Committee on Finance.

DUTY SUSPENSION ON CERTAIN KITCHENWARE

● Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, today I'm introducing a bill to extend an existing duty suspension on certain glass ceramic kitchenware. The original duty suspension which was enacted as part of the trade bill in 1988 was noncontroversial, receiving unanimous support in the relevant committees in the House and the Senate. I expect that the extension of this duty suspension will similarly be noncontroversial.●

By Mr. JOHNSTON:

S. 2087. A bill to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to provide for the admission to the United States to the status of lawful permanent residence of certain alien entrepreneurs and their spouses and children; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROVIDING LAWFUL RESIDENCE IN THE U.S. TO CERTAIN ALIEN ENTREPRENEURS

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I am introducing this legislation at the suggestion of a distinguished group of Louisianians who have been working diligently to attract new economic opportunities for my State. Many of my colleagues have heard me speak about the serious economic situation Louisiana has faced over the last 8 years. While there are a number of encouraging signs in many areas, the hard reality is that unemployment remains unacceptably high, preliminarily estimated at 6.9 percent in December 1989, with my State's average unemployment rate among the highest in the Nation and still will above the 5.1 percent national average unemployment rate for December.

We in Louisiana must continue to seek new opportunities for job creation aggressively, from potential domestic sources as well as from those overseas. This bill is designed to help attract new jobs from the latter source.

What I am recommending in this bill is not a new idea. It is based on one of the recommendations made in 1981 by the Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy and contained in S. 358, the Immigration Act of 1989 which passed the Senate last July. My recommendation allows more flexibility in determining what is job creation, for example, by counting expansion of existing facilities and investments which would save failing industries and protect jobs which would otherwise be lost. In addition, I have tried to target this provision on States or areas within States suffering from high unemployment. However, if the maximum number of visas allowed has not been reached by the end of the third quarter of any year, the remainder can be made available to those who plan to invest in other areas.

Similar to S. 358, I have also tried to make sure that visas made available in this category do not come at the expense of family reunification. This is and should remain a principal goal of U.S. immigration policy. The number of visas I have allocated for those meeting the job creation criteria I have specified will be in addition to the world-wide levels in effect in any one year. I have also included the requirement set forth in S. 358 that the job creation, or savings, be permanent.

Just as we have recognized the need for workers with special job skills to enter our labor force to help keep our Nation competitive, I am persuaded that we should make some provision on a limited basis for those whose industry and initiative have enabled them to amass capital to invest in our country and whose capital will create new jobs and opportunities for American workers. I am further persuaded that entrepreneurs will bring a new vitality and know-how to American industry and will help those areas in the United States needing new economic opportunities to develop them.

It is my hope, Mr. President, that the House will act on S. 358 early in this session so that work can be completed on this very important part of the comprehensive revision of immigration law the Congress began several years ago. I hope the provisions in S. 358 and this free-standing bill which I am introducing today will help focus debate on the need for a new independent category and the need to make changes in our current policies to provide for those who would bring business acumen and talent to this country just as we do for those who have particular labor skills in short supply those who have achieved a certain level of education.

S. 2088. A bill to amend the Energy Policy and Conservation Act to extend the authority for titles I and II, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

ENERGY POLICY AND CONSERVATION ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, our Nation's dependence on foreign oil is large and growing. We are now importing some 77.6 million barrels a day, which is 44 percent of our consumption. By the year 2010, Mr. President, we will be importing two-thirds of our foreign oil.

Mr. President, the strategic petroleum reserve is the one part of our energy policy on which almost everyone agrees. It is our first line of defense against imports. Mr. President, we have had a policy of having 90 days of imports in the strategic petroleum reserve.

Unfortunately, today, with only 580 million barrels in the strategic petroleum reserve, it is well less than a 90-day supply. In fact, the 750 million goal presently allowed by law would not equal the 90-day supply.

Mr. President, I am, therefore, introducing a bill today to expand the strategic petroleum reserve to 1 billion barrels, which will be a 90-day supply.

The message from DOE, Mr. President, is do not worry, be happy with a smaller SPR, a weaker insurance policy, a shorter lifeline for this country if oil supplies are threatened.

We cannot have that, Mr. President. We must have the full 90-day supply, and this bill, which I am introducing today, will give us the full billion barrels of oil, the full 90-day supply which this country needs.

Our domestic supplies are dropping precipitously. Our consumption is going up quickly and the strategic petroleum reserve is our last line of defense against imported oil.

S. 2089. A bill to require the Director of the Geological Survey to conduct a study of the water quality of the Mississippi River; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER WATER STUDY ACT

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Mississippi River Water Study Act of 1990. The purpose of this bill is to authorize the U.S. Geological Survey to undertake a special 2-year study of the water quality of the Mississippi River.

The Ojibwa Indians appropriately named it the Misisipi which means great river. Water from 31 States flows into the Gulf of Mexico through the Mississippi River Basin. The river empties an average of more than 150,000 cubic feet of water per second into the gulf. That's about 1½ times the discharge of the St. Lawrence, 8 times that of the Rhine and 30 times that of the Thames.

Each year millions of people use the Mississippi for recreation, swimming, boating, fishing, and hunting. The Upper Mississippi River alone—that portion above the Mississippi-Ohio River junction—has 200 boat harbors, 445 water recreation sites and a total recreation value of approximately $700 million. Also, some 70 cities draw their water from the Mississippi. Yet, little is known about the quality of water which flows through this great river system, especially the portion north of St. Louis.

Mr. President, the first order of business for the Water Study Act should be to study the Mississippi River as a source of drinking water. The Mississippi and its tributaries are the source of 23 percent of the public surface-water supplies for the United States. Many cities in the 10 States that border it derive their water from the river. Several recent local studies have indicated that the water supplies drawn directly from the Mississippi, and those derived indirectly by pumping water from adjacent aquifers, carry a host of contaminants. And while a study of these contaminants does not in itself allow us to quantify the health threat associated with drinking water—because it generally undergoes treatment before delivery to customers—such a study does represent the first step in understanding the potential threat.

The act would also address the environmental impact upon fish, birds, and other wildlife, that habitate the Mississippi. Wildlife, as well as surrounding vegetation, relies on water from the river for survival. Many animals have the tendency to accumulate certain toxic substances in their tissue. This is known as biomagnification. The result of this process is that the tissue of the animal can have concentration of the contaminant that are hundreds or thousands of times greater than that in the water. This is one reason we need to know about contaminants in the river even if they are considerably lower than drinking water standards or health advisory levels.

This act would prove vital towards estimating the environmental health of the ever-important Mississippi. The quality of the water in the Mississippi River serves as a kind of national report card, a much-needed standard considering the fact that the river drains about 40 percent of the United States, the heartland of our Nation. It is an area that produces a substantial amount of our agricultural and industrial output. Over the past two decades Congress had enacted significant environmental legislation, and great effort and expenditures have been made by Government and the private sector. Much progress has been made. However, there still exists a number of threats to the water quality of the river.

The contaminants in the Mississippi River come from our homes and businesses, industries, agriculture, runoff from city streets, natural sources, and some are carried into the Mississippi watershed through the air. By measuring what flows down the river, dissolves in the water, attaches to sediment particles, or incorporates in the tissue of a plant or animal, we have the capability of identifying where our society is failing to meet the challenge of environmental management. This can help us set priorities for future controls.

We cannot solve our remaining water-quality problems overnight. Therefore, we need to know what to emphasize. Where do we start? Industry? Agriculture? Urban runoff? Municipal treatment plants, or some other sources?

The U.S. Geological Survey, Mr. President, is well suited to do such an assessment of the water quality of the Mississippi. Among its many scientific programs, the Survey has a responsibility to assess water resources in terms of both quantity and quality, and to improve our understanding of the impacts of human activities and natural phenomena on hydrologic systems. The Survey does this to provide water managers and policymakers at the Federal, State, and local levels with the information base for making the best possible environmental management decisions. The Survey is a fact finding organization, rather than one which is charged with enforcing laws or developing resources. Because it does not have either of these responsibilities, the Survey is able to provide highly objective and reliable analyses.

This bill instructs the Survey to carry out its study in consultation with three other agencies that have expertise and responsibility related to the river: First, the Fish and Wildlife Service, which has a responsibility for endangered species and the national system of refuges, and has considerable expertise in the sampling and interpretation of data on contaminants in animal tissue; second, the Environmental Protection Agency, which has responsibility for the enforcement of the key statutes aimed at protecting the quality of river water and human health as it relates to drinking water. EPA also has expertise in environmental chemistry and toxicity that can be very valuable to a study such as this; and, third, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which has the responsibility for the navigation and flood control facilities along the river. As a part of this responsibility, the corps must take care of dredging the river and safely disposing of the dredge spoil. It also has expertise relating to contaminants in river sediments and the movement of contaminants between the water and the sediments.

Now is the time to begin this study because the Survey has recently been refining techniques for data collection and laboratory analyses designed for just such an assessment. Since 1987, the Survey has been working from St. Louis to the mouth of the Mississippi—including several of the major tributaries—collecting water and sediment samples and analyzing them for metals, organic chemicals—including pesticides and their breakdown products—and for sediment. The study proposed by this bill would extend the work of the Survey to include the entire river from the headwaters at Lake Itasca in Minnesota to the Gulf of Mexico, and lead to an overall assessment document in October 1992.

Mr. President, the issue of water quality in the Mississippi River is of the greatest importance to our Nation. If we are to make the right choices about future measures to improve the quality of this valuable resource, we must have an accurate assessment of its present status. I urge my colleagues to work with me to see that such a study begins as soon as possible.●

By Mr. GLENN:

S. 2090. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to make changes to the earned income tax credit to provide equitable treatment for military families overseas and to clarify and improve current law; to the Committee on Finance.

CORRECTING AN INEQUITY IN THE FEDERAL INCOME TAX TREATMENT OF CERTAIN MILITARY MEMBERS

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill that would amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to correct an inequity in the Federal income tax treatment of certain military members who are assigned outside of the United States and to clarify and improve current law.

Under current tax law, low-income families with children are authorized an indexed, refundable income tax credit. The maximum annual amount of this credit in 1989 was $910. For 1990, it will be $953.40. This maximum is reduced at a rate of 10 percent of earned income over $10,730.

The current construction of the law is such that only low-income families with children in the United States are eligible for this credit. Therefore, about 25,000 military personnel, who are assigned outside of the United States, who would otherwise be eligible for this tax credit, are being denied this credit solely because they are assigned outside of the United States.

All of these military personnel are young, junior enlisted members who are struggling to make ends meet. Most of these young men and women are on their first assignment outside of the United States and are experiencing for the first time the added financial burdens of being assigned to a foreign country where up-front housing costs and currency fluctuations put a squeeze on their pocketbooks. When you place on top of this the loss of the earned income tax credit because of their assignment outside of the United States, the squeeze is made worse.

Let me give you an example of what I mean. A married E-3—a private first class in the Army, a seaman in the Navy, an airman first class in the Air Force, or a lance corporal in the Marine Corps—with less than 2 years of service who has a dependent child and household in the United States would pay no Federal income tax. But this same individual, because he or she is eligible for the earned income tax credit, would receive a payment of about $450 a year. This same individual, if he or she is assigned outside of the United States, would not be eligible for this credit, and therefore lose about $450 a year because of being assigned outside of the United States.

I believe all of my colleagues can see the inequity involved here. I don't think that 25,000 out of the 115,000 military families who earn incomes that would otherwise qualify for earned income tax credit should be denied this credit when they are required by our Government to serve outside of the United States.

The Department of Defense has recognized this inequity and attempted to correct it last year by proposing legislation almost identical to the bill I am introducing. I understand that, because the legislation was submitted near the close of the legislative session last year, and because of the agreement between the legislative branches and the administration that the final budget reconciliation would be free of any items unrelated to deficit reduction, that it was not acted on. I believe the legislation was considered to be meritorious at the time so my purpose in introducing this bill is to expedite the action this year.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Manpower and Personnel of the Committee on Armed Services, I want to say that our military personnel are going through a very uncertain period of time. The amended defense budget for fiscal year 1991 proposes a reduction in military strength by 91,400 over the next 2 years. The reduction will require our military personnel to work harder and at the same time accept a more austere compensation and benefits package. So it is incumbent on all of us to do what we can to ameliorate some of this.

From a budget standpoint, the bill I am introducing is budget neutral. The revenue loss of including military personnel assigned outside of the United States under the eligibility criteria for earned income tax credit would be offset by clarifying language in the bill that would include the value of Government quarters for those who reside in them in the calculation of earned income. In the past the treatment of the value of Government provided housing was inconsistent, resulting in substantial overpayments.

Mr. President, the bill I am introducing, corrects an inequity for those military families most in need in our military establishment. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this legislation.●

By Mr. BUMPERS (for himself and Mr. REID):

S. 2093. A bill to amend the Federal Election Campaign Act to exclude from the definition of "independent expenditures" those expenditures that are not truly independent of the legislative process; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

INDEPENDENT CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am pleased to be joined by my colleagues Senators BOREN, REID, BRYAN, and CRANSTON in introducing legislation today that will severely limit the use of independent expenditures in Federal election campaigns. According to records at the Federal Election Commission, so-called independent expenditures in congressional races in the 1988 election cycle totaled $7 and $14.1 million in the campaign for President. I am greatly concerned about the pernicious influence of these expenditures in Federal campaigns in the last several years and believe that their continued, unchecked use will be extremely detrimental to our election process.

Let me put the legislation in context. Under current law, expenditures made expressly to advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate, where they are made without prior consultation or cooperation with any candidate, are independent expenditures. The Supreme Court stated in Buckley versus Valeo that independent expenditures receive the constitutional protection of free speech, and thus are not subject to dollar limits, because they are made "totally independently" of the candidate and his campaign, thus "alleviating the danger that they will be given as a quid pro quo for improper commitments from the candidate." (424 U.S. 1, 47 (1976).)

In the absence of total independence, an expenditure made in support of a candidate constitutes a contribution limited to amounts specified under section 315 of the Federal Election Campaign Act (2 U.S.C. section 441a). Any contact or coordination with the candidate or campaign will destroy the requisite independence of the activity, and thus subject the expenditure to these limits.

In many campaigns, and most recently during the 1988 elections, this standard of independence has been shamelessly abused by political committees which are organized as separate segregated funds of organizations with active lobbying programs. In these situations, staff and members of an affiliated lobbying organization develop close working relationships with Members of Congress, particularly those who sit on committees with substantive jurisdiction over the organization's key issues. It is highly likely, if not inevitable, that in the course of their lobbying meetings conversations about the upcoming election and the member's campaign occur.

At election time the affiliated political committee then assists the very same members who have been supportive of its lobbying agenda by making independent expenditures in support of their campaigns. This degree of coordination and consultation prior to making an independent expenditure is clearly violative of the standard of total independence.

For example, take the case of a neck and neck race for the Senate. In the last week of the campaign before the election, a well-financed political committee places hundreds of thousands of dollars into media advertisements in opposition to one of the candidates whose stated position on several issues is viewed as infavorable by the PAC. The other candidate's position on these same issues is, not so coincidentally, supported by the PAC. The ads are seen by millions of local voters and the candidate attacked in the ads has little or no time or money to respond to this media blitz. He loses the race by only a few thousand votes, undoubtedly the victim of these "independent" expenditures by the political committee. That PAC now has helped to place their favored candidate in office, one who is sympathetic to the issues they support. Should this last minute spending in amounts often exceeding $1 million be allowed? Are these expenditures the type of spending envisioned by the Supreme Court in Buckley? I believe the answer to both questions is clearly no.

The Supreme Court emphasized that the expenditure must be given with no prior consultation or arrangement with the candidate in order to avoid any political quid pro quo which may arise in the form of campaign support in return for legislative access and favor. Clearly, the dual relationship that a political committee and its affiliated lobbying organization creates with a current or potential officeholder, by requesting support for its legislative agenda and providing financial support for the candidates' election, establishes precisely the quid pro quo that must be avoided.

My legislation is simple. It will amend the definition of independent expenditure under the act to prohibit a political committee which is tied to an organization that lobbies Congress, from making expenditures defined as independent. More formally stated, a political committee could not claim independence for any expenditures if the committee is directly or indirectly organized, financed, controlled or administered by a connected organization which is required to register, or which pays for the services of a person required to register under the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act.

If Congress is truly interested in enacting campaign finance reform legislation, and God knows I hope we are, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation, which I believe to be an integral part of any serious effort at campaign finance reform.

In closing, Mr. President, I have labored long and hard over this legislation and I am not absolutely positive but I am absolutely secure in the belief that this will meet the Buckley versus Valeo test and is constitutional.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, in the past year, I've come to this floor and talked about the need for campaign finance reform. Again and again, I urged us to do something. Now is the time.

Today, my distinguished colleague from Arkansas, Senator DALE BUMPERS, has introduced legislation to limit independent expenditures.

I am a cosponsor of this bill because it does something to counter the single most important problem in campaign spending today.

Independent expenditures allow individuals or groups to spend as much money as they want for advertisements, direct mail, and other efforts on behalf of a candidate.

As long as they don't coordinate their activities with a candidate or the campaign, they are free to spend unlimited amounts of money. They are merely exercising their freedom of speech.

But I believe that most independent expenditures are not truly independent. They operate in accordance with a slightly skewed version of freedom.

This kind of freedom allows an individual like Donald Trump to spend $2 million of his own money—to ensure that his candidate wins the mayoral race in New York City.

This kind of freedom allows political action committees to elude Federal election laws.

It is a freedom that has contributed to an increase of 1,000 percent in independent expenditures since 1976. One of the more prominent players to exercise this freedom was the National Conservative Political Action Committee, led by the late Terry Dolan. In a 1980 interview with the Washington Post, Mr. Dolan cut to the essence of how independent expenditures can change the political landscape. He said:

> Groups like ours are potentially very dangerous to the political process. We could be a menace, yes. Ten independent expenditure groups, for example, could amass this great amount of money and defeat the point of accountability in politics. We could say whatever we want about an opponent of a Senator Smith and the Senator wouldn't have to say anything. A group like ours could lie through its teeth and the candidate it helps stays clean.

Unfortunately, Terry Dolan's words were not much of an exaggeration. His prophecy is coming true.

Mr. Dolan's words should strongly persuade us to limit independent expenditures. Mr. Dolan openly taunted and belittled the FEC. He said the loophole allowing unlimited independent expenditures enabled groups like his to "gleefully spend millions."

When that much money is being spent, I find it hard to fathom that there is absolutely no coordination or contact between the organization doling out the millions and the candidate or campaign who benefits from those expenditures.

Mr. Dolan was not ashamed to show up our campaign finance system for the fiasco that it has become.

He thought the whole thing was one big joke played on the FEC. But it is not funny. Not in the least.

I, for one, am ashamed that our country, the birthplace of democracy, can tolerate a practice that is tantamount to buying elections.

In 1984, the Supreme Court heard a case involving Mr. Dolan's National Conservative PAC and the FEC. The Court asserted that the only compelling governmental interest in restricting campaign finances is the prevention of corruption and the appearance of corruption.

If that's the case, Mr. President, we have a compelling reason for action.

The Congress must begin restricting independent expenditures, thereby restoring our democratic campaign practices to a clean, fair, high ground.

Senator BUMPERS' legislation is a critical step in this direction. I encourage my colleagues to join me in supporting this significant legislation.

But I must emphasize that this legislation is only a first step toward addressing the numerous problems plaguing our campaign finance system.

Senator MCCONNELL and I have introduced the Federal Election Enforcement Act which will provide the FEC with the authority and resources required to do its job.

My bill will help guarantee that campaigns in this country follow the letter and spirit of the law. If they do not, they will be quickly judged guilty of violations and penalized with more than a mere slap on the wrist and paltry fine.

It is time that the FEC gains the respect and power that the institution needs.

We must also require disclosure of independent expenditures. The bill introduced today helps tighten the definition of independent expenditures.

But we must additionally ensure that voters be made aware when organizations or individuals spend vast sums of money to support or oppose a candidate.

In Nevada, nobody was aware that the half a million dollars' worth of advertising on the social security issue was spent by an organization representing foreign car dealers.

Nobody was aware that an independent group—with no direct relation to social security—was the source of the media blitz.

I am a strong advocate of freedom of speech, but we must find a way to balance this right of free expression with the right of all Americans to participate in a fair, honest campaign process.

Other elements of the proposal I will endorse include stipulations for broadcast discounts within election timeframes, and restrictions to address bundling and the millionaire's loophole.

The bill introduced by Senator BUMPERS today is an important step—but only a first step—toward rectifying the credibility and viability of our Nation's campaign finance laws and—ultimately—our democratic electoral process.

By Mr. DOLE:

S. 2094. A bill entitled the "Eastern European Democracy and Free Market Act of 1990"; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EASTERN EUROPEAN DEMOCRACY AND FREE MARKET ACT OF 1990

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, today, I am introducing legislation to implement the President's proposed program of assistance to the emerging democracies of Eastern Europe—as outlined in his recently submitted budget.

Yesterday, I expressed some chagrin that the Foreign Relations Committee intended to move tomorrow to markup—without any real hearing, or serious consideration—a Senate Democrat proposal on this same issue. I noted then that the President's proposal had not yet even been presented in legislative form.

Today, I have received some indication—which I hope will soon be confirmed—that the foreign relations markup has been postponed until after the recess. As everyone knows, providing aid to the emerging democracies of Eastern Europe is a matter of the highest priority. As far as I know, it is not a partisan concern. It is one we all want to support. It is one that the American people have mixed feelings on.

In fact, I was surprised by a survey of the New York Times, I think, about 10 days ago which indicated only about 38 percent of the American people even wanted to give any aid to Eastern Europe. The bottomline in foreign aid is not popular. We have a pretty big foreign aid program now. Many Americans think we ought to take a look at that foreign aid program before we start making it bigger to see if there is not some way to obtain some money from what we give international agencies or what we give around the world—to see if we cannot obtain some money from that particular pot.

I am pleased that the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, the President pro tempore, Senator BYRD, indicated today that he agreed with me that we ought to take a look at foreign aid. There ought to be some way to save enough money in what we send in foreign aid to take care of the initial needs of the emerging democracies and also to take care of some 31 countries who have been receiving some aid from the United States.

We are going to have either reduced aid or zero aid because of all the earmarking we now find in the foreign aid program. I share the view expressed by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia. Obviously, the Congress does have a say in how we spend money. Obviously, the Congress is going to reserve some right to designate certain countries and certain amounts. But on the other hand, the President should have some flexibility in the event of some emergency. These are almost emergencies. Nobody knew when we left here last November we were going to have all of these new emerging democracies. The President ought to be in the position, whether he be a Democrat or Republican, to respond quickly with appropriate relief, aid, call it what you will.

So it seems to me this is a priority. There ought to be hearings. It ought to be thought through sensibly. I think there is a feeling on the part of the American people—and I might say some of the recipient nations, whether it be Czechoslovakia, Romania, Bulgaria, East Germany, or any of the other emerging democracies. They are not looking for welfare. They prefer investment, as Lech Walesa told us in a joint meeting in Congress not too long ago.

They are looking for American investment. I am not certain there is enough money available. I am not certain our taxpayers are willing to spend enough money to start some massive foreign aid program that is going to continue forever or at least in the foreseeable future.

And, on foreign policy especially, we should give due consideration to the recommendations of the President of the United States—who, according to the Constitution, has principal responsibility for formulating and conducting our foreign policy.

So I welcome the apparent decision—I hope it is a real decision—of the Democratic majority on the committee to postpone its markup, give the President an opportunity to present his proposal, and give the committee time to consider it in a rational, nonpartisan fashion.

I might also point out the Secretary of State is not even in the country. He is engaged in very important meetings in the Soviet Union with Secretary Shevardnadze. It is another reason I am pleased that it has been postponed. I hope that is true. It should be postponed.

Mr. President, the President's package which I have forwarded authorized $300 million in fiscal year 1991 to assist the emerging democracies of Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia.

It lays out sound policy outlines—especially in mandating that the aid should be used exclusively to encourage democratization and free enterprise economics. In other words, do not pour it into some pit and initiate some welfare program in some country we are going to have to continue time after time after time; that we are going to continue such aid only so long as the recipient countries continue to make progress toward those goals. That is a market economy, democracy, all the things we hope for—as long as they maintain friendly relations with the United States. If that ceases, then the aid ceases.

In other words, this is not aid tossed into a vacuum—but tied to specific policy objectives.

The bill will make the emerging democracies eligible for GSP and OPIC benefits—consistent with their commitment to democracy and free enterprise.

It mandates reporting that will keep the Congress informed about progress toward achieving our policy goals—without imposing a massive new reporting burden on the executive branch.

Mr. President, I have pressed the administration to prepare this legislation as quickly as possible. I endorse its goals and provisions, and hope that it will serve as the basis of our legislative action.

But—as I said in my statement of yesterday—good foreign policy almost has to be nonpartisan foreign policy. I do not regard the administration's proposal as the last, or the only word—any more than I regard the Senate Democrat proposal as the last or the only word.

So I hope we will go forward in prompt, but prudent, consideration of this issue—taking into account all responsible proposals—and that, finally, we will fashion a nonpartisan package that will enjoy overwhelming support in the Congress.

That is the way our foreign policy ought to work—especially on an issue as important as that of the emerging democracies of Eastern Europe.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill I am introducing, including a section-by-section analysis, be included in the RECORD.

I encourage all Senators to review the legislation and to review the section-by-section analysis, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill and the section-by-section analysis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2094

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Eastern European Democracy and Free Market Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND STATEMENT OF POLICY.

(a) REASONS FOR ASSISTANCE.—The Congress finds as follows:

(1) A new era has begun in Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia. The year 1989 witnessed a great revolution, that is still continuing, in which Eastern European countries took the first steps toward establishing democratic institutions and market-oriented economies.

(2) The pivotal events of the past year validate the longstanding goals of United States policy and the principles of freedom and opportunity upon which it is based.

(3) The countries of Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia are now in a critical period of transition as they seek to transform the promise of the revolution into the reality of enduring, democratic societies.

(4) The success of independent, democratic governments and the establishment of free, market-oriented economies in Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia is in the national interest of the United States.

(5) In order to further the political, economic, and social democratization processes in Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia, the United States should provide assistance which would support the efforts of these countries to join the world community as democratic, self-reliant, and economically secure countries.

(b) STATEMENT OF POLICY.—It is the the Sense of the Congress that the policy of the United States to facilitate the reintegration of Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia into the community of democratic nations and to end the artificial division of Europe. In furtherance of this objective, the United States should provide and expand assistance to the countries of Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia to the extent that such countries are taking steps toward—

(1) political pluralism, based on progress toward free and fair elections and an end to the monopoly of the communist party;

(2) economic reform, based on progress toward the emergency of a market-oriented economy with a substantial private sector;

(3) respect for human rights, including the right to emigrate; and

(4) a willingness to build a friendly relationship with the United States.

(c) EXTRAORDINARY NATURE OF ASSISTANCE.—The Congress recognizes that—

(1) change is occurring quickly but unevenly in Yugoslavia and the individual countries of Eastern Europe, and it has not been possible, and will not be possible, to anticipate with certainty how United States assistance would best serve to facilitate the political and economic democratization processes in Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia;

(2) the pace of events in Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia requires that the President have the ability to provide United States assistance and resources expeditiously if the United States is to be able to influence events as they occur;

(3) the ability of the United States to participate effectively in the rebuilding of Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia will be directly related to how well United States assistance efforts are coordinate and integrated with the similar activities of friendly and allied donor countries, and international financial institutions; and

(4) the success of United States efforts to encourage political, economic, and social change depends in large measure on providing the President with the authority to use the resources available to him in those countries of Eastern Europe and in Yugoslavia, and for activities in those countries, which will most effectively promote the objectives of this Act and the Support for East European Democracy (SEED) Act of 1989.

SEC. 3. BASIC OBJECTIVES OF ASSISTANCE TO EASTERN EUROPE AND YUGOSLAVIA.

(a) BASIC OBJECTIVES.—In furtherance of the policy contained in section 2 of this Act, assistance programs authorized by this Act shall have the following two interrelated and mutually reinforcing objectives:

(1) PROMOTION OF DEMOCRACY.—Fostering political pluralism and the establishment of an open, accessible, fair, and predictable rule of law that values individual liberty and respect for individual property, and that facilitates the functioning of democratic and free market systems.

(2) ENCOURAGEMENT OF FREE MARKET SYSTEMS.—Fostering market-oriented economies and free enterprise, consistent with sound environmental policies, thereby facilitating and expanding the participation of the local private sector in the democratization process and enhancing the ability of the private sector in the United States and other free market countries to participate in that process.

(b) DEMOCRACY.—Democratic development, political pluralism, and respect for internationally recognized human rights are intrinsically linked to economic and social progress. It is in the United States interest and in keeping with our democratic traditions to foster the spread of democratic values and aspirations and universal respect for civil and political liberties. While this is true worldwide, it is especially important in the newly emerging democratic nations within Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia.

(1) ELABORATION OF OBJECTIVE.—Activities in furtherance of this objective would promote:

(A) the ability of all citizens to organize and associate freely and independently of government;

(B) the ability of all citizens to speak and travel freely;

(C) the right to choose freely one's government, to hold that government accountable, and to participate in political life;

(D) the full observance of internationally recognized human rights; and

(E) the growth of indigenous non-governmental organizations which are committed to democratic values and active in the promotion of pluralism.

(2) TYPES OF ASSISTANCE.—In pursuing the above objective the President should undertake activities such as, but not limited to:

(A) assisting in election activities to ensure open and free elections and nationwide dissemination of information;

(B) strengthening newly established formal democratic institutions such as democratically elected legislatures and local governments, independent judiciaries, and unions;

(C) strengthening non-governmental organizations such as professional associations, indigenous private voluntary organizations and independent institutes and foundations;

(D) encouraging involvement of U.S. non-governmental agencies, foundations and institutions to participants in promoting democratic pluralism within these countries;

(E) promoting cultural and educational exchanges;

(F) promoting the establishment of independent and pluralistic media.

(c) FREE MARKET SYSTEM.—Establishment of a free enterprise, market economy is a key component of long-term sustainable growth of any nation. To be sustainable, such economic growth also must be environmentally sound. As the Eastern European countries abandon government-controlled pricing and allocation systems, they will be in a position to benefit from the experience of the United States and other democracies in operating market-oriented economies.

(1) ELABORATION OF OBJECTIVE.—Promoting a free market system covers a broad spectrum of activities which would include:

(A) establishing macroeconomic policies, legal and regulatory frameworks, and financial institutions and markets to address the structural problems inhibiting the development of free market economies;

(B) developing the indigenous private sector, mobilizing United States private sector investment and trade, and advancing United States business interests;

(C) developing human resources required by free market economies;

(D) providing interim support for the transition to market-oriented economic systems through the provision of essential goods and services such as farm implements, feed grains, food assistance, and fertilizers;

(E) improving environmental conditions; and

(F) providing for labor market reform.

(2) TYPES OF ASSISTANCE.—In pursuing the above objective, the President is authorized to undertake such actions as:

(A) support for International Monetary Fund and International Bank for Reconstruction and Development agreements, and participation in multilateral institutions and currency stabilization programs;

(B) provision of Most Favored Nation status and eligibility under the Generalized System of Preferences consistent with existing legislation;

(C) encouragement of bilateral trade, investment, and business agreements;

(D) mobilization of capital for private sector investment through such vehicles as enterprise funds, guarantees, financial and capital market development;

(E) provision of technical assistance, technical training and scholarships in relevant areas such as management, banking, economics, accounting, and privatization;

(F) provision of food assistance under Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 and other food assistance programs, consistent with the need to avoid disincentives to domestic production and marketing; and

(G) promotion of sound environmental policies and practices which address the problems of environmental pollution.

SEC. 4. ASSISTANCE ACTIVITIES.

(a) AUTHORITY.—In order to carry out section 3 of this Act to foster the transition of the countries of Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia to a system of free market economies within the context of increasing political democratization, the President is authorized to furnish assistance for Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, the German Democratic Republic, Romania, Yugoslavia, and any other Eastern European country which he determines is making significant progress toward achieving political pluralism, economic reform, respect for human rights, and willingness to build a friendly relationship with the United States. Assistance authorized by this section may be furnished notwithstanding any other provision of law. Such assistance may include any of the SEED Actions contained in section 2(c) of the Support for East European Democracy (SEED) Act of 1989.

(b) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—For programs of providing the assistance authorized by this section, there are authorized to be appropriated to the President $300,000,000 for fiscal year 1991, inclusive of amounts authorized to be appropriated under the Support for East European Democracy (SEED) Act of 1989. Amounts authorized to be appropriated by this subsection are authorized to remain available until expended.

(c) RELATIONSHIP WITH OTHER PROVISIONS OF LAW.—(1) Such amounts as are appropriated for fiscal year 1991 pursuant to the provisions of the Support for East European Democracy (SEED) Act of 1989 for SEED Actions for Poland and SEED Actions for Hungary may be used, notwithstanding any other provision of law, for such SEED Actions or for other assistance activities for Poland and Hungary (as the case may be) consistent with section 3 of this Act.

(2) Of the funds appropriated by the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1990, for Poland and Hungary, up to $4,000,000 may be provided, notwithstanding any other provision of law, for support for independent, democratic organizations and activities in other Eastern European countries and in Yugoslavia.

SEC. 5. TRADE AND INVESTMENT.

(a) AMENDMENT TO THE LIST OF INELIGIBLE COUNTRIES UNDER THE GENERALIZED SYSTEM OF PREFERENCES.—Subsection (b) of section 502 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2462(b)) is amended by striking out "Czechoslovakia" and "Germany (East)" in the table within such subsection.

(b) ELIGIBILITY OF EASTERN EUROPEAN COUNTRIES FOR OPIC PROGRAMS.—(1) Section 231(2) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2191(2)) is amended by inserting "Eastern European countries as designated by the President, Yugoslavia, and" after "(other than".

(2) Section 234(g)(2) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2194(g)(2)) is amended by inserting in the title "YUGOSLAVIA, EASTERN EUROPE," before "SUB-SAHARAN AFRICA" and inserting "Eastern European countries designated by the President, Yugoslavia," before "countries in sub-Saharan Africa".

(3) Section 239(f) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2199(f)) is amended by inserting "Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Romania, and such other Eastern European country as the President may designate," after "Hungary,".

SEC. 6. PROGRAM ADMINISTRATION.

(a) COORDINATION.—It is the Sense of the Congress that there should continue to be a Special Coordination for Assistance to Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia whose repsonsibility should be, in part, to promote maximum effectiveness and coordination of United States Government assistance programs for Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia and to foster coordination of these programs with the assistance programs of other countries and organizations.

(b) AUTHORITY OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT AGENCIES.—(1) United States Government agencies which are authorized to provide assistance or conduct programs for Poland and Hungary under the provisions of the Support of East European Democracy (SEED) Act of 1989, are hereby authorized, notwithstanding any other provision of law, to provide such assistance or conduct such programs as the President may determine for countries in Eastern Europe or Yugoslavia. Any administrative authorities provided by the SEED Act to any such agency to assist that agency to carry out programs for Poland and Hungary shall be applicable for programs, as designated by the President, to other East European countries or Yugoslavia.

(2) The term "United States Government agencies" shall include any agency as defined in section 644(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2403(a)).

(c) PRIVATE SECTOR DEVELOPMENT.—The President may authorize such agency or agencies as he may designate to develop and implement, in consultation with representatives of business organizations in the United States, programs for management and technical assistance to governments and private enterprises in East European countries.

SEC. 7. REPORTING REQUIREMENTS.

Not later than January 31 of each year (beginning in 1991), the President shall submit to the Congress a "Report on the United States Program of Support for Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia". Each such report shall describe the assistance provided to each Eastern European country under this Act and the Support for East European Democracy (SEED) Act of 1989 during the preceding fiscal year. In addition, each such report shall contain an assessment of the progress made by each such recipient country in—

(1) implementing economic policies designed to promote sustainable economic growth, develop economic freedom, and increase opportunities for the people of that country; and

(2) adopting and implementing constitutional, legal, and administrative measures that—

(A) affect the powers of the executive and legislative authorities and the independence of the judiciary,

(B) affect the formation and operation of independent political parties, groups, associations, or organizations, or

(C) affect fundamental human rights and civil liberties.

SEC. 8. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

(a) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—Section 602 of the Support for East European Democracy (SEED) Act of 1989 is amended—

(1) by striking out "SEED INFORMATION CENTER SYSTEM" from the section title and inserting in lieu thereof "EASTERN EUROPEAN BUSINESS INFORMATION CENTER";

(2) in subsection (a), by striking out "a SEED Information Center System" and inserting in lieu thereof "an Eastern European Business Information Center System";

(3) by striking out "Government of Poland and the Government of Hungary" and inserting in lieu thereof "Governments of Eastern European countries and Yugoslavia, as designated by the President"; and

(4) by amending subsection (c) to read as follows:

"(c) LOCATION.—The Eastern European Business Center may be based jointly in Washington, the District of Columbia, the United States Department of Commerce, and the capitals of Eastern European countries and Yugoslavia as designated by the President.".

(b) CREDIT UNIONS.—Paragraph (16) of section 107 of the Federal Credit Union Act (12 U.S.C. 1757) (as added by section 206 of the Support for East European Democracy (SEED) Act of 1989) is amended by striking out "Poland and Hungary" and inserting in lieu thereof "Eastern European countries and Yugoslavia as designated by the President".

SECTIONAL ANALYSIS

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE

This section states that this Act may be cited as the "Eastern European Democracy and Free Market Act of 1990".

SECTION 2. FINDINGS AND STATEMENT OF POLICY

Subsection (a) of this section contains a statement of findings which note, in part, that 1989 was a watershed year in the history of Europe, that the countries of Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia are now in a critical period as they seek to transform the events of the past year into the reality of enduring, democratic societies, and that it is in the national interest of the United States to provide assistance which would support the efforts of these countries to join the world community as democratic, self-reliant, and economically secure countries.

Subsection (b) of this section states that it is the policy of the United States to facilitate the reintegration of Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia into the community of democratic nations and to end the artificial division of Europe. In furtherance of this objective, assistance should be provided to the extent such countries are taking steps toward: political pluralism, economic reform, respect for human rights, and a willingness to build a friendly relationship with the United States.

Subsection (c) of this section notes that the ability of the United States to participate meaningfully, in a timely fashion, and cooperatively with other donors in affecting change in Eastern Europe will depend in large measure on the discretion provided to the President to make use of the resources authorized in the bill to meet the emerging and changing needs of the countries of Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia.

SECTION 3. BASIC OBJECTIVES OF ASSISTANCE TO EASTERN EUROPE AND YUGOSLAVIA

Subsection (a) of this section states that United States assistance efforts shall have two interrelated objectives: (1) promotion of democracy, and (2) encouragement of free market systems. These objectives are elaborated upon in subsections (b) and (c) of the bill.

Subsection (b) of this section states that political pluralism, democratic development, and respect for human rights are intrinsically linked to economic and social progress. In furtherance of this objective, the United States should promote, for example: the ability of citizens to organize and associate freely and to speak and travel freely, the right to choose freely one's government, the growth of indigenous non-governmental organizations committed to democratic values. In pursuing this objective, various kinds of assistance are enumerated including: supporting election activities, strengthening newly established democratic institutions, strengthening non-governmental organizations such as labor unions and professional associations, and promoting the establishment of independent and pluralistic media.

Subsection (c) of this section states that the establishment of a free enterprise, market economy is a key component of long-term sustainable growth, and that to be sustainable, growth must be environmentally sound. Promoting a free market system covers a broad spectrum of activities including development of appropriate policy frameworks, financial institutions, and markets in order to address structural constrains, mobilizing the United States private sector, and the private sectors of other countries, in support of the development process in Eastern Europe, providing interim inputs of commodities, and seeking to improve environmental conditions and ensure that growth occurs within an environmentally sound context. Assistance activities might include support for and participation in multilateral institutions and agreements, provision of capital for private sector investment, provision of technical assistance and training, promotion of specific activities to foster appropriate environmental policies and practices.

SECTION 4. ASSISTANCE ACTIVITIES

Subsection (a) of this section authorizes the President to provide assistance to Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, the German Democratic Republic, Romania, Yugoslavia, and any other Eastern European country which he determines is making significant progress toward achieving political pluralism, economic reform, respect for human rights, and a willingness to build a friendly relationship with the United States. Assistance is authorized to be provided to carry out the purposes of section 3 of the bill and may also be used for activities contained in section 2(c) of the Support for East European Democracy (SEED) Act of 1989.

Subsection (b) of this section authorizes the appropriation of $300,000,000, to remain available until expended.

Subsection (c) of this section provides that amounts appropriated for fiscal year 1991 pursuant to the authority contained in the Support for East European Democracy (SEED) Act of 1989 for Poland and for Hungary may be used for those SEED actions or for activities for Poland and Hungary (as the case may be) consistent with section 3 of this bill.

Subsection (c) also provides the authority to use up to $4 million of funds appropriated for Poland and Hungary for fiscal year 1990 to support democratic organizations and activities in other Eastern European countries and in Yugoslavia.

SECTION 5. TRADE AND INVESTMENT

Subsection (a) of this section removes Czechoslovakia and the German Democratic Republic from the list of countries ineligible for the Generalized System of Preferences. These countries may be granted GSP subject to other statutory eligibility criteria.

Subsection (b) of this section amends the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to provide eligibility for Eastern European countries and Yugoslavia for programs administered by the Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC). Section 234(g) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 refers to OPIC's equity program, which may be used in Eastern European countries as designated by the the President.

SECTION 6. PROGRAM ADMINISTRATION

Subsection (a) of this section expresses the sense of the Congress that there should continue to be a Special Coordinator for Assistance to Eastern Europe and Yugoslavia in order to promote maximum effectiveness of United States assistance programs and their coordination with other donors.

Subsection (b) of this section provides authority for any agency or department which was authorized to conduct programs or provide assistance under the Support for East European Democracy (SEED) Act of 1989 to provide assistance or conduct programs, as the President may determine, for Eastern European countries and Yugoslavia. Funding for such assistance or programs may be derived from funds authorized to be appropriated by this bill or from funds otherwise available to such agencies or departments.

Subsection (c) of this section authorizes the President to provide management and technical assistance programs to governments and small businesses in Eastern European countries and Yugoslavia.

SECTION 7. REPORTING REQUIREMENTS

This section requires submission of an annual report on assistance activities conducted the previous year under the authority of this bill and the Support for East European Democracy (SEED) Act of 1989.

SECTION 8. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Subsections (a) and (b) of this section makes certain conforming changes to current law to reflect the expansion of assistance programs to Yugoslavia and other countries in Eastern Europe in addition to Poland and Hungary.

By Mr. GARN:

S. 2096. A bill for the relief of John Gabriel Robledo-Gomez Dunn; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF JOHN GABRIEL ROBLEDO-GOMEZ DUNN

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill for the relief of John Gabriel Robledo-Gomez Dunn of Brigham City, UT.

John was born in Perera, Colombia, to very meager circumstances. As an infant this young man was deserted by his natural father. Although his mother worked very hard to support her family she could not provide for them even the most basic essentials. In the summer of 1987 the Dunn family of Brigham City, UT, heard of John's situation and decided to see what they could do to help. With their sponsorship he was able to come to Utah to study at Box Elder High School on a student visa. He arrived malnourished and in need of a great deal of medical and dental care. Through his diligent efforts, he has learned English and progressed very well in school. He graduated from high school last May and is continuing his education at Weber State College in Ogden, UT.

Once John arrived in Utah the Dunns realized that they wanted him to become a part of their family permanently. This was not a new experience for them. Richard and Deon have eight children. Four of the children were born to them and the others have joined their family under a variety of special circumstances. This was the first time, however, that they had adopted a child from overseas. They proceeded with the adoption. When it became final in November 1987 they were excited and wanted to be certain that John received all the opportunities they had provided their other children. They realized they needed to change John's immigration status since he was now the son of U.S. citizens. Only then did they become aware of the fact that the immigration law does not recognize the adoption of a child over the age of 16 as conveying immediate relative status to the child. John could not remain in the United States unless he was a student.

The family was very upset and concerned. John was a part of their family and now there was a possibility he could not stay with them. Each family member has expressed to me how much they love and depend on John as a part of their family. John has expressed his desire to remain with his new brothers and sisters. He is pleased to have a new mom because now he has two. But perhaps his most telling comment was how much he was pleased to finally have a father. He allowed as how it wasn't always easy because it was a new experience for him but was grateful for his dad and the lessons he was learning from him.

This young man has made a profound impact on his family. If the letters and phone calls that have come to my office are any indication of his impact on the community, his school, and his church then there is no question that John Robledo Dunn has made a very positive mark on all who meet him. Two of his goals in life are to serve his church and to get a college education. He has started on his educational goal. He has recently been called to serve his church for the next 2 years. He has enthusiastically accepted. Passage of this bill would allow the Dunn family to remain complete and John to pursue his goals. I am confident he will be a valued addition to Brigham City, to Utah, and to the United States.●

By Mr. PELL:

S. 2097. A bill to promote and encourage alternative nondefense uses of defense facilities, to provide assistance for the retraining of unemployed defense workers, to provide continuity of certain benefits for defense workers whose employment is terminated, and to provide adjustment assistance to communities adversely affected by the termination or curtailment of defense contracts or the closure or realignment of military installations; to the Committee on Armed Services.

DEFENSE DIVERSIFICATION AND ADJUSTMENT ACT

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am introducing today the Defense Diversification and Adjustment Act, a bill designed to give some measure of support to those who may be adversely effected by reductions in defense spending, and to assure the continuity of our defense industrial base.

This bill might best be described as a standby program for adjustment to a less contentious world. Its purpose is to preserve the vitality of our defense industries by encouraging their adaptation to commercial activities, and in the process, to maintain the well being of the workers and the communities on which those industries depend.

It would extend the same range of benefits to communities and workers who are dependent on the economic activity generated by military installations.

Mr. President, we have only just begun to discuss the probable impact of defense cuts now being contemplated in the wake of the recent and continuing momentous changes in international affairs. But every State in the Union is bound to be effected to some degree sooner or later. Even the preliminary cuts envisioned in the President's budget involve the termination of 20 major weapons programs at a projected savings of $28.2 billion between now and 1994.

And that is surely only a beginning, assuming continuation of the current trend of world affairs.

In my own State of Rhode Island, where the Electric Boat Division of General Dynamics, builder of nuclear submarines, is the largest private sector employer, we must consider future contingencies notwithstanding the fact that undersea warfare is probably the last area where the defense budget should be cut. We are currently awaiting two studies mandated by the fiscal year 1990 Defense Authorization Act, one on the feasibility of reducing the rate of Trident submarine production, and the other on the implications of the START treaty for the size of the Trident fleet.

The underlying rationale of the bill I am introducing today is that the Federal Government has a compelling obligation to mitigate economic distress and provide adjustment assistance when such massive shifts in Government spending occur as a result of factors which are far beyond the control of those who are most affected.

The main features of the bill are:

First. A program of planning grants for community adjustment for local jurisdictions deemed likely to be adversely effected by curtailment or termination of a contract or realignment of a military installation. Grants are limited to $250,000 and must cover specified matters, such as alternate uses of existing defense plants, maximized use of the existing workforce, and retraining of workers.

Second. Adjustment assistance for workers laid off due to curtailment or termination of a contract, or realignment of a military installation. Benefits include maintenance of health insurance for two years, retraining and reimbursement for relocation charges.

Third. Corporate planning for alternate use of defense plants. This provision simply requires defense contractors to set aside a modest one-tenth of 1 percent of their gross defense revenues up to a ceiling of $500,000 to establish a planning office for corporate diversification. The bill specifies that the office should consider such factors as alternate commercial uses of the facility and the prospects for retraining, and, if necessary retraining, the labor force. This requirement would not apply to companies with less than $15 million in annual defense revenues. And the bill includes an incentive provision which would reward contractors who successfully comply by exempting them from other financing provisions of the bill.

Fourth. A partial self-financing mechanism through the establishment of a defense adjustment trust fund. The fund would be sustained in part by deposits from two sources: First, a Treasury deposit of 10 percent of the projected peace dividend savings resulting from the cancellation or termination of defense contracts or closure of bases in each fiscal year; and second, a deposit of 1 percent of each defense contractor's gross revenues from new contracts, subject to waiver in whole or in part if the contractor has demonstrated a successful record of having diversified under a prior contract termination, with resulting stability of employment. The bill authorizes appropriated funds as may be necessary to make up the difference between the costs and the contributions.

I have no illusions about the fact that some of these provisions will not be embraced by defense contractors, some of whom have been portrayed in the public press as being opposed to the idea of diversification. But the bill I am proposing seeks to address larger questions of public interest, not the least of which is the preservation of the defense industrial base of which these very contractors are a vital part.

Finally, Mr. President, I would note that the legislation I am introducing derives in part from bills introduced in the House by Congressmen GEJDENSON and WEISS, and I commend them both for their substantial contributions to this important matter. One notable area in which our approaches differ is in administration of the bill; I have opted for a minimum of new mechanisms, utilizing instead existing channels of government to the maximum extent.

The important underlying theme which I believe we are all seeking to address is the need for creative responses to a prospective economic vacuum, which is not addressed could vitiate many of the benefits we could derive from some of the most positive historical developments in the 20th century. I hope the bill I am offering today will be a constructive contribution to that process.●

By Mr. BENTSEN (for himself, Mr. DOLE, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. RIEGLE, and Mr. PRYOR):

S. 2098. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to provide Medicare coverage of erythropoietin when self-administered; to the Committee on Finance.

HOME DIALYSIS EQUITY ACT

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I am introducing today, with Senator DOLE, and Senators ROCKEFELLER, DURENBERGER, MOYNIHAN, REIGLE, and PRYOR, the Home Dialysis Equity Act of 1990, which would make an important new medical treatment for anemia available to beneficiaries of the Medicare End Stage Renal Disease [ESRD] Program, without regard to whether they receive dialysis services at home or in a facility.

With this treatment, the patient receives periodic doses of recombinant human erythropoietin, known commercially as Epogen, which is biologically indistinguishable from the substance produced by the body to stimulate the growth of red blood cells.

Because this substance is normally produced by the kidneys, individuals with chronic renal failure frequently lack a sufficient natural supply of it. This deficiency leads to anemia, which may impair the patient's ability to lead a productive life.

The Food and Drug Administration has already approved the use of Epogen for the treament of anemia in patients with chronic renal failure, and the Medicare Program covers this treatment when it is administered by a health care professional in a hospital, a doctor's office, or a dialysis facility.

As a general rule, however, Medicare does not pay for a drug or biological that is furnished "incident to" a physician's services if the substance is self-administered.

Because of this limitation in current law, many patients who receive dialysis services at home must, at the present time, travel to a doctor's office or a dialysis facility an average of three times a week to receive Epogen. In many cases, the destination is distant, and the patient is weak.

This frustrates two of the primary objectives of the ESRD Program: permitting patients to dialyze at home and promoting lives that are as normal and productive as possible.

Although anema may also be treated through blood transfusions or the use of androgenic steroids, both of these treatments pose risks that Epogen does not.

Transfusions may expose a patient to infectious agents in the blood supply; they may stimulate the development of antibodies that preclude a kidney transplant; and repeated transfusions may lead to iron overload. Androgens have some of the same adverse effect as anabolic steroids.

These complications exact a toll from the patient and impose additional costs on the Medicare Program as well.

The bill I am introducing today would not eliminate the general restriction on self-administered drugs under Medicare law. It would simply create a special exception for one form of treatment. This has been done once before in the case of blood clotting factors for hemophilia patients.

The legislation would also minimize the effects of a potentially costly anomaly in current Medicare reimbursement policy regarding Epogen.

While Medicare has established a flat $40 payment per Epogen treatment in a dialysis facility, it will pay the reasonable charge for the drug when it is administered in a physician's office. At current market prices, the reasonable charge for an average dosage of Epogen would be approximately $60.

The bill would permit dialysis facilities furnishing home dialysis services to their patients—and other providers of home dialysis supplies—to supply Epogen to these patients as well, receiving the same $40 payment as for patients receiving Epogen at a facility. This, in turn, would reduce the number of patients who would have to go to a physician's office to receive treatment.

Mr. President, the available evidence suggests that Epogen treatments can be integrated into the home dialysis process safely and with relative ease.

Legislation to permit self-administration at home is supported by the Renal Physicians Association and the American Nephrology Nurses Association. Both of these groups represent health care professionals who are actively involved in the delivery of dialysis services.

Likewise, the experience of the Northwest Kidney Center in Seattle suggest that administering the drug at home is no less safe than in a dialysis facility, as does that of four physicians reporting in the September 2, 1989, issue of the Lancet, the British health journal.

Finally, under current regulations, a dialysis facility is responsible for overseeing the treatments received by its home dialysis patients. The bill would not change that: a facility furnishing Epogen for self-administration at home would be required to monitor the administration and effects of the drug.

In fact, the bill would authorize Medicare to establish any additional methods and standards that are necessary to ensure its safe and effective use.

Mr. President, Congress was unable to complete action on a number of worthy proposals before the close of the last session. This provision, which appeared originally in the reconciliation bill approved and reported by the Finance Committee, is a deletion that I personally regret. It is my hope that Congress will consider and adopt this measure during its upcoming deliberations.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2098

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Home Dialysis Equity Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. COVERAGE OF ERYTHROPOIETIN WHEN SELF-ADMINISTERED.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1861(s)(2) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395x(s)(2)) is amended—

(1) by striking "and" at the end of subparagraph (L);

(2) by adding "and" at the end of subparagraph (M); and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(N) erythropoietin, for home dialysis patients competent to use such drug without medical or other supervision, and items related to the administration of such drug, subject to methods and standards established by the Secretary by regulation for the safe and effective use of such drug;".

(b) CONFORMING CHANGES.—(1) Section 1881(b)(1) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 1395rr(b)(1)) is amended—

(A) by striking "and (B)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(B)", and

(B) by inserting ", and (C) payments to a supplier of home dialysis supplies and equipment that is not a provider of services, a renal dialysis facility, or a physician for the item described in section 1861(s)(2)(N)" after "equipment".

(2) Section 1881(b)(2)(A) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 1395rr(b)(2)(A)) is amended—

(A) by inserting "(i)" after "(2)(A)", and

(B) by adding at the end the following:

"(ii) Notwithstanding the methodology authorized through (and established pursuant to) clause (i), the amount payable to a supplier of home dialysis supplies and equipment that is not a provider of services, a renal dialysis facility, or a physician for the item described in section 1861(s)(2)(N) shall be determined in the same manner as payment for such item is determined when furnished by a renal dialysis facility.".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) shall apply to items and services furnished on or after October 1, 1990.●

By Mr. GORTON (for himself and Mr. ADAMS):

S. 2099. A bill to provide duty-free entry for the personal effects and equipment of participants and officials involved in the 1990 Goodwill Games to be held in Washington State; to the Committee on Finance.

DUTY-FREE ENTRY FOR EQUIPMENT OF PARTICIPANTS IN THE 1990 GOODWILL GAMES

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I speak today to herald the 1990 Goodwill Games, an event which will turn the world's attention to my home State of Washington.

The Goodwill Games will be the largest athletic and cultural event planned in North America for the next several years. The 1990 games, like the games of 1986 before them, aim to foster international goodwill through athletic competition—2,500 athletes from more than 50 countries will compete in 21 sports at sites in Spokane, Tacoma, Tri-Cities, Redmond, Federal Way, Enumclaw, and Seattle.

In addition to the world-class athletic and cultural performances, the games will include conferences on topics of international concern and a major trade exhibition to promote U.S. exports.

We in Washington State believe the relationships initiated at the Goodwill Games will constitute an important step to future international relationships. We intend to create a legacy from these games. By uniting the world's best—in both athletics and international trade—the Goodwill Games will offer Washington State, and the Nation as a whole, the chance not only to build on existing relationships, but to initiate new ones that will last into the next century.

Mr. President, Washington State has for years been an important gateway to the United States. That gateway will soon experience an influx of foreign friends, visitors and competitors unparalleled in the history of our State. It is with this influx in mind that I join my colleague from Washington State in introducing a bill which will make the arrival of those friends a pleasant experience.

Today we Washingtonians have joined in introducing a bill which will welcome the world's best to our State. That bill will provide duty-free entry for the personal effects and equipment of participants and officials involved in the 1990 Goodwill Games.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues' support and timely passage of this bill which truly represents the goodwill of the United States toward the community of nations.

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. SPECTER, and Mr. JEFFORDS):

S. 2100. A bill to increase the rates of compensation for veterans with service-connected disabilities and the rates of dependency and indemnity compensation for the survivors of certain disabled veterans' compensation, health-care, insurance, and housing programs, and to provide for transitional group residences for veterans recovering from substance-abuse disabilities; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

VETERANS COMPENSATION COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1990

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as the Chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I am today introducing S. 2100, the proposed Veterans Compensation Cost-of-Living Adjustment Act of 1990. I am delighted to note that I am joined by a bipartisan group of Veterans' Affairs Committee members, including the committee's ranking minority member, Mr. MURKOWSKI, and Senators MATSUNAGA, DECONCINI, MITCHELL, ROCKEFELLER, GRAHAM, THURMOND, SPECTER, and JEFFORDS.

Mr. President, this bill has as its basic purposes the provision of cost-of-living increases in certain benefits paid to veterans with service-connected disabilities, and to certain dependents and survivors of such veterans, and the continued maintenance and improvement of the Department of Veterans Affairs programs of benefits and services for our Nation's veterans and their dependents. In view of my very strong concern that we must continue our efforts to reduce the Federal deficit, this legislation seeks to find ways to improve VA programs without incurring any significant new costs.

SUMMARY OF PROVISIONS

Mr. President, this bill contains free-standing provisions and amendments to title 38, United States Code, that would:

First, require the Secretary of Veterans Affairs to increase, effective December 1, 1990, the rates and limitations for compensation paid to veterans with service-connected disabilities and dependency and indemnity compensation [DIC] paid to certain service-connected-disabled veterans' survivors by the same percentage as the increase that will be made, effective on that same date, in the benefits paid to Social Security recipients and VA pension beneficiaries.

Second, expand the presumption of service connection for radiation-exposed veterans to cover reservists who were serving on active duty for training or inactive duty for training during on-site participation in a nuclear weapons test.

Third, clarify that VA has authority to apply only to new claims a change in evaluation methods or standards under the VA disability rating schedule.

Fourth, extend the authorization, through September 30, 1991, for VA's mobile health clinic pilot program, and provide that all funds appropriated for this program remain available until expended.

Fifth, clarify an existing ambiguity in law and authorize VA to provide prosthetic appliances to veterans with non-service-connected disabilities if the provision of such appliances would obviate the need for hospitalization.

Sixth, increase from $600 to $1,200 the ceiling for a one-time grant for structural home modifications as part of home health services for a seriously disabled non-service-connected disabled veteran and from $2,500 to $5,000 the ceiling for a one-time grant for structural home modifications as part of home health services for a seriously disabled service-connected disabled veteran.

Seventh, authorize VA to provide supplemental coverage—at standard premiums—of up to $10,000 in service disabled life insurance to certain veterans who are eligible for a waiver of premiums due to total disability.

Eighth, increase from $40,000 to $90,000 the maximum amount of coverage under veterans' mortgage life insurance policies.

Ninth, extend by 2 years—until December 31, 1993—the December 31, 1991, time limit on the counting of Vietnam-era veterans in the statutory funding formula for disabled veterans outreach program specialists.

Tenth, extend for 3 years VA's authority to sell acquired properties to public or nonprofit entities for use as shelters primarily for homeless veterans and their families and extend that authority to authorize the sale of acquired properties to public or nonprofit entities for use as transitional housing for veterans who are being furnished care and services under chapter 17 of title 38, United States Code, by or on behalf of the Secretary for alcohol or drug disabilities or mental illness disabilities.

Eleventh, establish a revolving fund—by transfer of $100,000 initially from the canteen service revolving fund—from which loans may be made to assist in the establishment of transitional residences for veterans who are being furnished services by the Secretary, directly or by contract, for alcohol or drug dependence or abuse disabilities, or who have recently been furnished such services by the Secretary.

Twelfth, make permanent the requirement for VA to notify and counsel veterans about the impact of, and alternatives to, foreclosure when the veteran defaults on a VA-guaranteed home loan.

Thirteenth, make various technical amendments to title 38, United States Code, primarily to correct errors or omissions in Public Law 101-237, the Veterans' Benefits Amendments of 1989, enacted December 18, 1989.

COMPENSATION/DIC COLA

Mr. President, section 101 of the bill would require the Secretary of Veterans Affairs to provide an fiscal year 1991 cost-of-living adjustment [COLA] in the rates of compensation paid to veterans with service-connected disabilities as well as in the rates of dependency and indemnity compensation [DIC] paid to the survivors of those who have died as a result of service-connected disabilities and to the survivors of certain veterans who died while totally and permanently disabled as the result of service-connected disabilities. The COLA would be at the same percentage as that which will be provided to Social Security recipients and VA pension beneficiaries and be effective on the same date, December 1, 1990. These increased benefits would actually appear in veterans' checks beginning on January 1, 1991. At this time, the Congressional Budget Office estimates that the COLA will be 4.1 percent; however, this is a preliminary estimate, and I expect it to be revised prior to enactment, as has occurred in previous years. The administration currently estimates that the increase will be 3.9 percent. The Congressional Budget Office also estimates that the 4.1-percent COLA would cost $397 million in budget authority and $358 in outlays.

Mr. President, we have a fundamental obligation to address the needs of these 2.2 million service-disabled veterans and 360,682 survivors. The needs and concerns of these veterans and survivors are uniquely related to service to our Nation, and addressing these needs continues to be my number one priority in veterans' affairs. In my 21 years in the Senate, I consistently have led the effort to provide COLA's in compensation and DIC benefits in order to ensure that the value of these top-priority service-connected VA benefits is not eroded by inflation. Most recently, Congress enacted Public Law 101-237 on December 18, 1990, providing a 4.7-percent COLA in these same benefits for the current fiscal year, effective last December 1.

I am proud that Congress has provided for such annual increases in these rates every fiscal year since 1976 and urge my colleagues to continue their support for annual COLA increases for these crucial veterans' benefits.

EXTENSION OF PRESUMPTION OF SERVICE CONNECTION FOR CERTAIN RADIATION-EXPOSED VETERANS

Mr. President, section 102 would expand the presumption of service connection for certain diseases, accorded in section 312(c) of title 38, for certain radiation-exposed veterans to cover veterans who were serving on active duty for training or inactive duty for training during on-site participation in a nuclear weapons test.

In the Radiation-Exposed Veterans Compensation Act of 1988, Public Law 100-321, Congress established presumptions of service connection for 13 cancers in the cases of veterans who, during their service, participated in specified radiation-risk activities, including onsite participation in an atmospheric nuclear weapons test. As the principal Senate author of that measure, I am certain that Congress never intended to exclude from eligibility under that Act those who were serving on active or inactive duty for training when they participated onsite in a radiation-risk activity. However, despite the fact that a reservist who incurs a disability in the line of duty during such training is considered to be a veteran for title 38 purposes and is entitled to VA compensation for a disability rated at 10 percent or more, VA's general counsel has advised the Chief Benefits Director that the wording of the provision enacted in Public Law 100-321 is such that it does not cover reservists who were present at a weapons test. Our section would clarify that this is not the case.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the general counsel's opinion be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VETERANS ADMINISTRATION,
August 29, 1989.

From: Acting General Counsel (02).
Subject: Applicability of radiation-risk presumption to personnel on active duty for training.
To: Chief Benefits Director (20).

QUESTION PRESENTED

Do the provisions of 38 U.S.C. § 312(c), granting presumptive service connection to radiation-exposed veterans for listed diseases, apply to individuals who were on active duty for training during onsite nuclear test participation?

COMMENTS

1. The inquiry before us arose as part of an administrative review in the above-referenced case, in response to a reopened claim by the veteran's surviving spouse for Dependency and Indemnity Compensation (DIC) based on an assertion that in-service radiation exposure caused the veteran's fatal leukemia.

2. The record shows that the veteran served on active duty from June 1955 to September 1956. Also, while serving with the Tennessee Air National Guard, the veteran had a 20-day period of active duty for training which commenced on July 23, 1957. The veteran's flying activities on August 7, 1957, in connection with such duty, were determined to be consistent with participation in Shot Stokes of Operation PLUMBBOB, conducted on that date. The veteran died in August 1978 due to chronic myelocytic leukemia.

3. With the passage of Public Law No. 100-321, 102 Stat. 485, the "Radiation-Exposed Veterans Compensation Act of 1988," a new "presumption" was created under section 312 of title 38, United States Code. It provides that certain specified diseases, which become manifest in a radiation-exposed veteran to a degree of 10 percent or more within a specified presumptive period, "shall be considered to have been incurred in or aggravated during the veteran's service on active duty" (emphasis added) for purposes of VA compensation. The definition of "radiation-exposed veteran," codified at 38 U.S.C. § 312(c)(4)(A), is "a veteran who, while serving on active duty, participated in a radiation-risk activity." (Emphasis added).

4. The term "active duty" is defined for the purposes of title 38, United States Code, at section 101(21), in pertinent part, as including "full-time duty in the Armed Forces, other than active duty for training."

5. Our review of the pertinent legislative history concerning Public Law No. 100-321 discloses no discussion on this point. However, it is clear from the language of 38 U.S.C. § 312(c) that only individuals participating in a radiation-risk activity while on active duty are eligible for presumptive service connection under its provisions. The statutory language being unambiguous, we conclude that the plain language of the statute governs its consrtruction in this case. See 2A N.J. Singer, Sutherland Statutory Construction § 46.01 (4th ed. 1984).

HELD

In order to qualify for presumptive service connection under the provisions of 38 U.S.C. § 312(c), a radiation-exposed veteran must have been serving on "active duty" at the time of participation in a radiation-risk activity. Therefore, those onsite nuclear test participants who were on active duty for training at the time of such participation are not entitled to the presumption created by that subsection.

DONALD L. IVERS.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, although the general counsel's opinion is technically sound, the result—excluding from the benefit of the presumptions members of the Selected Reserve who were present at the test—is clearly inequitable.

Section 102 of the bill would correct this inequity by including active and inactive duty for training within the definition of active duty for purposes of the presumptions. The expanded definition of active duty would not apply to any other provision of title 38.

The Defense Nuclear Agency, which is responsible for keeping records of all personnel who participated in the U.S. atmospheric nuclear testing program, estimates that the total, combined number of onsite participants who were serving on active or inactive duty for training or as National Guard civilian technicians is approximately 2,000 people. Thus, the number who would be covered by our proposal is less than 2,000, because section 102 would not include any civilians. An August 1989 cost estimate by the Congressional Budget Office stated that, even with the civilians included, the cost of expanded eligibility would be less than $1 million.

Most importantly, Mr. President, these individuals and their surviving families deserve these benefits. All of the reasons Congress had for enacting the original measure apply with equal force to these service members who are exposed to radiation from onsite participation in the Government's atmospheric nuclear test program: The fact that the Government deliberately chose to expose the service personnel; the Government's failure to warn participants of suspected health risks from the exposure; the Government's failure to provide adequate protection to the participants; the Government's failure to follow-up systematically on the health of the participants; and the almost impossible burden a veteran faces in trying to prove that the disability bears some relationship to in-service experience—when these cancers often take decades to appear.

AUTHORITY FOR PROSPECTIVE-ONLY READJUSTMENTS OF DISABILITY RATING SCHEDULE

Mr. President, section 103 of the bill would clarify that VA has authority to apply to only new claims a change in evaluation methods or standards under the VA disability rating schedule.

Under section 355 of title 38, the Secretary is required to "adopt and apply a schedule of ratings of reductions in earning capacity" from specific disabilities. The schedule must provide 10 grades of disability, from 10 percent to 100 percent, on which the payment of disability compensation is to be based. The schedule of ratings, which appears in part 4 of title 38 of the Code of Federal Regulations, provides very specific, detailed rules for evaluating disabilities and assigning percentage ratings. Section 355 requires that the Secretary "from time to time readjust this schedule of ratings in accordance with experience."

This provision would allow VA to implement such changes without having to make a reduction in the rate that veterans are then receiving. Under the current system, a veteran currently receiving compensation faces a possible reduction in his or her rating whenever VA changes its methods or standards for evaluating the veteran's particular disability or disabilities. Unfortunately, this possibility may discourage disabled veterans from seeking reevaluation even when they actually should be receiving a higher rating as a result of the change. It also may discourage VA from making certain changes likely to result in reductions for a large number of current recipients.

For example, a recent change in the technique for evaluating hearing loss theoretically could result in either reducing or increasing the rating for a particular veteran. In order to avoid discouraging veterans from seeking reevaluations, VA's benefits manual (M21-1, paragraph 50.13b) instructs claims adjudicators to ignore rating reductions that resulted from changed standards or methods of evaluation. However, VA's general counsel issued an opinion (Op. G.C. 11-88), dated October 27, 1988, that VA lacks the authority "to protect ratings assigned under superceded criteria." Whether or not this opinion is correct that VA does not have administrative authority to make prospective-only adjustments in the rating schedule, the general counsel's opinion precludes such action unless explicit statutory authority is provided.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the October 27, 1988, opinion of the general counsel be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being on objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL COUNSEL'S OPINION, VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Subject: Protection of disability ratings assigned under superceded criteria.

Questions presented:

a. Whether it is legally appropriate to revise the rating schedule as it applies to evaluating defective hearing while at the same time requiring by memorandum that the change in rating methods results in no decrease in any evaluation assigned under the old criteria, regardless of the results of current audiometric testing under the new criteria.

b. Whether the Board of Veterans Appeals must maintain the prior rating levels under the old criteria if the audiometric findings under the new criteria would result in a reduction or discontinuance of compensation benefits.

Comments: The questions presented arose from the following situation. Effective December 18, 1987, the VA adopted new regulations for testing and evaluating the degree of disability attributable to hearing loss. 52 Fed. Reg. 17607-17611 (1987). The revised regulations were implemented to provide more accurate measurement of hearing impairment and, by providing for a 100% rating in the most severe cases, to recognize that profound deafness may be totally disabling. The new schedule requires evaluation of hearing loss based on a combination of puretone averages and speech discrimination, as well as incremental ratings from 0% to 100%. It was prompted, in part, by a congressional request that the VA reassess the validity of its testing and evaluation methods, which had remained unchanged for nearly 30 years. After study, the VA found that advances in hearing-loss testing and improvement in hearing aid devices justified such revisions.

By memorandum dated April 6, 1988, the Chief Benefits Director instructed VA field stations that hearing disability ratings properly in effect on the day preceding the effective date of the change in testing methods are not to be reduced or discontinued in the absence of a finding of change in physical condition, citing paragraph 50.13b of M21-1 as authority. Paragraph 50.13b provides that, if a decrease in evaluation is due to changed criteria or testing methods rather than a change in disability, adjudicators should apply the old criteria and make no reduction. In effect, the memorandum would grandfather in and protect the ratings of those veterans whose ratings were already in effect at the time of adoption of the new criteria.

With respect to the first question, grandfather or savings provisions are a generally acceptable means of avoiding hardship when new laws are implemented. They not only "protect against loss to those who may have relied upon prior laws or regulations [but] they serve a rational and useful purpose in encouraging orderly change in government to meet new and desirable ends. . . ." Poynter v. Drevdahl, 359 F. Supp. 1137, 1143 (W.D. Mich. 1972).

The grandfather provision at issue would, in effect, establish dual rating schedules for evaluating hearing impairment. Those individuals whose evaluations would be reduced solely by reason of the new rating methods would be maintained under the former, superceded criteria, presumably to avoid financial hardship. Although the purpose of the provision is laudable, we believe it contravenes the Administrator's statutory authority.

Congress has not specifically authorized the Administrator to institute multiple rating schemes. To the contrary, 38 U.S.C. § 355 directs, in part: "The Administrator shall adopt and apply a schedule of ratings of reduction in earning capacity from specific injuries or combinations of injuries." (Emphasis supplied.) Section 355 literally provides for no more than one rating schedule.

Congressional intent to bar the use of multiple rating schedules is also clear from the legislative history of earlier statutes. For example, when the 1945 Schedule for Rating Disabilities was adopted to replace the 1925 Schedule under Public Law 458 (1946), House Report No. 1800 noted:

"As set forth in more detail in the report of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, this bill will accomplish a threefold purpose: (1) Provide uniform effective dates for increased disability pension or compensation awards resulting from the changes in ratings provided in the revised Schedule for Rating Disabilities, 1945; (2) permit application of the revised schedule in pending and certain other initial claims over periods prior to April 1, 1946, which will remove the necessity for use of two rating schedules, and facilitate the training of rating officers; and (3) as to World War I veterans, eliminate the necessity for applying as many as three different schedules, and protect existing ratings and awards under the 1925 schedule. Under the bill the need of more than one schedule in practically all future ratings will be eliminated." H.R. Rep. No. 1800, 79th Cong., 2d Sess. 2 (1946).

Where savings clauses have been adopted by the VA to protect individuals in receipt of benefits under former criteria, such clauses have been explicitly authorized by statute. For example, Public Law 458 (1946) provided in part:

"Sec. 2. Nothing in the revised Schedule for Rating Disabilities, 1945, shall be construed as requiring any reduction or discontinuance of compensation in cases rated and awarded under the Schedule of Disability Ratings, 1925, but on and after the first day of April 1946, except as to statutory awards and ratings provided under the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, as restored with limitation by the Act of March 28, 1934, Public Law 141, Seventy-third Congress, as amended, awards in all cases shall be based upon the degree of disability determined in accordance with the revised schedule, 1945."

Similarly, in repealing the law authorizing graduated ratings for inactive tuberculosis, Congress specifically provided in Public Law 90-493 (1968) for protection of ratings in effect prior to adoption of the statute. Consequently, the former schedule of ratings was preserved for application in claims involving protected ratings.

We note in passing that VA statutory authority contemplates that the Schedule for Rating Disabilities will be periodically revised and improved. Section 355 of title 38, United States Code, provides in part:

"The Administrator shall from time to time readjust this schedule of ratings in accordance with experience."

Also of some pertinence is 38 U.S.C. § 110, which implies that ratings are subject to change, unless in effect for twenty years or more.

Adoption of new rating criteria does not ipso facto abrogate the existing disability evaluations of veterans, but it does require the Agency, when subsequently evaluating veterans' claims, to apply the revised criteria. 6 Comp. Gen. 232 (1926). Moreover, to mitigate the harshness of any reduction or discontinuance of benefits upon re-rating, the VA must provide due notice and a grace period. Section 3012(b)(6) of title 38, United States Code, provides that 60 days notice will be given to a veteran entitled to disability compensation prior to reduction or discontinuance of benefits by reason of a change in law or administrative issue. The legislative history of the statute suggests that the grace period was intended to provide a recipient with a reasonable time to adjust to diminished benefits occasioned by a change in law or administrative issue or the interpretation of law or administrative issue. S. Rep. No. 2042, 87th Cong., 2d Sess. 8, reprinted in 1962 U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. New 3260, 3266-67.

In our view, the clear implication of these statutes is that, upon adoption of new rating standards, individual claims, including claims for increased ratings filed by veterans evaluated under prior methods, are subject to the new standards. The provision of section 3012 apply to any reduction in benefits called for by the re-rating.

Based upon the foregoing, our response to the second question is that the April 6 memorandum and paragraph 50.13b of M21-1 are not binding upon the Board of Veterans Appeals. As noted above, there is no statutory authority for a grand-father or savings clause designed to protect ratings assigned under superceded criteria. In our opinion, such a provision must be authorized by statute rather than instituted by administrative issuance. Moreover, under 38 U.S.C. § 4004(c), the Board is only bound by regulations duly promulgated, instructions of the Administrator, and precedent opinions of the General Counsel. See Carter v. Cleland, 643 F.2d 1 (D.C. Cir. 1980). Manual provisions and the like offer guidance but are not binding upon the Board. Digested Opinion, 10-17-86 (14-9c Effective Date-Pension).

Held: The manual provision that purports to protect disability evaluations assigned under superceded regulations on defective hearing is neither legally appropriate nor binding upon the Board of Veterans Appeals.

DONALD L. IVERS,
General Counsel.

Note: This opinion was released in the form of a memorandum to the Chairman of the Board of Veterans Appeals on October 27, 1988.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, hearing loss is an excellent example of when VA should exercise the authority to apply a technological change in the rating schedule only prospectively. It often is a degenerative disease that inevitably leads to increased disability. Most veterans with hearing loss should seek periodic reevaluation, as their condition worsens, in order to ensure they are receiving the full compensation to which they are entitled. Yet some veterans may avoid going in for reevaluation because they fear receiving a reduced rating under the new evaluation method.

MOBILE HEALTH-CARE CLINICS

Mr. President, the committee has long been interested in and concerned about access to health care for veterans in rural areas. The committee held a hearing in July 1983 which addressed this issue and, in 1987, the Senate Appropriations Committee directed VA to establish a pilot program to test ways to furnish care in rural areas. In response, VA established two medical offices, one in northern New Mexico and one in Redding, CA. Most recently, our committee, on November 15, 1989, held another hearing regarding health care for veterans in rural areas. At that hearing, as in the 1983 hearing, the Committee heard testimony about problems associated with travel distances, adverse weather conditions, and the capacity of health-care facilities to meet veterans' needs.

Section 113 of Public Law 100-322, enacted on May 20, 1988, required VA to implement a 2-year pilot program of mobile health-care clinics. Under this program, VA was to establish graphically-dispersed projects using appropriately equipped mobile vans to furnish health care to veterans in rural areas at least 100 miles from the nearest VA health-care facility. In addition, VA was directed to submit reports to the House and Senate Veterans' Affairs Committees on VA's experience during the program and, at its conclusion, reports containing information and detailed breakdowns on services provided, costs, and client characteristics, plus an evaluation of the program.

Unfortunately, there were no funds appropriated for this program in fiscal year 1989. In fiscal year 1990, however, $3 million was appropriated for the rural mobile health clinics, and VA is now moving toward their establishment.

In order to complete the 2-year period that was originally intended for the pilot program, section 201 of our bill would extend the authorization for another year. In addition, so that all funds appropriated for this pilot program can be used for that purpose, the authorizing legislation would be amended to provide that all funds appropriated for the program will remain available until expended. Because the reports on this pilot program are due at specific points following the initiation of the program, it is not necessary to modify their submission dates.

AUTHORITY TO FURNISH WHEELCHAIRS, PROSTHETIC DEVICES, AND SIMILAR APPLIANCES TO AMBULATORY-CARE PATIENTS

Mr. President, section 202 of our bill would amend title 38 to give VA the authority to provide veterans who are receiving non-service-connected outpatient care with wheelchairs, prosthetic devices, special clothing for users of prostheses, and certain other supplies and services in certain cases. Specifically, this provision would authorize the furnishing of such items as part of outpatient care necessary either to obviate the need for hospital admission or in preparation for hospital admission.

Legislation which I authored in 1973 and which was enacted in Public Law 93-82 authorizes VA to provide to veterans such outpatient care for non-service-connected disabilities as is necessary to obviate the need for hospital admission—known as obviate care. At the time that authority was established, an existing limitation in law which precluded VA from providing wheelchairs, prosthetic devices, and similar appliances as part of pre-hospital care to non-service-connected veterans was extended to cover these veterans when they are receiving obviate care. No such restriction applies to the care and treatment of veterans while they are receiving VA hospital care.

This limitation remains in the law today and has the effect of generally prohibiting VA from furnishing to non-service-disabled veterans prosthetic devices and various other medical items which could help prevent the need for future hospital care. For example, under current law, a veteran who has non-service-connected disabilities cannot be furnished a corrective shoe for a foot ulcer even though the lack of the shoe could lead to later hospital care and possible amputation. Likewise the restriction on non-service-connected care prevents VA from providing an amputee who has a stump abrasion a liner or simple repairs to his artificial limb to prevent further breakdown and subsequent hospitalization, and even a paralyzed, wheelchair-bound veteran prone to bed sores cannot be provided a cushion to relieve pressure areas.

Our proposal would not authorize VA to provide prosthetic devices and other medical supplies to all veterans. Rather, it would, upon a determination by the Secretary that the particular items are "reasonable and necessary", permit VA to provide them in preparation for, or to obviate the need of, hospitalization. Some of the most commonly requested prosthetic items, such as eyeglasses and hearing aids, would, however, not be authorized to be furnished under this new authority because they would not be "reasonably necessary * * * to obviate the need of hospital admission".

It is my expectation that this proposal would result in only a modest increase in costs for VA's Prosthetic Service, which I believe would be offset to a substantial extent by improvements in outpatient care resulting in reduced hospital admissions for conditions that would otherwise have gone untreated.

Mr. President, this proposed expansion of VA authority to furnish certain items to ambulatory patients is part of my continuing commitment to make the VA health-care system as responsive as possible to the needs of the veterans it serves. Clearly, the very strong trend in modern health care is toward furnishing care on an outpatient, rather than an inpatient basis, whenever possible. I believe this is a very positive, medically sound, and cost-effective development, and I am pleased VA care is moving in this direction. Expanding VA's authority to furnish non-service connected veterans with outpatient treatment to obviate the need for hospital admission so that it includes the authority to furnish certain necessary medical and prosthetic devices would enhance VA's ability to furnish more efficient, up-to-date care.

HOME HEALTH SERVICES

Under section 617(a) of title 38, VA is authorized to furnish, as part of medical services, "such home health services as the Secretary determines to be necessary or appropriate for the effective and economical treatment of a veteran". Under this home health services program, VA is authorized to pay, using one-time grants, for improvements to the home of certain very seriously disabled veterans so that these veterans can be treated at home. Examples of such home improvements are the construction of temporary ramps to permit access to the house by wheelchair, the installation of electrical adjustments to permit the operation of dialysis equipment, and the installation of air-conditioning equipment or winterizing insulation.

This authority was established in 1973 by Public Law 93-82 but was amended in 1976 in Public Law 94-581 to address two concerns. First, the kind of projects covered by the home health services authority was clarified so as to include permanent improvements which provide access to the home or bathroom such as wheelchair ramps, improved paths and driveways, wider bathroom doors, and grip bars.

Second, under the initial authority, there had been no distinction between the extent of the structural home modifications available to seriously disabled veterans who have service-connected disabilities and those who do not. In 1976, Public Law 94-581 created two categories of the home improvements necessary and appropriate for the effective or economical treatment of the seriously disabled veterans: structural home modifications of a minor nature for the non-service-connected veterans with a cost ceiling of $600 and more extensive structural home modifications for the service-connected veterans with a cost ceiling of $2,500.

These limitations on the grant amounts have not been increased since 1976, a period during which the Consumer Price Index has more than doubled. Section 203 of the bill we are introducing today would, therefore, increase from $600 to $1,200 the ceiling for the one-time grant for home health services for a seriously disabled non-service-connected disabled veteran and from $2,500 to $5,000 the ceiling for the one-time grant for home health services for a seriously disabled service-connected disabled veteran.

SUPPLEMENTAL SERVICE DISABLED VETERANS' INSURANCE FOR TOTALLY DISABLED VETERANS

Mr. President, section 301 of our bill would increase from $10,000 to $20,000 the maximum amount of service disabled veterans' insurance [SDVI] available to those veterans who are eligible for a waiver of premiums due to total and permanent disability.

SDVI is designed to provide life insurance protection to service-connected disabled veterans. Under section 722 of title 38, a veteran with a service-connected disability rated at 10 percent or more who is released from active duty on or after April 25, 1951, and is otherwise insurable under health standards established by the Secretary is eligible for SDVI. Under VA regulations, this insurance is issued in increments of $1,000 up to a total of $10,000 and generally must be applied for within one year after the date of VA's determination of service connection. Premiums are waived for those who are under 65 years of age and have service-connected disabilities that are rated totally disabling and have been so rated continuously for at least 6 months.

As of December 31, 1989, approximately 40,000 of the 173,000 SDVI policyholders were eligible for the waiver of premiums due to total disability. For those veterans, purchasing additional life insurance coverage on the commercial market is prohibitively expensive. This provision would allow those totally disabled veterans, and future veterans in the same situation, the option of purchasing up to an additional $10,000 in life insurance coverage. Premiums for the additional coverage would not be waived, but would be charged at the standard SDVI premium level. An initial VA cost estimate for this provision places the cost at $1.66 million in fiscal year 1991, and about $6.5 million over the next 5 years.

Mr. President, the maximum amount of SDVI life insurance protection has not been raised since 1951 when the legislation creating the program was enacted. For many veterans with service-connected disabilities rated as totally disabling, SDVI represents an irreplaceable source of insurance coverage. Thus, I believe that this provision, by making optional additional life insurance coverage available to veterans with severe service-connected disabilities, would make a needed, worthwhile addition to the VA life insurance programs which provide needed financial security to the families of veterans who have sacrificed so very much in the service of our Nation.

INCREASE IN AMOUNT OF VETERANS' MORTGAGE LIFE INSURANCE

Mr. President, section 302 of our bill would inrease from $40,000 to $90,000 the maximum amount of veterans' mortgage life insurance [VMLI] available under section 806 of title 38 to veterans who have received a specially adapted housing grant under chapter 21 of title 38, which is available to veterans with certain service-connected disabilities rated permanently and totally disabling. This provision, which is substantially identical to legislation

(H.R. 2546) introduced by request in the House by Representative DOUGLAS APPLEGATE on June 6, 1989, would help resolve an existing inadequacy in current law. VA has officially expressed its support for this legislation.

The VMLI Program is designed to provide financial protection to cover an eligible veteran's outstanding home mortgage in the event of his or her death. The insurance is written and administered directly by VA, and, under VA regulations, veterans may purchase coverage in $1,000 increments to cover the outstanding mortgage on their homes up to $40,000. The program is restricted to those service-disabled veterans who have received grants for the purchase of a specially adapted home or for the purchase of special adaptations that are reasonably necessary because of the veteran's disability. Under chapter 21 of title 38, grants for the purchase of specially adapted housing are available to veterans with certain severe service-connected mobility impairments and grants for the purchase of special adaptations are available to veterans who are blind or have lost the use of both hands. Grants of both types are made to veterans whose disabilities are total and permanent.

Veterans with VMLI coverage pay standard premiums that do not take their disabilities into account. Consequently, additional funds are required to cover the extra mortality costs of this group. The premiums collected account for approximately 25 percent of the claims costs, thus requiring an annual subsidy from Congress to cover the remaining 75 percent of the claims cost. Proceeds from a VMLI policy are paid directly to the institution which holds the mortgage, not to the veteran's survivors.

According to the Department of Commerce, housing costs have risen 188 percent since 1976, when the maximum coverage was last increased—from $30,000 to $40,000. In the past 10 years, according to VA, over 60 percent of those who were issued VMLI coverage had mortgages in excess of $40,000. Thus, the current maximum amount of coverage available under a VMLI policy is insufficient to cover the outstanding mortgages on many catastrophically disabled veterans' homes. This is unsettling when one considers that severely disabled veterans generally do not have the option of purchasing extra life insurance coverage from commercial insurers because life insurance premiums are extraordinarily high for them.

According to VA, the VMLI program currently requires an annual subsidy of approximately $4 million, and this proposed increase would require additional subsidies. VA estimates that this increase would cost $1,686,000 in fiscal year 1991 and a total of $10 million over the next 5 years.

Mr. President, this proposed increase in the maximum amount of VMLI available to qualified veterans would help provide a fully deserved measure of security to our Nation's severely service-connected disabled veterans and their families by ensuring the maintenance of their family homes.

EXTENSION OF STATUTORY FUNDING FORMULA FOR DISABLED VETERANS' OUTREACH PROGRAM SPECIALISTS

Mr. President, section 401 of our bill would extend through calendar year 1993 the statutory formula in section 2003A(a)(1) of title 38 for the Federal funding of disabled veterans' outreach program specialists [DVOP's].

Under that formula, the Secretary of Labor is annually required to make available for use in each State sufficient funds to support the appointment of one DVOP "for each 5,300 veterans of the Vietnam era and disabled veterans" residing in the State. Under section 2001(2) of title 38, "veteran of the Vietnam era" is defined for purposes of chapter 41 "Job Counseling, Training, and Placement Service for veterans" by reference to the definition, in section 2011(2), used in chapter 42 "Employment and Training of Disabled and Vietnam Era Veterans." That definition reads "an eligible veteran any part of whose active military, naval, or air service was during the Vietnam era." However, that provision further states that, except for purposes of the Veterans Readjustment Appointment authority in section 2014, "[n]o veteran may be considered to be a veteran of the Vietnam era under [the definition] * * * after December 31, 1991."

Since the number of Vietnam-era veterans is a basic element of the formula for determining the amount of funds provided to States for the appointment of DVOP's, termination of the counting of Vietnam-era veterans for this purpose would drastically reduce the DVOP allocation for fiscal years 1992 and beyond. In fiscal year 1993, for example, it is projected that there will be about 8.7 million Vietnam-era veterans and 2.21 million non-Vietnam-era disabled veterans residing in the United States. If Vietnam-era veterans are counted, Federal funding for 1,895 DVOP's would be required; if they are not, Federal funding for only 438 would be required.

Mr. President, I am confident that the Congress does not wish such an enormous reduction in the DVOP program. Less than 2 years ago, we enacted in Public Law 100-323, the Veterans' Employment, Training, and Counseling Amendments of 1988, legislation I authored in the Senate to make important reforms in the design and administration of DVOP and related veterans employment and training programs. As I noted in my statement—beginning on page S5183 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for April 28, 1988—on final passage of that legislation, it was "designed to make substantial improvements in the furnishing of veterans' employment, training, and counseling services through major revisions to chapter 41 designed to provide for a more effective working relationship between the Department of Labor's ASVET and the State employment agencies, for better utilization of the services of LVER's and DVOP's, and for greater accountability in the * * * program." Consistent with this goal, our measure would assure the stability of DVOP staffing through the fiscal year 1993 budget cycle and provide the opportunity for rethinking the formula, should Congress wish to do so, so that it is no longer so heavily influenced by the number of veterans of one particular era, without the threat to an imminent collapse of most of the Federal support for the program.

COMMUNITY-BASED HOUSING FOR CERTAIN VETERANS WHO ARE HOMELESS OR RECOVERING FROM SUBSTANCE ABUSE OR MENTAL-ILLNESS DISABILITIES

Mr. President, section 402 of our bill contains three provisions that are designed to assist certain veterans obtain community-based housing.

First, section 402(a) would extend for 3 years, through October 1, 1993, VA's authority to sell acquired property to public or nonprofit entities to assist homeless veterans and their families in acquiring shelter. Second, this authority would be expanded to permit the sale of such property for use as transitional residences for veterans receiving treatment for substance abuse or mental health problems.

Under section 9 of the Veterans' Home Loan Program Improvements and Property Rehabilitation Act of 1987, Public Law 100-198, VA is authorized to sell to States, State agencies, or nonprofit organizations property acquired as a result of a default on a loan made or guaranteed by VA under the VA home loan program if the property is to be used solely as a shelter for homeless veterans and their families. The sale price may be less than the full value; the law provides that the sale shall be "for such consideration as the [Secretary] determines is in the best interests of homeless veterans and the Federal Government." The authority provided under this law is scheduled to terminate on October 1, 1990.

This provision would extend through October 1, 1993, the authority provided by section 9 and expand that authority so as (a) to permit the sale of properties to the same types of entities for use as transitional housing for veterans who have been furnished within the most recent 90-day period care and treatment and rehabilitative services by the Secretary for substance-abuse disabilities or mental-illness disabilities, and (b) to provide for the Secretary to take into account the best interests of these veterans in determining the sale price.

Mr. President, this provision also would extend for an additional 3 years the reporting requirements on the activities carried out under the expanded authority, with reports to be transmitted by the Secretary to the Congress on March 1, 1990, 1991, 1992, and 1993.

Mr. President, as of January 5, 1990, two properties had been sold under the Public Law 100-198 authority to eligible groups for use solely as shelters primarily for homeless veterans and their families. In Pennsylvania, the Pennsylvania Department of the American Legion formed a nonprofit corporation, the American Legion Housing for Homeless Veterans Corp., which purchased in July 1988 from VA a four-unit VA-acquired property for $20,000 and, in conjunction with the Highland VA Medical Center in Pittsburgh, the corporation provides housing for 10 homeless veterans. In Washington State, on December 21, 1989, the Seattle Vietnam Veterans Leadership Program purchased from VA for $28,000 a large, old three-story home which is being renovated to make maximum use of the floor space and provide shelter to six homeless veterans.

It is most regrettable that the utilization of the authority thus far has been limited to two sites only. In response to an inquiry I made to VA in March 1989 regarding what aspects of the program precluded wider participation and what steps could be taken to facilitate and encourage additional sales under the program, VA directed its field stations to survey eligible homeless providers. VA stations reported contact with local offices of 967 community-based agencies and nonprofit organizations. More than half of those contacted indicated to VA that they were insufficiently funded to purchase real estate incident to their public assistance programs.

In a white paper transmitted to the committee on January 5, 1990, VA indicated that it was administratively revising the property selection and pricing criteria for the program so that the number of eligible properties would be increased approximately fourfold and the amount of the sale price would be 50 percent, rather than 75 percent as at present, of market value. With these changes and the extension that would be provided under this legislation, I very much hope that this program will be utilized to a far greater extent during this fiscal year and the following 3 fiscal years to assist homeless veterans and their families.

The housing needs of homeless persons are immediate and severe. Despite the difficulty in collecting data on the numbers of homeless persons, most studies cite the problem as one that is growing. The National Coalition of the Homeless estimates that as many as 3 million individuals are currently homeless, and that the numbers continue to grow. The U.S. Conference of Mayors reported in 1988 that there had been an overall increase in requests for shelter of 13 percent over the 1987 figure and that requests for shelter by homeless families with children had increased by 18 percent over the previous year. It is estimated that between 18 and 51 percent of homeless individuals are veterans. These numbers reflect a most urgent problem, and I strongly believe that such sales as are authorized under current law and would continue to be authorized under our legislation should be encouraged as part of the Government's efforts to address the very serious problems of homelessness in our society.

Mr. President, with respect to the provision in the legislation that would allow acquired property to be sold to nonprofit organizations for use as transitional housing for veterans who have been furnished within the most recent 90-day period care and treatment and rehabilitative services by the Secretary for alcohol or drug dependence or abuse disabilities or mental disabilities, it is widely recognized that the medical systems that currently exist for the treatment of substance-abuse disorders often lack adequate followup care to the initial detoxification and rehabilitation periods of treatment. In VA programs, veterans with substance-abuse disorders often undergo a 28-day rehabilitation program, after which they are eligible for treatment at VA's expense in community-based privately operated halfway houses for a period of up to 90 days. Among the problems that recovering alcohol- and drug-addicted veterans face upon completion of a detoxification and rehabilitation program is finding a safe drug-and-alcohol-free environment in which to live and continue their rehabilitation. Additionally, many of those with longstanding addictions are homeless or on the verge of homelessness. The legislation we are introducing today would allow these properties which VA controls to be sold at a discount to appropriate public or nonprofit entities for use as transitional housing for veterans who have been furnished within the most recent 90-day period care and treatment and rehabilitative services by the Secretary—directly or under contract—for alcohol or drug dependence or abuse disabilities or mental disabilities.

Mr. President, authorizing VA to sell repossessed properties to nonprofit groups which agree to use the properties as either shelters for homeless veterans and their families or transitional housing for veteran patients who are struggling to overcome their mental-health or substance-abuse problems would be a sensible and productive use of hard-to-sell acquired residential properties to address serious needs among our Nation's veterans. Our legislation would thus help ensure that the needs of some of our most forgotten veterans—those who are homeless, mentally ill, or suffering from substance-abuse disabilities, and many are in all three categories—would be more effectively addressed.

Mr. President, the third provision in section 402—subsection (b)—would establish a revolving fund f om which loans not to exceed $4,000 could be extended for the purpose of establishing transitional group homes for veterans who are receiving or have received—within the prior 90 days—care for drugs or alcohol abuse or addiction. This provision is modeled after section 2036 of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, Public Law 100-690, which requires States to establish similar revolving funds in order to be eligible for block grants of Federal funds for drug and alcohol treatment programs.

Drug and alcohol addiction is a tremendous problem in our society and one that has risen to the forefront of our national consciousness. VA has vast expertise and experience in dealing with the treatment aspect of drug and alcohol addiction and related conditions. In fact, VA is the single largest direct provider of substance-abuse treatment in the United States if not the world. I believe that VA is particularly well-placed to be a leader in the treatment efforts.

In fiscal year 1989, Mr. President, VA furnished alcoholism treatment to more than 100,000 individual veterans—over 58,900 in 129 specialized alcoholism treatment units on an inpatient basis and another 41,500 on other VA inpatient units, such as general psychiatry. On an outpatient basis, VA handled almost 450,000 visits during fiscal year 1989 for alcoholism treatment in 139 outpatient alcohol dependence treatment programs.

Also in fiscal year 1989, VA's 53 drug dependence treatment programs provided treatment on an inpatient basis to 29,500 individual veterans with a wide variety of drug abuse and dependence problems, including opiate and cocaine dependency. VA statistics indicate that there were over 878,000 outpatient visits for drug dependence treatment. VA does not currently maintain statistics on the number of veterans who are treated for both alcohol and drug dependence, but such veterans are counted in either the drug treatment or the alcohol treatment category. VA's total expenditure on drug and alcohol treatment in fiscal year 1989 was estimated to be $451 million, and the total expenditure in fiscal year 1990 is estimated to be $524 million—with the increase almost entirely due to Congress' $60-million addon.

Furthermore, under a provision, section 620A of title 38, that I authored in Public Law 96-22 in 1979, VA is authorized to contract with non-VA community-based halfway houses for rehabilitation services for veterans with substance-abuse problems. Under this authority, VA in fiscal year 1989 placed over 4,500 veterans in nearly 400 community halfway houses for 60 to 90 days of care.

Mr. President, it is my expectation that the knowledge that exists in the areas of drug and alcohol addiction treatment within VA will be instrumental in any of the efforts that the Government undertakes to improve and expand treatment to substance abusers. I was extremely pleased that the fiscal year 1990 Appropriation Acts included an additional $60 million for VA drug and alcohol treatment programs—all of which has been included in VA's fiscal year 1991 budget request. These funds are badly needed by VA in the Department's efforts to meet the service needs of the millions of veterans who suffer from addictive disorders.

I understand that as of today, VA has distributed $34.5 million to the field and plans to distribute another $16.5 million very soon. Nine million dollars will be distributed sometime thereafter. I further understand that VA plans to use the funds for restoration, expansion, or initiation of substance-abuse programs at 148 VA medical centers and outpatient clinics. At least $2.5 million will be channeled to VA's halfway house contract program, and $1 million will be used for a much-needed VA evaluation project of its drug and alcohol treatment programs that was authorized explicitly in legislation I authored in section 2501 of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988. A total of 72 facilities apparently will receive funds for so-called "dual diagnosis" programs, which provide treatment for both the substance-abuse and mental conditions of the patients, including 29 programs in which patients are treated for substance abuse in conjunction with PTSD.

Subsection (b) addresses one important aspect of substance-abuse treatment that is presently lacking in VA—and often in State, local, and private—treatment programs, namely, a safe, drug- and alcohol-free place for recovering veterans to stay upon discharge from a hospital program. As I noted, this provision is modeled on section 2036 of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, under which 31 States have set up revolving funds to be used for loans to establish recovery homes for groups of recovering substance abusers.

The underlying model for both our proposal and the provision in the Anti-Drug-Abuse Act of 1988 is the Oxford House, a recovery program for individuals recovering from alcoholism or drug addiction. Since the first Oxford House was established in Silver Spring, MD, in 1975, this approach has demonstrated that a drug- and alcohol-free environment can be maintained by recovering drug and alcohol abusers. Today there are 76 Oxford Houses throughout the Nation in 15 States and the District of Columbia—each chartered by Oxford House, Inc., a nonprofit, tax-exempt corporation which acts as an umbrella organization for the national network of Oxford Houses, but all distinctly autonomous. Currently, there are 782 residents in these homes, and, in total, well over 3,000 men and women have been or are residents.

There are only three rules which all Oxford Houses are obliged to follow: First, the house must operate using democratic procedures; second, the group must be financially self-supporting; and third, any resident who relapses into using alcohol or drugs must be expelled immediately. All other rules governing individual houses are made democratically by its members. A recovering individual is generally permitted to live in an Oxford House as long as he or she does not drink or use drugs and pays a proportionate share of the house expenses. The average stay is a little over a year, but some residents stay longer. There is no pressure on anyone in good standing to leave. Our provision would differ from the Oxford House model in that the stay is definitely intended to be transitional since it is designed to be a part of a medical-care model and not a housing program.

The therapeutic aspects built into the Oxford Houses are many. The group residence allows the individuals in recovery the opportunity to determine their own living environments; it offers a supportive living environment free of alcohol or drug use; and, most importantly, it reinstills in the residents a good dose of pride and self-respect, commodities often in short supply among alcoholics and drug abusers. But Oxford House is only part of the recovery process. Residents are encouraged to participate in Alcoholics Anonymous and Narcotics Anonymous, and longtime residents often play vital roles in the further expansion of the Oxford House Program.

Mr. President, the proposal we are offering today would encourage the establishment of group homes similar to those under Oxford House for veterans recovering from substance abuse. Specifically, under the bill, on October 1, 1990, a revolving fund would be established to which a minimum of $100,000—and up to $1,000,000, as specified by the Secretary—would be transferred from VA's canteen service revolving fund.

Loans would be made from this revolving fund to groups of veterans who are receiving or have recently received from VA, or through contract care paid for by VA, treatment for substance-abuse disabilities. These loans will only be made to groups of veterans that agree that, as in the Oxford House model, the use of alcohol or any illegal drug in the house will be prohibited and result in the expulsion of the offending veteran; the costs of the house, including fees for rent and utilities, will be paid by the veteran residents of the house; the veteran residents will, through a majority vote, otherwise establish policies governing residence in the house, including the manner in which applications for residence are approved; and the house will be maintained only for veterans and will house at least six veterans.

The amount of these loans could not exceed $4,000, an amount that would allow a group of veterans to secure a lease on a house and pay the necessary security deposit and move-in costs. The veteran residents of the house would have to make payments to the new revolving fund—estimated to be about $175 per month on a usual Oxford House residence—for 24 months. A reasonable penalty would be assessed for each failure to pay such periodic installments by the date specified in the loan agreement. As money is repaid to the fund, other loans could be extended for the establishment of more group homes. This is the same manner in which loans are administered under the State programs called for under section 2036 of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988.

The success of the Oxford House model in communities throughout the country is thought by the founders of the model to be attributable to the self-run, self-help nature of the residences. By providing loans of not more than $4,000, the program envisioned by our bill would follow the self-help philosophy of Oxford House; the success of a residence and of the veterans residing there would depend on their upholding their obligations both under the loan from VA and the lease agreement with the owner of the property. The $4,000 amount is intended only to allow a group of veterans to secure a lease on a suitable residence and move in. The requirement that at least six veterans reside in the group home is included to ensure that the monthly rental cost per veteran is not prohibitively high. I am advised by Oxford House that there has never been a situation in which fewer than six persons have started an Oxford House.

In order to make this program easily workable, our proposal also would authorize the Secretary to enter into contractual agreements with private nonprofit corporations for the purpose of collecting payments on the loans made from the revolving fund and then remitting the payments to VA. This is a function that the Oxford House often fulfills, for a charge of $830 per month for an entire program in a State, in the State programs. I believe that this aspect of our provision would allow VA the same flexibility in administering the revolving fund that States have in administering the revolving funds established pursuant to section 2036.

Mr. President, substance-abuse treatment does not end when the alcoholic or addict walks out the door of initial treatment. That is only the beginning. For persons whose lives have been ripped apart by addiction to alcohol or drugs, there is often the need to rebuild the communication skills and work abilities that have been impaired by the addiction. Hospital treatment programs and participation in halfway house programs can help recovering persons relearn these skills and begin rebuilding their lives. But it is when these persons are outside of the hospital or therapeutic halfway house and on their own that the real test begins. The Oxford House model, in which recovering persons live together, make decisions together, help each other find work, and support themselves and each other without any public or private assistance except for the startup rental and security deposits, provides an environment where the recovering addict lives with others with common experiences who can assist him or her in going forward. I am very encouraged by what I have learned about the Oxford House approach, and fully expect that in implementing this provision VA would consult the people who developed that model and who are instrumental in its operation.

Inherent in this provision and the Oxford House model on which it is based is faith in and trust of the recovering person. It may seem to some that it is a leap of faith to facilitate, by providing loans, the establishment of group homes for recovering-addict veterans who are unsupervised by anyone other than themselves. The clear success of the Oxford House homes leads me to believe that such faith is well worth the limited cost of and risk involved in this provision, and I look forward to its passage and implementation so that the veterans troubled by addiction can lead truly free and productive lives.

PERMANENT EXTENSION OF FINANCIAL INFORMATION AND COUNSELING ASSISTANCE FOR VETERANS

Mr. President, section 403 of the bill would make permanent the current requirement, in section 1832(a)(4) of title 38, that VA provide information and counseling to veterans who default on VA-guaranteed home loans about the effects of and alternatives to foreclosure. The assistance includes, as appropriate in light of the veteran's particular circumstances, information and counseling about methods of curing the default; conveyance to VA by a deed in lieu of foreclosure; other alternatives to foreclosure; and the liabilities of VA and the veteran in the event of foreclosure.

This counseling-assistance requirement, enacted in section 4 of Public Law 100-198, took effect on March 1, 1988, and will expire on March 1, 1991. The 3-year limit was meant to provide a trial period during which Congress could evaluate the effectiveness of the provision in lowering foreclosures on VA-guaranteed home loans. A very recent report by the General Accounting Office, entitled "Housing Programs: Increased Use of Alternatives to Foreclosure Could Reduce VA's Losses" (GAO/RCED-90-4 (December 1989)), indicates that this provision "is a step toward improving the program and reducing dollar losses." The report covered a period immediately preceding and following enactment of the provision, but its findings and recommendations are consistent with the policy embodied in the provision—that financial information and counseling assistance to defaulting veterans can produce savings for VA that can dwarf the costs of providing that assistance.

TECHNICAL CORRECTIONS

Mr. President, section 404 of the bill would make a series of technical amendments, primarily to correct errors in the Veterans' Benefits Amendments of 1989, Public Law 101-237, which was enacted on December 18, 1989.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, as I noted at the outset, the central purposes of this bipartisan legislation are to provide COLA's in certain benefits paid to veterans with service-connected disabilities, and to certain dependents and survivors of such veterans, and to maintain and improve the VA programs of benefits and services for our Nation's veterans and their dependents. I look forward to gaining the views on this measure from VA, from the various veterans' service organizations, and from others interested in its various programs.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2100

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Veterans Compensation Cost-of-Living Adjustment Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. REFERENCES TO TITLE 38, UNITED STATES CODE.

Except as otherwise expressly provided, whenever in this Act an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of title 38, United States Code.

TITLE I—COMPENSATION

SEC. 101. DISABILITY COMPENSATION AND DEPENDENCY AND INDEMNITY COMPENSATION RATE INCREASE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) The Secretary of Veterans Affairs shall, as provided in paragraph (2), increase, effective December 1, 1990, the rates of and limitations on Department of Veterans Affairs disability compensation and dependency and indemnity compensation.

(2)(A) The Secretary shall increase each of the rates and limitations in sections 314, 315(1), 362, 411, 413, and 414 of title 38, United States Code, that were increased by the amendments made by title XI of the Veteran's Benefits Improvement Act of 1988 (Public Law 100-687; 102 Stat. 4123). The increase shall be made in such rates and limitations as in effect on November 30, 1990, and shall be by the same percentage that benefit amounts payable under title II of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 401 et seq.) are increased effective December 1, 1990, as a result of a determination under section 215(i) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 415(i)).

(B) In the computation of increased rates and limitations pursuant to subparagraph (A), amounts of $0.50 or more shall be rounded to the next higher dollar amount and amounts of less than $0.50 shall be rounded to the next lower dollar amount.

(b) SPECIAL RULE.—The Secretary may adjust administratively, consistent with the increases made under subsection (a), the rates of disability compensation payable to persons within the purview of section 10 of Public Law 85-857 (72 Stat. 1263) who are not in receipt of compensation payable pursuant to chapter 11 of title 38, United States Code.

(c) PUBLICATION REQUIREMENT.—At the same time as the matters specified in section 215(i)(2)(D) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 415(i)(2)(D)) are required to be published by reason of a determination made under section 215(i) of such Act during fiscal year 1990, the Secretary shall publish in the Federal Register the rates and limitations referred to in subsection (a)(2)(A) as increased under this section.

SEC. 102. EXTENSION OF PRESUMPTION OF SERVICE CONNECTION FOR CERTAIN RADIATION-EXPOSED RESERVISTS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 312(c) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (3), by inserting "while serving on active duty" after "activity";

(2) in paragraph (4)—

(A) by redesignating subparagraphs (A) and (B) as subparagraphs (B) and (C);

(B) by inserting before subparagraph (B) (as redesignated by subparagraph (A)) the following new subparagraph:

"(A) the term 'active duty' includes active duty for training and inactive duty for training."; and

(C) in subparagraph (B) (as redesignated by subparagraph (A)), by striking out "a veteran" and inserting in lieu thereof "an individual".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsection (a) shall take effect as of May 1, 1988.

SEC. 103. AUTHORITY TO MAKE READJUSTMENTS IN THE DISABILITY RATING SCHEDULE PROSPECTIVE ONLY.

Section 355 is amended—

(1) by striking out "Administrator" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "Secretary";

(2) by designating the first three sentences as subsection (a);

(3) by designating the last sentence as subsection (b); and

(4) by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(c) In making a readjustment under subsection (b) of this section, the Secretary may provide that the readjustment shall not have the effect of reducing any ratings in effect on the date that the readjustment takes effect.".

TITLE II—HEALTH CARE

SEC. 201. EXTENSION OF PILOT PROGRAM OF MOBILE HEALTH CARE CLINICS.

Section 113(b) of the Veterans' Benefits and Services Act of 1988 (Public Law 100-322; 102 Stat. 500) is amended—

(1) by striking out "and 1990" and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and "1990, and 1991"; and

(2) by adding at the end the following new sentence: "Funds appropriated to carry out the pilot program authorized by this section shall remain available until expended.".

SEC. 202. ELIGIBILITY FOR PROSTHETIC DEVICES AND OTHER MEDICAL ITEMS.

Section 601(6)(A)(i) is amended by striking out "(except under the conditions described in section 612(f)(1)(A)(i) of this title)".

SEC. 203. INCREASE IN MAXIMUM LIMITATIONS ON HOME HEALTH SERVICES.

Section 617(a)(2) is amended—

(1) in subparagraph (A), by striking out "$2,500" and inserting in lieu thereof "$5,000"; and

(2) in subparagraph (B), by striking out "$600" and inserting lieu thereof "$1,200".

TITLE III—INSURANCE

SEC. 301. SUPPLEMENTAL SERVICE DISABLED VETERANS' INSURANCE FOR TOTALLY DISABLED VETERANS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subchapter I of chapter 19 is amended by inserting after section 722 the following new section:

"§ 722A. Supplemental service disabled veterans' insurance for totally disabled veterans

"(a) Any person insured under section 722 of this title who qualifies for a waiver of premiums under section 712 of this title is eligible, as provided in this section, for supplemental insurance in an amount not to exceed $10,000.

"(b) To qualify for supplemental insurance under this section a person must file with the Secretary an application for such insurance not later than the end of (1) the one-year period beginning on the first day of the first month following the month in which this section is enacted, or (2) the period during which the person must apply under section 722(a) of this title in order to be granted insurance under that section.

"(c) Supplemental insurance granted under this section shall be granted upon the same terms and conditions as insurance granted under section 722 of this title, except that such insurance may not be granted to a person under this section unless the application is made for such insurance before the person attains 65 years of age.

"(d) No waiver of premiums shall be made in the case of any person for supplemental insurance granted under this section.".

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 19 is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 722 the following new item:

"722A. Supplemental service disabled veterans' insurance for totally disabled veterans.".

SEC. 302. INCREASE IN AMOUNT OF VETERANS' MORTGAGE LIFE INSURANCE.

Section 806(b) is amended in the first sentence—

(1) by striking out "initial"; and

(2) by striking out "$40,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$90,000".

TITLE IV—MISCELLANEOUS

SEC. 401. POSTPONEMENT OF TIME LIMITATION ON COUNTING OF VIETNAM-ERA VETERANS IN DISABLED VETERANS OUTREACH PROGRAM SPECIALISTS FUNDING FORMULA.

Section 2001(2) is amended by inserting before the period at the end ", except that a veteran may be considered to be a veteran of the Vietnam era for the purposes of this chapter until December 31, 1993".

SEC. 402. COMMUNITY-BASED HOUSING FOR CERTAIN VETERANS WHO ARE HOMELESS OR RECOVERING FROM SUBSTANCE ABUSE OR MENTAL ILLNESS DISABILITIES.

(a) EXTENSION AND EXPANSION OF AUTHORITY TO SELL ACQUIRED PROPERTIES FOR OCCUPANCY BY HOMELESS AND CERTAIN OTHER VETERANS.—Section 9 of the Veterans' Home Loan Program Improvements and Property Rehabilitation Act of 1987 (Public Law 100-198; 38 U.S.C. 1820 note) is amended—

(1) in subsection (a)—

(A) in paragraph (1), by inserting "and to provide transitional housing for veterans recovering from substance abuse or mental illness disabilities" after "shelter";

(B) in paragraphs (2) and (3)(B)(iii), by striking out "best interests of homeless veterans" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "best interests of veterans who are to occupy the property"; and

(C) in paragraph (3)(B)(i), by inserting "or as transitional housing for veterans who, at the time of entering the housing, are being furnished services by the Secretary, directly or by contract, for alcohol or drug dependence or abuse disabilities or mental illness disabilities or who, at any time within 90 days preceding the date of entering the housing, have been furnished such services by the Secretary for such purpose" after "families";

(2) in subsection (c) by striking out "October 1, 1990" and inserting in lieu thereof "December 31, 1993"; and

(3) in subsection (d)—

(A) by inserting "and March 1 of each of the next three years" after "March 1, 1990," and

(B) by striking out ", through December 31, 1989," and inserting in lieu thereof "through December 31 of the preceding year" after "section".

(b) TRANSITIONAL GROUP RESIDENCES FOR VETERANS RECOVERING FROM SUBSTANCE ABUSE DISABILITIES.—(1) Section 620A is amended by adding at the end the following new subsections:

"(h)(1) To assist veterans in recovering from alcohol or drug dependence or abuse disabilities, there is hereby established in the Treasury of the United States a revolving fund to be known as the 'Transitional Housing Fund'. The Secretary shall use the proceeds of the Fund to make loans authorized under subsection (j) of this section to nonprofit entities for the purpose of assisting such entities in meeting the costs of establishing programs for the provision of transitional residences for recovering veterans.

"(2) For the purposes of this paragraph, the term 'recovering veterans' means veterans who, at the time of entering the residences, are being furnished services by the Secretary, directly or by contract, for alcohol or drug dependence or abuse disabilities or who, at any time within 90 days preceding the date of entering the residences, have been furnished such services by the Secretary for such purpose.

"(i) On October 1, 1990, the Secretary of the Treasury shall transfer $100,000 from the revolving fund established pursuant to section 4204 of this title to the Transitional Housing Fund. After that date, the Secretary of the Treasury shall transfer from the revolving fund established pursuant to that section to the Transitional Housing Fund such amounts, not to exceed a total of $900,000, as the Secretary of Veterans Affairs may specify.

"(j) The Secretary shall make loans from the Transitional Housing Fund for the purpose described in subsection (h)(1) of this section. In making loans under this subsection, the Secretary shall ensure that—

"(1) each loan is repaid within two years after the date on which the loan is made;

"(2) each loan is repaid through monthly installments and that a reasonable penalty is assessed for each failure to pay an installment by the date specified in the loan agreement involved; and

"(3) each loan is made only to a nonprofit private entity which agrees that, in the operation of each residence established with the assistance of the loan—

"(A) the use of alcohol or any illegal drug in the residence will be prohibited;

"(B) any resident who violates the prohibition in subclause (A) of this clause will be expelled from the residence;

"(C) the costs of maintaining the residence, including fees for rent and utilities, will be paid by the residents;

"(D) the residents will, through a majority vote of the residents, otherwise establish policies governing the conditions of residence, including the manner in which applications for residence are approved; and

"(E) the residence will be operated solely as a residence for not less than six veterans.

"(k) No loan may be made under this section for more than $4,000 and not more than $4,000 in total loans may be made for the establishment of any particular transitional residence.

"(l) All loan repayments and penalties collected under this section shall be deposited to the credit of the Transitional Housing Fund.

"(m) Not later than 90 days after the date of the enactment of this subsection, the Secretary shall issue guidelines for the operation of residences described in subsection (h)(1) of this section.

"(n) The Secretary may enter into contractual agreements with private nonprofit corporations for the purposes of collecting on behalf of the Secretary payments on the loans described in subsection (h)(1) of this section.".

(2) The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall take effect on October 1, 1990.

SEC. 103. PERMANENT EXTENSION OF FINANCIAL INFORMATION AND COUNSELING ASSISTANCE FOR CERTAIN VETERANS WITH GUARANTEED LOANS.

Subparagraph (C) of section 1832(a)(4) is repealed.

SEC. 104. TECHNICAL CORRECTIONS.

(a) ADJUDICATIONS.—(1) The heading of section 3004 is amended to read as follows:

"§ 3004. Notice of decisions".

(2) The the table of sections at the beginning of chapter 51 is amended by striking out the item relating to section 3004 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"3004. Notice of decisions.".

(b) EDUCATION PROGRAMS.—(1) Section 1418(b)(4) is amended—

(A) by striking out the comma after "service" and inserting in lieu thereof "(i)"; and

(B) by inserting ", or (ii) has successfully completed the equivalent of 12 semester hours in a program of education leading to a standard college degree" before the semicolon.

(2) Section 1433(b) is amended by striking out "section 902 of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1981 (10 U.S.C. 2141 note)," and inserting in lieu thereof "chapter 109 of title 10".

(3) Section 1685(a)(5) is amended by inserting "or National Guard" after "Department of Defense".

(c) HOME LOAN PROGRAM.—(1) Section 1803(a)(1)(A)(i) is amended—

(A) in subclause (III)—

(i) by inserting "except as provided in subclause (IV) of this clause," after "(III)"; and

(ii) by striking out "but not more than $144,000,"; and

(B) in subclause (IV), by striking out "or (6)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(6), or (8)";

(2) Section 1825(c) is amended—

(A) in subparagraph (2), by striking out "There" and inserting in lieu thereof "Except as provided in paragraph (3) of this subsection, there"; and

(B) by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(3) In the case of a loan described in clause (C) of section 1829(a)(2) of this title, there also shall be credited to the Guaranty and Indemnity Fund—

"(A) for each loan closed during fiscal year 1990, an amount equal to 0.25 percent of the original amount of the loan for each of the fiscal years 1991 and 1992;

"(B) for each loan closed after fiscal year 1990, an amount equal to 0.25 percent of the original amount of the loan for the fiscal year in which the loan is closed and for the following fiscal year.".

(3) Section 1829(a) is amended by striking out paragraphs (3) and (4) and redesignating paragraph (5) as paragraph (3).

(4) Section 1829(c)(2) is amended by striking out "section 1825(c)(2) (A) or (B) of this title and subsection (a)(3) of this section" and inserting in lieu thereof "clause (A) or (B) of paragraph (2) of section 1825(c) of this title or paragraph (3) of that section".

(5) Any actions of the Secretary of Veterans Affairs in carrying out the provisions of section 1829 of title 38, United States Code, by contract or otherwise, with respect to loans closed during the period beginning on December 1, 1989, and ending on the date of the enactment of the Veterans' Benefits Amendments of 1989 (Public Law 101-237) are hereby ratified.

(d) MISCELLANEOUS AMENDMENTS.—(1) Chapter 36 is amended in sections 1732(c)(3), 1732(e), and 1733(a)(1), by striking out "Secretary of Veterans Affairs" and inserting in lieu thereof "Secretary".

(2) The chapter heading of chapter 71 is amended to read as follows:

"CHAPTER 71—BOARD OF VETERANS APPEALS".

(3) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 71 is amended by striking out the item relating to section 4001 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"4001. Composition of Board of Veterans Appeals.".

(4) The heading of section 4001 is amended to read as follows:

"§ 4001. Composition of Board of Veterans Appeals".

(5) The text of chapters 71 and 72 is amended—

(A) by striking out "Board of Veterans' Appeals" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "Board of Veterans Appeals";

(B) by striking out "Veterans' Administration" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "Department"; and

(C) by striking out "Administrator" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "Secretary".

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, in introducing the legislation which would ensure that disabled veterans and their survivors will be protected from any reduction in the spending power of the compensation they receive as the result of disabilities or deaths which arise during service.

The proposed Veterans Compensation Cost-of-Living Adjustment Act, if enacted, will ensure that disability compensation—and related benefits for survivors—paid in 1991 are not reduced in their buying power by the impact of inflation. Legislation is necessary because, unlike most Federal benefits, disability compensation is not automatically indexed to the cost of living. The legislation we are introducing today would require VA to increase payments, effective December 1, 1990, by the same percentage that Social Security will be increased as a result of the indexing of that program.

The legislation would also extend, to reservists and National Guard personnel who particiapted in the above ground testing of nuclear devices, the same eligibility for disability compensation that was provided in Public Law 100-321 to active duty service members who participated in those tests. This provision would apply to Guard and reserve personnel who were on active duty for training or inactive duty for training at the time they participated in the test. I believe the Congress has always intended that reservists who are injured while participating in military activities as a result of their active or inactive duty for training should be compensated for the effects of those injuries. In the case of active duty participants of nuclear testing, compensation is payable for illnesses the Congress has determined to be associated with radiation exposure on the theory that their illness may have been caused by their participation in the test. It seems only equitable to extend the same principle to individuals who participated in the testing while on active, or inactive, duty for training.

Section 103 of the bill would allow VA to update its criteria for evaluating the severity of disabilities without threatening the income of veterans now in receipt of VA disability compensation. I believe this is a humane solution to the problems faced by VA and veterans when an objective review of improvements in medical science, rehabilitation techniques, or changes in the nature of employment indicate that a specific condition is no longer as disabling as it was in the past. I would note that the provision does not prohibit veterans now on the rolls from enjoying the benefit of a determination that a condition is more disabling, it only ensures current recipients will not suffer a reduction in income if a condition is determined to be less disabling.

Section 201 of the bill would authorize an appropriation of $5 million for fiscal year 1991 for the conduct of a pilot program of mobile health care clinics. Public Law 100-322 provided VA with the authority to conduct such a pilot program in order to evaluate the desirability of using mobile clinics to provide health care services to veterans residing in rural areas. VA, however, has not yet implemented this authority. The conference report to accompany H.R. 2916—which ultimately became Public Law 101-144—provided $3 million for this pilot program. I look forward to reviewing VA's implementation plans and eventually VA's evaluation of this promising program.

Section 202 of the bill would provide specific authority for VA to furnish needed medical equipment, prosthetic devices and similar such appliances to non-service-connected veterans when furnishing outpatient care to obviate the need for hospital care. This provision is supported by VA. According to VA officials, the current restriction on providing such equipment or devices limits VA efforts to reduce hospitalizations. That is, by providing limited and inexpensive items to veteran patients, VA could avoid—in some cases—costly hospital stays.

This bill would also increase the maximum limitations on home health services improvements. Section 617 of title 38 provides VA with the authority to provide funds for structural improvements to a veterans residence which may be necessary for the treatment of the veteran's condition and to provide access to necessary sanitary facilities.

The legislation would also allow veterans, who qualify for a waiver of premiums, on the basis of total disability, for the life insurance VA makes available to veterans with service-connected disabilities, to purchase an additional $10,000 in VA life insurance at standard premium rates. This provision will allow veterans suffering from very serious disability—who are likely uninsurable at reasonable rates because of those disabilities—to increase their VA coverage to a maximum of $20,000. This additional coverage would not be a grant. The veterans in question would have to purchase the insurance. The only cost to the taxpayer would be the losses which will result from providing coverage at standard rates to veterans with severe disabilities or illnesses.

Veterans' mortgage life insurance is provided to veterans who qualify for a VA grant to help purchase a so-called "wheelchair home." This mortgage insurance helps ensure that, in the event of the veterans' death, his or her family will not lose their home. The veterans who qualify for this insurance are so severely disabled that they have lost—or lost the use of—limbs or sight due to a service-connected cause. The mortgage insurance is currently limited to $40,000. This legislation would increase that limitation to $90,000. This increase reflects the increase in housing costs in many areas of the country.

The bill would also address the problem created by the imminent sunset date of a provision which allows Vietnam-era veterans—that is, all veterans with active duty between August 4, 1964 and May 7, 1975, without regard to where they served or the nature of their duties—to be included in the formula establishing the number of Disabled Veteran Outreach Program [DVOP] staff funded by the Federal Government. Under current law, the number of DVOP staff would fall from 1,883 to less than 500 in 1992. Since the Department of Labor will soon begin its budget process for 1992, it is important to extend the sunset date for DVOP personnel until the Congress has time to carefully consider what long-term employment programs should be provided in the 1990's and beyond, without being preempted by the fiscal year 1992 budget process. To this end, the bill extends, through 1993, the requirement to include Vietnam-era veterans when determining the number of DVOP staff.

I believe it is particularly important to provide the dedicated and experienced DVOP staff some stability in their jobs since one of their responsibilities is the provision of employment services to newly discharged veterans. Given current international uncertainties, it is impossible to rule out the possibility that the size of the active duty force may be reduced in the future with a resulting surge of newly discharged veterans seeking employment services.

The legislation also extends the sunset date of authority for VA to sell homes it owns, due to foreclosure on VA guaranteed loans, to nonprofit groups who would, in turn, use the homes to provide shelter to homeless veterans. The authority would be expanded to include veterans being treated by VA for alcohol or drug abuse or mental illness. Given the association between mental illness, alcohol and drug abuse, and homelessness, this provision may serve to preempt the entry of the veterans housed under this program into homelessness.

The legislation also establishes a program to permit VA to assist veterans recovering from alcohol or drug dependence in establishing substance free transitional housing. It would allow VA to establish a revolving fund from which loans would be made to nonprofit corporations to establish transitional housing. The loan would be repaid by the corporation from funds received by the veteran residents as rent.

Although I support the concept of this transitional housing provision. I have certain drafting and substantive concerns which I will want to address as this bill works its way through the legislative process. I will be especially interested in hearing testimony about the proposed funding mechanism for the loans. I intend to explore the pros and cons of using the canteen revolving fund to make loans under this proposal.

Again, I thank the chairman for his fine work on this bill and am pleased to join with him as an original cosponsor. I look forward to working with him through the hearing and markup process as the Committee on Veterans' Affairs perfects this important legislation.

By Mr. CRANSTON (by request):

S. 2101. A bill to waive the waiting period requirement of section 210(b)(2) of title 38, United States Code, for a planned administrative reorganization involving the Loan Guaranty Division at the Togus Veterans Affairs Medical and Regional Office Center; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

ADMINISTRATIVE REORGANIZATION RELATING TO THE TOGUS VETERANS AFFAIRS MEDICAL AND REGIONAL OFFICE CENTER

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I have today introduced, by request, S. 2101, a bill to waive the waiting period requirement of section 210(b)(2) of title 38, United States Code, for a planned administrative reorganization involving the Loan Guaranty Division at the Togus—Maine—Veterans Affairs Medical and Regional Office Center. The Secretary of Veterans Affairs submitted this legislation by letter dated January 22, 1989, to the President of the Senate.

My introduction of this measure is in keeping with the policy which I have adopted of generally introducing—so that there will be specific bills to which my colleagues and others my direct their attention and comments—all administration-proposed draft legislation referred to the Veterans' Affair Committee. Thus, I reserve the right to support or oppose the provisions of, as well as any amendment to, this legislation.

At our committee's January 23, 1990, hearing the committee will be receiving testimony on this administration-requested legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point, together with the January 22, 1990, transmittal letter and the detailed plan and justification for the transfer of the loan guaranty operation, Togus, ME.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, The waiting period requirement of section 210(b)(2) of title 38, United States Code, shall not apply to a Department of Veterans Affairs planned administrative reorganization that involves the closing of the Loan Guaranty Division at the Togus Veterans Affairs Medical and Regional Office Center, and the transfer of the functions of that Loan Guaranty Division to the Manchester Veterans Affairs Regional Office.

THE SECRETARY OF VETERANS AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, January 22, 1990.

Hon. DAN QUAYLE,
President of the Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is transmitted herewith a draft bill to "To waive the waiting period requirement of Section 210(b)(2) of title 38, United States Code, for a planned administrative reorganization involving the Loan Guaranty Division at the Togus Veterans Affairs Medical and Regional Office Center" with the request that it be referred to the appropriate committee for prompt consideration and enactment.

Enactment of the enclosed draft bill will permit us to implement this reorganization immediately. Absent such a waiver, we must wait until fiscal year 1991 to initiate this action. The reason for the planned reorganization is set forth in the enclosed letter to the Chairman, Committee on Veterans' Affairs. This letter has been sent to our oversight committees to report this planned reorganization as required by 38 U.S.C. 210(b)(2).

We will be happy to provide any additional information concerning this proposal. Your staff may contact Raymond H. Avent, Deputy Chief Benefits Director for Field Operations, at 23-5244, if additional information is needed.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that there is no objection from the standpoint of the Administration's program to the submission of this report and legislative proposal to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. DERWINSKI.

DETAILED PLAN AND JUSTIFICATION—TRANSFER OF LOAN GUARANTY OPERATION, TOGUS, ME

I. The number of employees to be reduced at Togus VAM&ROC and their responsibilities, and the means by which reduction is to be accomplished:

Veterans Benefits Administration plans to transfer the Loan Guaranty operation at Togus to a consolidated New England Loan Guaranty Division at Manachester, New Hampshire. The authorized FTE of the Loan Guaranty Division at the VA Medical and Regional Office Center, Togus, Maine is 10. Those 10 Loan Guaranty employees have responsibility for origination, servicing, and termination of guaranteed loans as well as the resale of acquired properties and servicing of portfolio loans in the State of Maine. Clerical employees will be absorbed by the VAM&ROC. Employees in technical and supervisory positions will be offered positions at the consolidated site in Manchester, New Hampshire, with translocation costs being paid. We hope to offer those technical employees declining transfer the option of staying in comparable positions in other divisions of the Togus VAM&ROC. Employees whose positions are eliminated will be absorbed as normal attrition creates vacancies.

The other two Loan Guaranty divisions affected by closing and transfer to the consolidated Manchester Loan Guaranty division are at the Boston Veterans Affairs Regional Office. The authorized FTEE in the Loan Guaranty Division at Boston is 9; and at Hartford the FTE is 6. Since the FTE reduction percentages which will take place at the Boston and Hartford Regional Offices is less than 10% of their authorized station FTE, the closing of the Loan Guaranty divisions at those two stations is not subject to section 210(b)(2) reporting requirements.

II. The facility at which employees will be increased, the number of employees to be increased, and the specific responsibility of those employees:

The Manchester VA Regional Office will become the consolidated site for Loan Guaranty operations in the New England area. The Manchester Loan Guaranty Division currently has 6 FTEE. The consolidated division will have 22 positions. This consolidated division will provide Loan Guaranty benefits and services to Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont. The 22 positions will be: 3 Staff appraisers (1 supervisory); 1 Construction Analyst; 1 Specially Adapted Housing Agent; 9 Loan Specialists (Realty) (2 supervisory); 3 Realty Specialists (1 supervisory); 1 Secretary; 3 Program Clerks; 1 Clerk Typist.

III. Description of changes in functions:

The functions of the Togus VAM&ROC and the VA Regional Offices in Boston and Hartford, except for Loan Guaranty operations, will remain the same. Veterans Service divisions at each station will continue to issue certificates of eligibility to walk-in veterans. However, all other loan guaranty benefits and services for veterans in New England (including issuance of certificates of reasonable value, processing of loan applications, issuance of guaranty, servicing of defaulted loans, payment of claims under guaranty and acquisition and disposition of foreclosed properties) will be handled from the Manchester Regional Office. At Manchester, the consolidated Loan Guaranty division will perform Loan Guaranty functions in the same manner as it now does except that its geographic area of responsibility will be greater. There will be no other functional changes as a result of this reorganization.

IV. Reasons that the reorganization is appropriate and advisable in terms of statutory missions and long-term goals of the Department of Veterans Affairs:

The New England Directors asked the Chief Benefits Director to convene a Task Force to examine the Loan Guaranty benefit delivery system in New England. They felt that the Loan Guaranty program was potentially at risk due to minimal staffing and limited flexibility to cope with personnel and program changes. The planned reorganization follows the recommendations made by the Task Force composed of staff members of the New England Offices and Loan Guaranty Service. A summary from the New England Task Force Study is enclosed.

Loan Guaranty Service reviewed the Task Force report, concurred in the findings, and made a recommendation to the Deputy Chief Benefits Director to consolidate the four New England Loan Guaranty Divisions into one site at the Veterans Affairs Regional Office, Manchester, New Hampshire. This site was selected due to its central location and its reasonable cost of living.

It has long been recognized that the Loan Guaranty program in New England is less efficient and more costly than in other parts of the country. Workloads support only minimal employment levels. Consequently, supervisory ratios are high and economies of scale impossible to achieve. This limits the four New England stations' ability to cope with potential personnel and program changes, and is detrimental to program operations over the long term. Boston and Hartford both have difficulty in recruiting and retaining personnel due in part to the high cost of living in those areas. Staffing is reaching a critical turning point. Since most of the Loan Guaranty workload in New England is related to loan origination, employees perform servicing and property disposition functions infrequently. When work is not performed regularly, poor quality and failure to meet timeliness standards often result. As stated, the program in New England is predominately origination-oriented and is being handled adequately with the present staff. However, any sudden shift in the New England economy or real estate market leading to loan terminations and property acquisitions could have negative impact on loan guaranty operations. The consolidated Loan Guaranty division will be able to better handle any such market changes.

A consolidation should improve productivity and the cost effectiveness of Loan Guaranty activities in New England while maintaining and even improving the timeliness and quality of Loan Guaranty benefits and services to veterans.

V. Effects of the reorganization on benefits and services to veterans and dependents of veterans:

The provision of benefits and services to veterans and their dependents should be enhanced with the consolidation of the four New England Offices as there will be more adequate staffing to provide specialized service in all four functional areas of the Loan Guaranty Program (Construction and Valuation, Loan Processing, Loan Service and Claims, and Property Management). Examples of improved servicing are:

Presently, specially adapted housing (SAH) actions are processed in all four offices by employees who perform varied duties. No one is assigned SAH processing as his/her sole duty. Two offices have centralized authority to approve SAH grants without VA Central Office authority. Manchester and Togus must submit SAH cases to VA Central Office for approval prior to issuing a grant. In the consolidated office, there will be a Specially Adapted Housing Agent whose primary responsibility will be processing SAH applications with centralized authority to approve grants.

The New England offices have a total of 33 properties in their combined inventory. The consolidation of the offices into one Loan Guaranty Division will enhance the processing of acquired property sales. There will be a full-time staff of 3 Realty Specialists compared to a staff of 2 now handling this workload on a part time basis in the four offices. The proposed staffing level will allow adequate staff to conduct property inspections as well as process in-house paperwork.

Servicing of loans is accomplished primarily by telephone; therefore, servicing defaulted loans in a consolidated Manchester office should ordinarily be no different than servicing from the four existing offices. Any delinquent borrower visiting a VA office with no Loan Guaranty division will still be able to receive personal service and Loan Guaranty program information through a Veterans Benefits Counselor (VBC) in the Veterans Services Division at each of the locations. Routine and continuing training of VBC's will be planned and carried out by the consolidated Loan Guaranty Division to keep them informed of policy and regulation changes as well as changes in state law which affect servicing and foreclosure of loans.

VI. Cost impact of the reorganization and supporting analyses:

The estimated cost to close the Togus Loan Guaranty Division and relocate 6 employees to the Manchester Regional Office is estimated at $212,000. This amount includes translocation cost at $204,000 ($34,000 per employee) and $8,000 to move files and supplies. Of course, the transfer of the Togus Loan Guaranty Division is only one part of the overall consolidation. The enclosed cost benefit analysis shows the estimated cost and savings for the entire reorganization.

Estimated costs for consolidation include modification of office space at Manchester and translocation of employees. The All Other Expenses category includes $16,000 for moving files, supplies, furniture and equipment; and $544,000 for translocation of estimated 16 employees at $35,000 each. Office reconfiguration from Minor Construction including furniture is estimated at $400,000.

SAVINGS

Savings result from substantial reduction in the number of FTE needed to operate the consolidated Loan Guaranty activity, reduced SLUC costs due to space savings and reduced ADP equipment needs.

By Mr. CRANSTON (by request):

S. 2102. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to modify the prior congressional "report and wait" restrictions which are imposed upon certain Department of Veterans Affairs administrative reorganizations by section 210(b)(2) of that title; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

MODIFYING "REPORT AND WAIT" RESTRICTIONS ON CERTAIN DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS ADMINISTRATIVE REORGANIZATIONS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I have today introduced, by request, S. 2102, a bill to modify the requirement for advance congressional notification prior to implementation of certain reorganization within the Department of Veterans Affairs. The Secretary of Veterans Affairs submitted this legislation by letter dated January 25, 1990, to the President of the Senate.

My introduction of this measure is in keeping with the policy which I have adopted of generally introducing—so that there will be specific bills to which my colleagues and others may direct their attention and comments—all administration proposed draft legislation referred to the Veterans' Affairs Committee. Thus, I reserve the right to support or oppose the provisions of, as well as any amendment to, this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point, together with the January 25, 1990, transmittal letter.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2102

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Section 210(b)(2) of title 38, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

(2)(A) The Secretary may not in any fiscal year implement an administrative reorganization described in subparagraph (B) of this paragraph unless the Secretary first submits to the appropriate committees of the Congress a report containing a detailed plan and justification for the administrative reorganization. No action to carry out such reorganization may be taken after the submission of such report until the expiration of a 60 day waiting period following the date of the submission of such report. Such 60 day waiting period shall be extended by a period equal to the total number of days during such period that either chamber of the Congress is not in session.

(B) An administrative reorganization described in this subparagraph is an administrative reorganization of a covered field office or facility which involves a reduction during any fiscal year in the number of full-time equivalent employees with permanent duty stations at such offices or facility by 25 percent or more.

(C) Not less than 30 days before the date on which the implementation of any administrative reorganization described in this subparagraph is to begin, the Secretary shall transmit to the Committees on Veterans' Affairs of the Senate and the House of Representatives a notification regarding such reorganization. This subparagraph applies to an administrative reorganization of any unit of the Central Office of the Department of Veterans Affairs that is the duty station for more than 99 employees if the reorganization involves a reduction in any fiscal year in the number of full-time equivalent employees with permanent duty station in such unit by 25 percent or more.

(D) For the purposes of this paragraph—

(i) The term "administrative reorganization" means a consolidation, elimination, abolition, or redistribution of functions under the authority granted the Secretary under the second sentence of paragraph (1) of this subsection. This term does not include a consolidation or redistribution of functions between the Veterans Benefits Administration and Veterans Health Services and Research Administration components at a Department of Veterans Affairs medical and regional office center, provided that following such a consolidation or redistribution of functions the same number of full-time equivalent employees continue to perform the affected functions at that center.

(ii) The term "covered field office or facility" means a Department of Veterans Affairs office or facility outside the Department of Veterans Affairs Central Office that is the permanent duty station for 25 or more employees and that is a regional office, medical center, medical and regional office center, free-standing outpatient clinic, insurance center, or similar field office or facility which has as its primary mission providing care or services to veterans.

(iii) The term "detailed plan and justification" means, with respect to an administrative reorganization, a written report which, at a minimum—

(I) specifies the number of employees by which each covered office or facility affected is to be reduced, the responsibilities of those employees, and the means by which the reduction is to be accomplished;

(II) identifies any existing or planned office or facility at which the number of employees is to be increased and specifies the number and responsibilities of the additional employees at each such office or facility;

(III) describes the changes in the functions carried out at any existing office or facility and the functions to be assigned to an office or facility not in existence on the date that the plan and justification are submitted pursuant to subparagraph (A) of this paragraph;

(IV) explains the reasons for the determination that the reorganization is appropriate and advisable in terms of the statutory missions and long-term goals of the Department of Veterans Affairs;

(V) describes the effects that the reorganization may have on the provision of benefits and services to veterans and dependents of veterans (including the provision of benefits and services through offices and facilities of the Department of Veterans Affairs not directly affected by the reorganization); and

(VI) provides estimates of the costs of the reorganization and of the cost impact of the reorganization, together with analyses supporting those estimates.

SEC. 2. EFFECTIVE DATE. The provisions of Section 210(b)(2) of title 38, United States Code, as amended by this Act, shall apply to any reorganization within the Department of Veterans Affairs which is implemented on or after October 1, 1989.

THE SECRETARY OF VETERANS AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, January 25, 1990.

Hon. DAN QUAYLE,
President of the Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is transmitted herewith a draft bill to modify the Congressional "report and wait" restrictions imposed upon certain Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) administrative reorganizations by section 210(b)(2) of title 38, United States Code, as amended, with the request that it be referred to the appropriate committee for prompt consideration and enactment.

Historically, section 210 provided statutory authority for past Administrators to reorganize the Agency so that changes in mission or programs could be efficiently implemented through organizational change. Section 210 was amended in 1981 to provide that unbridled reorganization would not occur without Congressional input. The amendment required that if a reorganization adversely affected certain organizational components, a notice of the reorganization was required to be submitted generally with the submission of the President's budget, with a waiting period before implementation which permitted Congress to review the proposal. We believe that the constraints of section 210 have unduly affected the ability of the Secretary to efficiently manage the Department. We believe that these constraints can be somewhat relaxed, so that more timely organizational adjustments can be effected, without disturbing the underlying concerns which led to enactment of this section, the reduction of services to veterans. The draft bill is intended to accomplish this end.

Pub. L. No. 97-66 added a new paragraph (2), containing the "report and wait" requirements, to 38 U.S.C. § 210(b). The prior language of subsection 210(b) was retained and redesignated as paragraph 210(b)(1). It contains the basic delegation of authority to the Secretary to organize and manage the Department. The restrictions of paragraph 210(b)(2) apply to any planned VA administrative reorganization which involves a loss or transfer of functions away from a covered VA component resulting in the specified reduction in its number of full-time equivalent employees (FTEE). Under these restrictions the Department cannot implement any covered VA "administrative reorganization" until: (1) a detailed plan and justification has been sent to the appropriate committees of Congress not later than the date the budget for the next fiscal year is submitted to Congress; and (2) the first day of the next fiscal year arrives. Since the budget is submitted in January, the minimum waiting period would be 9 months. Under some circumstances, however, it may not be possible to submit a report by this reporting deadline; in that instance the statute would require the Department to delay a reorganization for as much as 21 months, until the first day of the next following fiscal year.

The legislative history of Pub. L. No. 97-66 indicates the purposes of the above VA reorganization restrictions were to protect the quality and levels of VA care and service, and to ensure the integrity and efficiency of program operations. We are proposing amendments to these restrictions which we believe preserve the true intent of Pub. L. No. 97-66, while enabling this Department to better and more efficiently achieve these ends. In the present budget climate VA, like other Departments and agencies, must utilize resources more efficiently. Also, because of demographic and other changes, the number and location of VA beneficiaries eligible for VA benefits, care, and treatment is changing. With fiscal limitations, a rapidly changing beneficiary profile, and the availability of new management and support technology, mainly computerization, we need greater flexibility to make timely organizational adjustments. It is simply inefficent and counterproductive to continue restrictions which impose a waiting period of up to 21 months upon any significant plan by VA management to adapt the VA organizational structure to these realities.

In order to establish a better balance between the need for VA to change and adapt, and the needs of oversight committees to have advance notice of significant VA reorganizations, the draft bill would amend the "report and wait" restrictions in five ways. First and foremost, it would shorten the lengthy waiting period presently required, following submission of the detailed plan and justification for a covered administrative reorganization, to 60 days. While the report could be submitted at any time, the 60 days waiting period would not run on any day that either chamber of Congress is not in session. This change would remove a principal difficulty which the VA now has with these restrictions. The delays and uncertainty caused by a long waiting period unduly limit VA management's ability to effect organizational change where such change is necessary and prudent in the efficent operation of Department programs and resources.

Second, the draft bill would modify reporting requirements for reorganizations within VA Central Office by limiting such requirements only to reorganizations which involve a 25 percent FTEE reduction in one fiscal year at a Central Office unit which has 100 or more employees, and would eliminate the combined two consecutive fiscal year FTEE reduction test. The proposed restriction would require only 30 days prior notice of such reorganizations of Central Office units. Section 210(b)(2)(B)(ii) now makes administrative reorganizations of a Central Office unit which has 100 or more employees subject to the full "report and wait" restrictions of section 210(b)(2)(A). The net effect of this proposed change would be to make only the 30 days prior notice applicable to reorganizations within Central Office, and such notice would be applicable only where the requisite function loss and FTEE cut results at a Central Office unit with 100 or more employees.

Third, the draft bill would amend the section 210(b)(2)(D)(iii) definition of a "covered field office or facility" to make "report and wait" restrictions applicable only at those offices or facilities which have 25 or more employees and which have as their primary mission providing care or services to veterans. This amendment would continue section 210(b)(2) coverage at all VA regional offices, medical centers, medical and regional office centers, insurance centers, free-standing outpatient clinics, and similar field offices or facilities. However, VA management and support facilities, such as data processing centers, finance centers, medical region management offices, supply depots and record centers, etc., would no longer be covered. This change is intended to limit section 210(b)(2) coverage to those VA field offices or facilities which have as their primary mission providing direct care or services to veterans, since it was such care and services which these restrictions were primarily intended to protect.

Fourth, the draft bill would amend section 210(b)(2)(B) to increase the size of the FTEE reduction required for an administrative reorganization which must be reported at a covered field office or facility from 10 percent to 25 percent in any one fiscal year. The combined 15 percent FTEE reduction test for two consecutive fiscal years, as set out in section 210(b)(2)(B)(i)(II),would be deleted. This change would raise the size of a reduction which must be reported to a more reasonable level. Presently, a transfer of as few as three to five FTEE at a field facility could be subject to these restrictions. For example, a recent proposed transfer of only six FTEE from the regional office component of a VA Medical and Regional Office Center (VAM&ROC) was examined and found to be a reportable reorganization within the literal meaning of section 210(b)(2) in its present form. Such a limitation on the Secretary's ability to manage the Department neither serves the best interests of our veteran constituency nor the legitimate oversight needs of the Congress.

Finally, the draft bill would amend the section 210(b)(2)(D)(i) definition of an "administrative reorganization" subject to these requirements to expressly provide that that term does not include any consolidation or redistribution of functions between components at a VAM&ROC, provided that following such a change the same number of FTEE continue to perform the same functions at that VAM&ROC. This change is proposed because it was recently determined that the transfer of support functions and FTEE between the Veterans Benefits Administration (VBA) and Veterans Health Services and Research Administration (VHS&RA) components at a VAM&ROC, even though no functions or FTEE were lost at the VAM&ROC, was subject to the "report and wait" restrictions. In this situation, VBA and VHS&RA agreed to transfer the FTEE in certain support functions from VBA to VHS&RA. Although the VAM&ROC had the same people, in the same place, performing the same functions, it was a reportable reorganization because VBA no longer performed these support functions and no longer retained the FTEE to support these functions.

Although the "report and wait" statutory restrictions were somewhat liberalized in 1988 by section 15 of Pub. L. No. 100-527, the statute still, on occasions, creates an artificial impediment to the proper and efficient management of the Department. Even comparatively minor reorganizations, for which the Congress presumably has absolutely no reservations, such as the realignment mentioned in the prior paragraph, cannot be implemented prior to the following fiscal year unless a special exempting law is enacted. In the press of other Congressional business such a legislative waiver may not be considered and enacted by the Congress notwithstanding the fact that no inherent objection exists. Moreover, we would submit that it simply should not require an Act of Congress to permit timely implementation of planned VA administrative reorganizations which are comparatively minor and noncontroversial. Given these circumstances, we recommend that the enclosed provisions amending paragraph (b)(2) of section 210 of title 38, United States Code, be enacted in order to further modify these "report and wait" restrictions for certain types of VA administrative reorganizations.

VA has had a long history of close and frank cooperation with those committees which have VA oversight responsibility. This relationship has ensured, and will continue to ensure, that any significant Department reorganization will take place only after discussion of such reorganization with our oversight committees. These committees have always carefully evaluated any significant VA proposal, including significant planned reorganizations. As a former Member, one of my highest priorities is to continue and improve upon this good working relationship and spirit of cooperation with our oversight committees, but it is, simply, time to relax the overly restrictive provisions of Section 210(b)(2).

We will be happy to provide any additional information concerning this proposal.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that there is no objection to the submission of this legislative proposal to the Congress and that its enactment would be in accordance with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. DERWINSKI.

By Mr. CRANSTON (by request):

S. 2103. A bill to waive the reporting and waiting period requirements of section 210(b)(2) of title 38, United States Code, for a planned administrative reorganization of the regional field offices of the Veterans Health Services and Research Administration; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

VETERANS HEALTH SERVICES AND RESEARCH ADMINISTRATION REORGANIZATION

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I have today introduced, by request, S. 2103, to waive the reporting and waiting period requirements of section 210(b)(2) of title 38, United States Code, for a planned administrative reorganization of the regional field offices of the Veterans Health Services and Research Administration. The Secretary of Veterans Affairs submitted this legislation by letter dated February 7, 1990, to the President of the Senate.

My introduction of this measure is in keeping with the policy which I have adopted of generally introducing—so that there will be specific bills to which my colleagues and others may direct their attention and comments—all administration-proposed draft legislation referred to the Veterans' Affairs Committee. Thus, I reserve the right to support or oppose the provisions of, as well as any amendment to, this legislation.

At our committee's February 23, 1990, hearing the committee will be receiving testimony on this administration-requested legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point, together with the February 7, 1990, transmittal letter and the Secretary's January 22, 1990, letter to me, with enclosures, providing VA's justification for reorganization.

S. 2103

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary may implement an administrative reorganization within the Department of Veterans Affairs to reduce from seven to four the number of regional field offices of the Veterans Health Services and Research Administration without regard to the reporting requirement and waiting period provided for by section 210(b)(2) of title 38, United States Code.

THE SECRETARY OF VETERANS AFFAIRS,
Washington, February 6, 1990.

Hon. DAN QUAYLE,
President of the United States Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is transmitted herewith a draft bill "To waive the reporting and waiting period requirements of section 210(b)(2) of title 38, United States Code, for a planned administrative reorganization of the regional field offices of the Veterans Health Services and Research Administration," with the request that it be referred to the appropriate committee for prompt consideration and enactment.

The reasons for submitting this draft legislation are discussed in some detail in a report, submitted to our oversight committees pursuant to 38 U.S.C. § 210(b)(2), regarding a critically important reorganization of our regional medical field offices.

In essence, we must, in my judgment, reorganize the field offices to overcome a real lack of administrative uniformity in the VA medical system. We have found wide variation—from region to region and hospital to hospital—on so basic a matter as whether a veteran will or will not receive needed VA care. Such uncertainty often stems from the policy or practice of the particular medical facility or of the regional office to which that facility reports.

My responsibilities to our veterans, to the President, and to the Congress demand that VA do more toward achieving greater operational uniformity in our health care system. In that quest, wide ranging consultations led me to the judgment that only a substantial reorganization of the management structure of our Veterans Health Services and Research Administration (VHS&RA) field operations would yield the consistency in health care delivery that our veterans deserve. In my view, streamlining the organization by reducing the number of regional field offices from seven to four is critical to achieving greater consistency.

Section 210(b) of title 38, U.S. Code, governing certain administrative reorganizations within the VA, would, however preclude my carrying out that planned streamlining until Fiscal Year 1991. We are proposing this legislation, accordingly, to waive the statutory waiting period. Its enactment is critical to making our health care system more responsive to veterans' needs. Its enactment is also necessary to permit VA to set in motion the many implementing, logistical steps involved in restructuring the new regions. We can only begin to take such steps after the law's waiting period is lifted. Delay, on the other hand, could jeopardize this important opportunity to improve our health care system and might also erode past gains.

Although we have initiated this reorganization to improve the administration of VA health care delivery, it will yield savings once the restructuring is completed. We intend to apply those administrative savings to augment staffing for direct patient care. The reorganization process itself would necessarily involve short-term costs. We estimate that enactment of this measure early in this session of Congress would thus result in costs in Fiscal Year 1990 of some $7.7 million which will be absorbed within the existing Medical Care operating budget. However, significant cost recoveries of approximately $4 million, in each subsequent year, are expected to result from this reorganization.

Thank you for your consideration of this draft bill.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that there is no objection from the standpoint of the Administration's program to the submission of this report and legislative proposal to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. DERWINSKI.

THE SECRETARY OF VETERANS AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 22, 1990.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
Committee on Veterans' Affairs, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: From my earliest days as Secretary of Veterans Affairs, I have received many reports of inconsistency in veterans' access to VA health care.

On virtually a daily basis, elected representatives from across the country have written and called me to document the existence of differing "VA" policies—from region to region and even among hospitals within close proximity—which affect whether or not a veteran will or will not receive needed care. My travels to VA facilities and meetings with medical administrators at all levels have borne out these accounts. My responsibilities to our veterans, to the President, and to the Congress demand that VA do a better job at achieving greater operational uniformity in our health care system.

Wide-ranging consultations, which included discussions with the Chief Medical Director and the Regional Directors, led me to the judgment that a substantial reorganization of the management structure of our Veterans Health Services and Research Administration (VHS&RA) field operations was needed to attain the consistency in health care delivery that our veterans deserve.

Consequently, I directed the Chief Medical Director, last August, to prepare to implement a reorganization with which I know you are familiar. That directive generally called for phasing out district offices and cutting the number of medical regions. Certainly, that step was not taken lightly or without careful regard for the dislocation it might mean for many dedicated VHS&RA employees.

In my judgment, however, this step is necessary to assure that our health care system remains viable over the long term. Medical districts represent an extra layer of management which I simply cannot justify. Larger issues of VHS&RA management and accountability underlie the proposed reorganization of our medical regions. That administrative reorganization is the subject of the enclosed report, required under 38 U.S.C. 210(b).

In submitting that report, let me underscore the critical goals it sets out to achieve. Rather than simply consolidating and realigning offices, this reorganization seeks to remedy the unacceptable variation in policy interpretation and implementation that has emerged under a seven-region structure. Reducing the number of regions and the number of regional directors will facilitate a return to strong, centralized policy-making and will reinforce management accountability. The restructuring aims, therefore, to strike a better balance between our needs for management flexibility at our local facilities and system-wide operational uniformity based on national policy.

In my judgment, the streamlined organization described in our report—while not the only approach I considered—will best carry out my management goals. This structure will encourage greater emphasis on centralized policy-making and operational implementation of those policies by the regional directors. In my view, reducing the number of regions and regional directors from seven to four is critical to achieving greater consistency.

Our plan to phase out the 27 medical districts by March 31, 1990, does not constitute an administrative reorganization subject to the requirements of Section 210(b). I believe it is important, nevertheless, to assure you and Congress generally that eliminating this administrative layer will serve the best interests of our patients and will not diminish VA's responsiveness to congressional concerns. To the contrary, it is a critical component of a restructuring which, I believe will make VHS&RA more responsive. Moreover, the administrative savings we hope to achieve once the restructuring is completed offer the opportunity to augment staffing for direct patient care.

Finally, let me acknowledge that in enacting the provisions of law codified at Section 210(b) of 38 U.S.C., Congress established a mechanism to permit itself the opportunity to oversee certain proposed administrative reorganizations. While respectful of that important function, I intend to submit draft legislation to permit us to reorganize as soon as possible. The enactment of such legislation will be critical to permit VA to set in motion the many necessary steps involved in restructuring the new regions—particularly in helping dedicated employees find new positions as soon as possible. Such steps can really only begin after the law's waiting period is lifted. I request your support for this draft legislation.

We hope we have earned your support of our important effort to strengthen management of our medical care system, and trust that our enclosed report will answer such questions as you may have.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that there is no objection from the standpoint of the Administration's program to the submission of this report and legislative proposal to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. DERWINSKI.

REORGANIZATION OF VHS&RA REGIONS, 1989—REPORT TO CONGRESS, TITLE 38 U.S. CODE, SECTION 210(b)(2)

I. Purpose: The purpose of this report is to describe the planned reorganization of the Veterans Health Services and Research Administration's (VHS&RA) regional structure and its impact on service delivery and resource utilization.

II. Background: A pressing concern which has confronted the VA throughout this Administration is the degree to which access to VA health care is determined or influenced by the policy or practice of the particular health care facility at which a veteran seeks care rather than by national policy. This inconsistency and unpredictability are untenable in themselves and at odds with sound management principles as well as with VA's responsibilities under law. Wide-ranging examination of the management of VA's health care system in light of this concern led to the conclusion that the lack of uniformity in access to VA health care is inextricably linked to a pattern of decentralized decision-making within VHS&RA that is reinforced by the organization of its field operations.

It was determined on the basis of extensive consultations, including discussions with the Chief Medical Director, that a reorganization of VHS&RA's field operations was necessary to achieve the desired improvements in the uniformity of policy implementation and equity of access to medical care. Accordingly, the Secretary's memorandum of August 25, 1989 (Appendix A), to the Chief Medical Director (CMD), establishes the rationale and parameters for a reorganization of VHS&RA field operations. The reorganization phases out the 27 Medical Districts by March 31, 1990, and reduces the number of regions from seven to three. The August 25 memorandum describes the benefits to be achieved as follows:

Greater balance between the operational uniformity of the system and management flexibility for individual facilities;

More efficient use of resources and improved communications by removing duplicative functions and administrative layers;

Redeployment of resources, including personnel to support direct patient care;

Increased accountability for implementation of centralized policy; and Greater uniformity among regions of access to health care services.

The Secretary indicated that the proposed reorganization would be reported to Congress, in compliance with requirements of 38 U.S.C. 210(b)(2), with the FY 1991 budget submission. The CMD was asked to develop an implementation plan, including potential regional boundaries and field office locations, staffing requirements for field offices and VACO Regional Director's (RD) offices, and an estimate of recovered resources that could be redirected to patient care. These features of the reorganization are described in subsequent sections of this report.

III. Discussion:

1. Description of the Current Organization.

In accordance with 38 U.S.C., Section 4103, the current VHS&RA organization is headed by the CMD, who is directly responsible to the Secretary for operation of the Agency. To assist the CMD in carrying out operational responsibilities there are two line officials: the Deputy Chief Medical Director (DCMD), who serves as VHS&RA's Chief Operating Officer, and the Associate Deputy Chief Medical Director (ADCMD), who reports to the DCMD and is responsible for integrating line and program management responsibilities. A staff of approximately 557 (cumulative FTEE as of November 4, 1989) assist in the program, staff and operational functions of Central Office.

VHS&RA field elements consist of 172 medical centers (VAMCs), 233 outpatient clinics, 119 nursing home care units, 29 domiciliaries, 194 Vietnam Veteran Outreach Centers and various support units (ISCs, RMECs, etc.). The VHS&RA field elements are assigned to seven regions which are further divided into 27 medical districts. Each Region/Medical District encompasses specific geographic areas comprising all medical facilities available to the VA (including VA-operated facilities, State Veterans Homes and contracted services) within those areas.

a. Regional Directors.

The Regional Directors (RDs) report directly to the ADCMD. Each RD is physically located in the field and directly oversees a field office and staff of between 21 and 29 FTEE. The authorized core ceiling for the regional field offices is 196 FTEE. Although some regions are larger geographically than others, they are organized so that patient population, staff and financial resources are distributed equally among them. A Deputy Regional Director and approximately 4 FTEE provide the RD with an operational arm in VACO.

On several occasions since 1979, increased authority and responsibility have been delegated from central office to the regions and field facilities, most notably in the areas of program planning (MEDIPP), resource management (RAM), and quality assurance (SERP/MEDIPRO). Conversely, responsibility for information resources management (IRM) support (ISCs) has been centralized from the RDs to the Director, MIRMO in a 1987 realignment.

The RDs are delegated authority and responsibility for operations and the management of quality in field facilities. In addition to directing the activities of their immediate offices, the RDs are responsible for the specific functions that follow:

(1) Facility Operations—This function encompasses the following programmatic areas that are operational in nature:

Resource Management—Budget development and execution, financial planning and analysis, resource management site visits, data validation, monthly financial status reports, workload and employment monitoring, cost screens, reporting systems, funding transactions.

Planning—Regional strategic and implementation plans, mission analysis, demographic/market analysis, VA/DoD contingency planning, program planning, workload projection methodologies, needs assessments, facility development planning, planning board activities.

Construction—Construction program prioritization, facility five-year plans, allocations and tracking of project resources, activations, liaison with Office of Facilities, facility development planning, review and allocation of the Non-Recurring Maintenance (NRM) program.

Medical Center/Patient Communications—Responding to Congressional and consumer inquiries, public relations, news releases and publications, special events planning.

Human Resources—Personnel activities, Directors' performance monitoring, disciplinary actions, position descriptions, recruitment, commendations/awards programs, Equal Employment Opportunity (EEO) consultation and resolution, education and development activities, liaison with Regional Medical Education Centers (RMECs).

Information Resources Management (IRM)—Network development, Decentralized Hospital Computer Program (DHCP) functions, IRM security, regional office data processing, data collection and analysis, regional IRM initiatives, special projects, programmatic support.

(2) Quality Management—This function encompasses the following programmatic areas.

Risk Management—Patient Injury Control Program, tort claims analysis, OMB Circular A-123 oversight, occurrence screening.

Internal and External Review—Credentialing and privileging compliance, oversight and consultation for all Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations (JCAHO) and other external review field activities, Regional Review Program, participation in all surveys.

Nursing—Staff development, Nursing Service personnel issues, special salary rates, policy guidance.

Safety and Health—Employee safety programs are required by P.L. 91-596. Annual inspections, compliance with Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) and Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) regulations, waste management, accident statistics, JCAHO Fire and Safety criteria, review of construction projects.

b. Medical Districts.

The seven regions are further divided into 27 medical districts, each comprised of four to seven VA Medical Centers (VAMCs) and headed by a Medical District Director (MDD) appointed by the CMD from among Medical Center Directors in a given district. Historically, the MDD's role has been to advise the RD on distribution of resources and planning of the district's healthcare services. However, MDDs exercise no line authority over the district VAMCs. The medical district operates as a consortium in planning (MEDIPP), quality assurance (MEDIPRO), and environmental management programs, and joint program sharing/service delivery efforts. District staffs of eight to ten FTEE support these programs and have had a significant role in data collection, analysis and development of recommendations for management review at both the district and regional levels. Figure 1 (not printed) depicts the current VHS&RA organization and Figure 2 (not printed) depicts the current geographical boundaries of VHS&RA regions and medical districts.

The seven current VHS&RA regions are comprised of healthcare facilities in the following states (the list also includes the Philippine Islands, Guam, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, and the District of Columbia; Regional boundaries are not drawn to correspond with state lines; therefore a state may fall in more than one region.

Region 1—Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Puerto Rico, Virgin Is.

Region 2—Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, District of Columbia, Maryland, part of Tennessee, part of Kentucky, part of Ohio.

Region 3—South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, part of Kentucky, part of Tennessee, part of Indiana.

Region 4—Part of Ohio, part of Indiana, Michigan, part of Wisconsin, part of Illinois.

Region 5—Minnesota, Utah, Colorado, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, part of Ilinois, part of Idaho, part of Wisconsin, part of Nevada.

Region 6—Part of Idaho, Washington, Oregon, California, part of Nevada, Alaska, Hawaii, Guam, Philippine Is.

Region 7—Arizona, New Mexico, Louisiana, Texas, Oklahoma, Arkansas.

2. Description of the Proposed Organization.

A. Geographic Boundaries.

After careful analysis, the CMD recommended, and the Secretary approved, a four-region structure as the best of considered alternatives to achieve improvements in policy implementation, accountability and equity of access to VHS&RA services. The following criteria were used to define regional boundaries:

Drawing regional boundaries consistent with State lines;

Structuring regional boundaries that include natural patient referral patterns in each region;

Achieving the best possible balance of facilities, veteran population, and resources in each region; and Retaining, where possible, existing regional office facilities.

b. Location of Field Offices.

Potential sites for the location of the four regional field offices were compared against significant demographic, travel, cost data an other considerations. Based on these analyses the following sites were selected for the Regional Directors' field offices: Region 1: Baltimore, Maryland; Region 2: Ann Arbor, Michigan; Region 3: Jackson, Mississippi; and Region 4: San Francisco, California. Figure 3 (not printed) depicts the reconfigured region boundaries and the Regional Directors' field office locations.

The following describes the reconfigured regions as depicted in Figure 3: The four proposed regions are comprised of healthcare facilities in the following states. The list also includes Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, District of Columbia, Guam, and the Philippine Islands). New regional boundaries correspond to state lines.

Region 1—Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, District of Columbia.

Region 2—Ohio, Michigan Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas.

Region 3—North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Arkansas, Louisiana, Oklahoma, Texas, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands.

Region 4—Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, Nevada, California, Alaska, Hawaii, Guam, Philippine Islands.

c. Functions.

Four region headquarters offices will be established to perform the major functions of facility operations and quality management, as described for the current organization. These functions will essentially remain unchanged except for the addition of some planning, peer review and fire, safety and industrial hygiene functions that were previously performed by the Medical Districts. The added regional functions are described as follows:

Planning—the district planning process will be replaced by a regional planning process. Central Office will provide overall direction, while the region oversees facility-based grass roots planning activities. Functioning as planning units grouped by common referral patterns, facilities will collectively plan for the vertical integration of services. Regional planners, the majority of whom will be located at the medical centers, will be responsible for data collection and analysis and coordinating planning efforts among facilities. Regional Planning Boards will continue to review plans, establish priorities and identify opportunities to share resources. Planning and construction responsibilities will be combined in one position, located at a planning unit site, to oversee planning, Facility Development Plans (FDP), and construction management.

Quality Management—Congress has mandated VHS&RA to implement objective, criteria-based, physician-directed peer reviews, which have been the responsibility of Medical District Peer Review Organization (MEDIPRO) Boards. Studies are designed by the Boards, data collected by clinical evaluators based in VAMCs, and analysis and reporting are performed by the Boards. Existing district- and region-based quality assurance activities, including peer review, monitoring implementation of and compliance with QA policies, and technical assistance activities will be integrated into a total quality management approach. Under the new structure, clinical evaluators, reporting to the RD, but housed in VAMCs, will collect peer review data. Analysis will be performed by regional peer review boards organized to conform with the quality management structure.

Safety and Health—Responsibilities will continue to include employee safety programs as required by P.L. 91-596 and other monitoring activities, such as, annual inspections, compliance with Occupation Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) and Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) regulations, waste management, accident statistics, JCAHO Fire and Safety criteria, and review of construction projects. District-based staff performing these functions will be located in RD offices and VAMCs.

d. Staffing.

The accretion of medical district functions, coupled with the reduction in the number of regions from seven to four, will result in an increase in the staffing of each regional office from an average of 28 FTEE to a range of 91 to 97, allowing for variation in management style and program requirements. The number of certain categories of personnel, for example planners, is based on the ratio of staff to facility groupings as determined by patient referral patterns, medical center complexities, and transportation factors. Staffing levels for other categories of personnel, for example resource management specialists, are less dependent on the number and configuration of facilities. The estimated staff required to perform designated functions in a given region are indicated below.

(1) Field Office Staffing.

Top Management. This includes the Regional Director and a Deputy RD in the field, and their immediate staff. Estimated staffing—6 FTEE (not including the RD and VACO-based Deputy).

Quality Management. Includes peer review, risk management, internal and external review, nursing, safety, and health. Estimated staffing—45-49 FTEE (approximately 28 of this number will be located in VAMCs).

Facility operations. Includes resource management, planning, construction, medical center/patient communications, human resources, and IRM. Estimated staffing: 40-42 FTEE (8 of this number will be located in VAMCs).

(2) VACO Staffing.

Staffing of RD offices in VACO will essentially remain unchanged. A second Deputy RD, for each of the four regions, will be located in VACO to represent the RD and perform as a full assistant. The number of health system specialists is facility dependent, therefore the same number is required as presently exists. Support staff requirements will not change.

e. Collateral Programs.

The Regional Medical Education Centers (RMEC), Information System Centers (ISC) and the Regional Manager Offices (RMO) for Readjustment Counseling Service are also regionally based. However, these programs serve individual medical facilities and their effectiveness is not tied to regional configurations. Respectively, the ACMD for Academic Affairs, the Director, MIRMO and the Director, Readjustment Counseling Service have line responsibility for these field elements. The present structure of these organizations will be retained, but they will be reviewed at a later date to ensure that they continue to provide appropriate service and are responsive to needs emerging from the regional restructuring.

Overall the reorganization will result in significant cost recovery over a five year period of $8.4 million. This recovery results from a major reduction in total district/regional (field) staffing. The reorganization will redirect approximately 85 FTEE now employed in the medical districts and/or regions to perform functions at VA medical centers in support of VHS&RA's patient care missions. In FY 1990 approximately $2.4 million will be recovered from a combination of sources, including: $2.0 million (personal services funds for 85 FTEE as described above); $.25 million (costs avoided in closing RD offices in such accounts as leases, maintenance agreements, telecommunications expenses, etc.); and, $.2 million (recovery of two SES positions). In the outyears 1991-4 the reorganization will recover approximately $16.1 million. Below is a summary of the projected costs and recoveries of the reorganization.

SUMMARY START-UP AND OUTYEAR COST OF REORGANIZATION FISCAL YEAR 1990–94

[In thousands of dollars]

	Fiscal Year—
	1990	1991	1992	1993	1994
Costs	10,169
Recoveries	(2,444)	(4,034)	(4,034)	(4,034)	(4,034)
Net Cost/Recovery	7,725	(4,034)	(4,034)	(4,034)	(4,034)

Appendix B contains a more detailed analysis of costs and recoveries associated with the reorganization.

V. JUSTIFICATION. The reorganization of VHS&RA's field operations is determined to be appropriate and advisable in terms of the statutory missions and long term goals of the Department of Veterans Affairs. It will enhance accomplishment of VHS&RA's primary mission: to provide the highest quality of healthcare services to eligible veterans, while also maintaining the continuity of structures and systems that support the other missions of education, research and Department of Defense contingency.

The purpose of the reorganization is to improve service to veterans. Rather than simply consolidating and realigning offices, this reorganization will remedy the variation in policy interpretation and implementation that has emerged under a seven-region structure. Reducing the number of regions and the number of regional directors will result in strengthened centralized policy-making, more uniform policy implementation and greater management accountability. The new organization will create a better balance between management flexibility at the medical centers and system-wide operational uniformity based on national policy.

Reducing the number of regions is critical to achieving consistency and equity of access to services throughout the VA healthcare system. An additional benefit of reducing the number of regional field offices, when coupled with the elimination of the 27 medical districts, is the opportunity to recover resources from these administrative activities and redirect them to support patient care. The streamlined organization described in this report will best carry out these management goals.

APPENDIX A

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION MEMORANDUM

Date: August 25, 1989.
From: Secretary (00).
Subj: VHS&RA Field Structure.
To: Chief Medical Director (10).

1. Veterans' medical programs must be operated on a consistent basis nationwide, and the issuance of policy from Central Office cannot alone accomplish that end. A responsive management structure in the Veterans Health Services and Research Administration is equally critical to success in our system of geographically dispersed, largely independent medical facilities.

2. As we have discussed numerous times, I am not convinced we are currently achieving the proper balance between two needs: (1) operational uniformity for the system as a whole, and (2) local management flexibility for individual facillities. Budgets that call for greater efficiency at a time of increasing demands upon the system make the need to address these matters even more pressing.

3. Over the past several months, we have consulted with knowledgeable parties on the management of VHS&RA field operations, both in and outside VA. We found near consensus regarding the medical districts whose functions as defined are seen as duplicative in view of the regions' line authority and accordingly creates administrative layering which is costly and impedes communication between Central Office and the medical centers. It is also evident the regions themselves have developed considerable variation in their management processes despite the existence of centralized policy guidance and directives. The result has been insufficient management accountability—an unacceptable price to pay for permitting greater regional and local discretion in operations. We must strive for greater uniformity especially in the area of access to care for our nation's veterans irrespective of the region where they reside.

4. After weighing many factors, I have made the following decisions:

(a) That we should begin to phase out the Districts, folding certain elements of grassroots planning and MEDIPRO into the Regions. This should begin immediately, and end no later than March 31, 1990.

(b) That we should cut the number of Regions from seven to three, along the lines of the attached map. This proposal will be reported to the appropriate Congressional committees with the transmittal of the FY 91 Budget. However, planning for this should begin immediately so we are able to implement this change as soon as Congressional clearance is obtained.

5. Please submit to me within 30 days an implementation plan for the new three-region structure for VHS&RA which would address the following considerations:

(a) Resource savings that will result, and will be used to provide additional direct patient care in the respective regions.

(b) Site location, bearing in mind logical demographics and ease of travel.

(c) Staffing patterns for each Region for both Central Office and the field, assuming the Regional Directors will remain in the field.

6. Within the next two weeks I would like to meet with you to discuss selection of the three Regional Directors and the geographic locations of their offices.

EDWARD J. DERWINSKI.

APPENDIX B

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS, VETERANS HEALTH SERVICES AND RESEARCH ADMINISTRATION, SUMMARY OF REORGANIZATION COSTS/RECOVERIES

ASSUMPTIONS

1. Reorganization will result in a four region structure. Existing regional offices will be closed in Albany, NY; Durham, NC; Gainesville, FL; Dallas, TX; and St. Louis, MO.

2. New regional offices will be activated in Baltimore, MD and Jackson, MS. Structure and staffing of these offices will be as recommended in the CMD's November 6, 1989, proposal to the Secretary.

3. Two Regional Offices in Ann Arbor, MI and San Francisco, CA will be expanded. Structure and staffing of these offices will be as recommended in the CMD's November 6, 1989, proposal to the Secretary.

4. Twenty-seven Medical Districts will be phased out NLT March 31, 1990. Activation of the new four region structure will occur on March 31, 1990. Assumes that a waiver to 210(b) will be grantd early in CY 1990.

5. The projected costs of this reorganization are one-time, non-recurring expenses. The resources associated with recovery of 85 FTEE from total region and district staff are recurring (per FTEE salary/benefits is $47,453).

6. The new regions will have a staffing complement of approximately 94 FTEE (fifty-eight will be located at the regional field office and thirty-six will be VAMC based; journalized to the region). As a result of the reorganization approximately 215 employees will be relocated throughout the system. The average cost per relocation is $40,000.

7. Two SES positions will be recovered from the reorganization (7-region structure requires 14 SES positions; 4-region structure requires 12 SES positions).

S. 2104. A bill to amend the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to restore and strengthen civil rights laws that ban discrimination in employment, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1990

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on behalf of Senator JEFFORDS and Senators METZENBAUM, DURENBERGER, GORE, HATFIELD, MIKULSKI, PACKWOOD, PELL, SIMON, ADAMS, BIDEN, BINGAMAN, BRADLEY, BURDICK, COHEN, CONRAD, CRANSTON, DODD, FOWLER, HARKIN, INOUYE, KERREY, KERRY, KOHL, LAUTENBERG, LEAHY, LEVIN, MATSUNAGA, MITCHELL, MOYNIHAN, RIEGLE, SARBANES, SPECTER, WIRTH, and I introduce the Civil Rights Act of 1990.

From the beginning, civil rights has been the unfinished business of America—and it still is. In the past 35 years, America has made significant progress in removing the stain of bigotry and segregation from our land. We have had our own ongoing peaceful revolution, and its accomplishments are a tribute to the remarkable resilience of our democracy and its institutions.

In achieving this progress, the role of one of these institutions—the Supreme Court—has been indispensable. For a generation, a long line of landmark decisions has kept the Nation true to the standard of the Constitution and the principle of equal justice under law.

In the past year, however, the Supreme Court has issued a series of rulings that mark an abrupt and unfortunate departure from its historic vigilance in protecting civil rights. The fabric of justice has been torn. Significant gaps have been opened in the existing laws that prohibit racism and other types of bias in our society.

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 is intended to overturn these Court decisions and restore and strengthen these basic laws.

The Patterson decision, interpreting an 1866 civil rights law, drew an artificial distinction that prohibits race discrimination in hiring workers, but leaves workers on the job unprotected from harassment or from being fired or denied promotion because of racial prejudice. At a single stroke, the Supreme Court nullified the only Federal antidiscrimination law applicable to the 11 million workers in the 3.7 million firms with fewer than 15 employees. Already, the damage is unmistakable. The Patterson decision has caused the dismissial of at least 96 claims of race discrimination in the past 8 months—and it should be overruled by Congress.

In the Wards Cove decision, the Court unfairly shifted a key burden of proof from employers to employees, in cases involving practices that operate to exclude minorities and women. Hundreds of cases in the past two decades have struck down subtle and not-so-subtle practices designed to keep minorities and women from participating fully and fairly in our economy. By shifting the burden of proof to workers, the Supreme Court has made it far more difficult and expensive for victims of discrimination to challenge the barriers they face.

Wards Cove was a 5 to 4 decision in 1989 that overruled the unanimous Griggs decision by Chief Justice Burger in 1971. Chief Justice Burger was right in 1971, and Congress should restore the law in 1990.

What is at stake in this apparently technical restoration of the law is of profound importance for the future of our country. Ninety-one percent of the growth in the Nation's work force in the 1990's will be women and minorities. If America is to compete successfully in the world, Congress cannot look the other way while the Supreme Court erects artificial and senseless barriers to their full participation in our economy.

My friend and colleague, Senator HOWARD METZENBAUM, has previously introduced S. 1261, a measure to overrule the Wards Cove decision, which has been substantially incorporated into the Civil Rights Act of 1990; and I am pleased that he is a cosponsor of this important legislation.

In a third objectionable decision, Martin versus Wilks, the Court held that consent decrees settling job discrimination cases may be reopened in future lawsuits. In the wake of that decision, longstanding decrees have been challenged in new lawsuits in cities across America. The Civil Rights Act proposes fair procedures to limit this endless litigation and ensure that fairly settled cases stay settled.

The act also contains a number of provisions to fill additional gaps in our antidiscrimination laws resulting from other Supreme Court decisions and to ensure fair and effective civil rights enforcement.

For example, victims of sexual harassment on the job currently have no effective Federal remedy. The act will close this serious loophole by granting victims of intentional discrimination the right to recover compensatory damages, and, in particularly flagrant cases, punitive damages as well.

Finally, one subject not addressed in our bill deserves mention. The rhetorical smoke screen that our opponents are already laying down is a blatant attempt to divert this important civil rights debate into a dead-end debate over quotas, minority set-asides and affirmative action. That is not the measure we are proposing. The bill does not address those questions, and it does not require quotas. The same die-hard opponents of civil rights will attempt to derail this legislation, just as they have attempted to block every other civil rights bill in Congress in recent years.

Second only to the Supreme Court, the bipartisan coalition for civil rights in Congress has been a powerful force for justice and equality of opportunity in America. All of us here today regret the Supreme Court's recent change of course, and we hope that it is only fleeting.

But as Senators and Representatives from both parties committed to civil rights, we intend to see this battle through. The Bush Administration has expressed a wait-and-see attitude about the need for this legislation. But our case is strong and our cause is just. As our bill moves through Congress, I urge the President to join us in enacting it this year. This is no time for Congress, the White House or America to retreat on civil rights.

I urge my colleagues to support the Civil Rights Act of 1990.

I am unanimous consent that the text of the bill and a detailed summary be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2104

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Civil Rights Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress finds that—

(1) in a series of recent decisions addressing employment discrimination claims under Federal law, the Supreme Court cut back dramatically on the scope and effectiveness of civil rights protections; and

(2) existing protections and remedies under Federal law are not adequate to deter unlawful discrimination or to compensate victims of such discrimination.

(b) PURPOSES.—The purposes of this Act are—

(1) to respond to the Supreme Court's recent decisions by restoring the civil rights protections that were dramatically limited by those decisions; and

(2) to strengthen existing protections and remedies available under Federal civil rights laws to provide more effective deterrence and adequate compensation for victims of discrimination.

SEC. 3. DEFINITIONS.

Section 701 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000e) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(l) The term 'complaining party' means the Commission, the Attorney General, or a person who may bring an action or proceeding under this title.

"(m) The term 'demonstrates' means meets the burdens of production and persuasion.

"(n) The term 'group of employment practices' means a combination of employment practices or an overall employment process.

"(o) The term 'required by business necessity' means essential to effective job performance.

"(p) The term 'respondent' means an employer, employment agency, labor organization, joint labor-management committee, or those Federal entities subject to the provisions of section 717.".

SEC. 4. RESTORING THE BURDEN OF PROOF IN DISPARATE IMPACT CASES.

Section 703 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000e-2) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(k) PROOF OF UNLAWFUL EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES IN DISPARATE IMPACT CASES.—

"(1) An unlawful employment practice is established under this subsection when—

"(A) a complaining party demonstrates that an employment practice results in a disparate impact on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin, and the respondent fails to demonstrate that such practice is required by business necessity; or

"(B) a complaining party demonstrates that a group of employment practices results in a disparate impact on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin, and the respondent fails to demonstrate that such practices are required by business necessity, except that—

"(i) if a complaining party demonstrates that a group of employment practices results in a disparate impact, such party shall not be required to demonstrate which specific practice or practices within the group results in such disparate impact; and

"(ii) if the respondent demonstrates that a specific employment practice within such group of employment practices does not contribute to the disparate impact, the respondent shall not be required to demonstrate that such practice is required by business necessity.

"(2) A demonstration that an employment practice is required by business necessity may be used as a defense only against a claim under this subsection.".

SEC. 5. CLARIFYING PROHIBITION AGAINST IMPERMISSIBLE CONSIDERATION OF RACE, COLOR, RELIGION, SEX OR NATIONAL ORIGIN IN EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 703 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000e-2) (as amended by section 4) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(l) DISCRIMINATORY PRACTICE NEED NOT BE SOLE MOTIVATING FACTOR.—Except as otherwise provided in this title, an unlawful employment practice is established when the complaining party demonstrates that race, color, religion, sex, or national origin was a motivating factor for any employment practice, even though such practice was also motivated by other factors.".

(b) ENFORCEMENT PROVISIONS.—Section 706(g) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 2000e-5(g)) is amended by inserting before the period in the last sentence the following: "or, in a case where a violation is established under section 703(l), if the respondent establishes that it would have taken the same action in the absence of any discrimination".

SEC. 6. FACILITATING PROMPT AND ORDERLY RESOLUTION OF CHALLENGES TO EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES IMPLEMENTING LITIGATED OR CONSENT JUDGMENTS OR ORDERS.

Section 703 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000e-2) (as amended by sections 4 and 5) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(m) FINALITY OF LITIGATED OR CONSENT JUDGMENTS OR ORDERS.—

"(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, and except as provided in paragraph (2), an employment practice that implements a litigated or consent judgment or order resolving a claim of employment discrimination under the United States Constitution or Federal civil rights laws may not be challenged in a claim under the United States Constitution or Federal civil rights laws—

"(A) by a person who, prior to the entry of such judgment or order, had—

"(i) notice from any source of the proposed judgment or order sufficient to apprise such person that such judgment or order might affect the interests of such person; and

"(ii) a reasonable opportunity to present objections to such judgment or order;

"(B) by a person with respect to whom the requirements of subparagraph (A) are not satisfied, if the court determines that the interests of such person were adequately represented by another person who challenged such judgment or order prior to or after the entry of such judgment or order; or

"(C) if the court that entered the judgment or order determines that reasonable efforts were made to provide notice to interested persons.

A determination under subparagraph (C) shall be made prior to the entry of the judgment or order, except that if the judgment or order was entered prior to the date of the enactment of this subsection, the determination may be made at any reasonable time.

"(2) Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to—

"(A) alter the standards for intervention under rule 24 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure;

"(B) apply to the rights of parties to the action in which the litigated or consent judgment or order was entered, or of members of a class represented or sought to be represented in such action, or of members of a group on whose behalf relief was sought in such action by the Federal government; or

"(C) prevent challenges to a litigated or consent judgment or order on the ground that such judgment or order was obtained through collusion or fraud, or is transparently invalid or was entered by a court lacking subject matter jurisdiction.

"(3) Any action, not precluded under this subsection, that challenges an employment practice that implements a litigated or consent judgment or order of the type referred to in paragraph (1) shall be brought in the court, and if possible before the judge, that entered such judgment or order.".

SEC. 7. STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS; APPLICATION TO CHALLENGES TO SENIORITY SYSTEMS.

(a) STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—Section 706(e) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000e-5(e)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "one hundred and eighty days" and inserting in lieu thereof "2 years";

(2) by inserting after "occurred" the first time it appears "or has been applied to affect adversely the person aggrieved, whichever is later,";

(3) by striking out ", except that in" and inserting in lieu thereof ". In"; and

(4) by striking out "such charge shall be filed" and all that follows through "whichever is earlier, and".

(b) APPLICATION TO CHALLENGES TO SENIORITY SYSTEMS.—Section 703(h) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 2000e-2) is amended by inserting after the first sentence the following new sentence: "Where a seniority system or seniority practice is part of a collective bargaining agreement and such system or practice was included in such agreement with the intent to discriminate on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin, the application of such system or practice during the period that such collective bargaining agreement is in effect shall be an unlawful employment practice.".

SEC. 8. PROVIDING FOR DAMAGES IN CASES OF INTENTIONAL DISCRIMINATION.

Section 706(g) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000e-5(g)) is amended by inserting before the last sentence the following new sentences: "With respect to an unlawful employment practice (other than an unlawful employment practice established in accordance with section 703(k))—

"(A) compensatory damages may be awarded; and

"(B) if the respondent (other than a government, government agency, or a political subdivision) engaged in the unlawful employment practice with malice, or with reckless or callous indifference to the Federally protected rights of others, punitive damages may be awarded against such respondent; in addition to the relief authorized by the preceding sentences of this subsection, except that compensatory damages shall not include backpay or any interest thereon. If compensatory or punitive damages are sought with respect to a claim arising under this title, any party may demand a trial by jury.".

SEC. 9. CLARIFYING ATTORNEY'S FEES PROVISION.

Section 706(k) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000e-5(k)) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(1)" after "(k)";

(2) by inserting "(including expert fees and other litigation expenses) and" after "attorney's fee,";

(3) by striking out "as part of the"; and

(4) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(2) A court shall not enter a consent order or judgment settling a claim under this title, unless the parties and their counsel attest that a waiver of all or substantially all attorneys' fees was not compelled as a condition of the settlement.

"(3) In any action or proceeding in which any judgment or order granting relief under this title is challenged, the court, in its discretion, may allow the prevailing party in the original action (other than the Commission or the United States) to recover from the party against whom relief was granted in the original action a reasonable attorney's fee (including expert fees and other litigation expenses) and costs reasonably incurred in defending (as a party, intervenor or otherwise) such judgment or order.".

SEC. 10. PROVIDING FOR INTEREST, AND EXTENDING THE STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS, IN ACTIONS AGAINST THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.

Section 717 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000e-16) is amended—

(1) in subsection (c), by striking out "thirty days" and inserting in lieu thereof "ninety days"; and

(2) in subsection (d), by inserting before the period ", and the same interest to compensate for delay in payment shall be available as in cases involving non-public parties".

SEC. 11. CONSTRUCTION.

Title XI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000h et seq.) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 1107. RULES OF CONSTRUCTION FOR CIVIL RIGHTS LAWS.

"(a) EFFECTUATION OF PURPOSE.—All Federal laws protecting the civil rights of persons shall be broadly construed to effectuate the purpose of such laws to eliminate discrimination and provide effective remedies.

"(b) NONLIMITATION.—Except as expressly provided, no Federal law protecting the civil rights of persons shall be construed to restrict or limit the rights, procedures, or remedies available under any other Federal law protecting such civil rights.".

SEC. 12. RESTORING PROHIBITION AGAINST ALL RACIAL DISCRIMINATION IN THE MAKING AND ENFORCEMENT OF CONTRACTS.

Section 1977 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (42 U.S.C. 1981) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a)" before "All persons within"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) For purposes of this section, the right to 'make and enforce contracts' shall include the making, performance, modification and termination of contracts, and the enjoyment of all benefits, privileges, terms and conditions of the contractual relationship.".

SEC. 13. LAWFUL COURT-ORDERED REMEDIES, AFFIRMATIVE ACTION AND CONCILIATION AGREEMENTS NOT AFFECTED.

Nothing in the amendments made by this Act shall be construed to affect court-ordered remedies, affirmative action, or conciliation agreements that are otherwise in accordance with the law.

SEC. 14. SEVERABILITY.

If any provision of this Act, or an amendment made by this Act, or the application of such provision to any person or circumstances is held to be invalid, the remainder of this Act and the amendments made by this Act, and the application of such provision to other persons and circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 15. APPLICATION OF AMENDMENTS AND TRANSITION RULES.

(a) APPLICATION OF AMENDMENTS.—The amendments made by—

(1) section 4 shall apply to all proceedings pending on or commenced after June 5, 1989;

(2) section 5 shall apply to all proceedings pending on or commenced after May 1, 1989;

(3) section 6 shall apply to all proceedings pending on or commenced after June 12, 1989;

(4) sections 7(a)(1), 7(b), 8, 9, 10 and 11 shall apply to all proceedings pending on or commenced after the date of enactment of this Act;

(5) paragraphs (2) through (4) of section 7(a) shall apply to all proceedings pending on or commenced after June 12, 1989; and

(6) section 12 shall apply to all proceedings pending on or commenced after June 15, 1989.

(b) TRANSITION RULES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Any orders entered by a court between the effective dates described in subsection (a) and the date of enactment of this Act that are inconsistent with the amendments made by sections 4, 5, 7(a)(2) through (4), or 12, shall be vacated if, not later than 1 year after such date of enactment, a request for such relief is made.

(2) SECTION 6.—Any orders entered between June 12, 1989 and the date of enactment of this Act, that permit a challenge to an employment practice that implements a litigated or consent judgment or order and that is inconsistent with the amendment made by section 6, shall be vacated if, not later than 6 months after the date of enactment of this Act, a request for such relief is made. For the 1-year period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act, an individual whose challenge to an employment practice that implements a litigated or consent judgment or order is denied under the amendment made by section 6, or whose order or relief obtained under such challenge is vacated under such section, shall have the same right of intervention in the case in which the challenged litigated or consent judgment or order was entered as that individual had on June 12, 1989.

(c) PERIOD OF LIMITATIONS.—The period of limitations for the filing of a claim or charge shall be tolled from the applicable effective date described in subsection (a) until the date of enactment of this Act, on a showing that the claim or charge was not filed because of a rule or decision altered by the amendments made by sections 4, 5, 7 (a)(2) through (4), or 12.

SUMMARY OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1990

PROTECTING AMERICANS AGAINST RACE DISCRIMINATION ON THE JOB AND IN PRIVATE CONTRACTS

Last year, in Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, 109 S.Ct. 2363 (1989), the Supreme Court held that an 1866 statute barring intentional race discrimination in contracts (42 U.S.C sec. 1981) does not prohibit racial harassment on the job and other forms of discrimination in the application of contracts. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 amends sec. 1981 to reaffirm that the right "to make and enforce contracts" includes the enjoyment of all benefits, privileges, terms and conditions of the contractual relationship. By reaffirming the broad scope of sec. 1981, Congress will ensure that Americans may not be harassed, fired or otherwise discriminated against in contracts because of their race. Because sec. 1981 is the only federal statute barring race discrimination that is applicable to the 3.7 million employers with fewer than fifteen employees, it is vitally important to restore its broad ban on racism in contractual dealings.

RESTORING THE BURDEN OF PROOF IN DISPARATE IMPACT CASES

For eighteen years following Chief Justice Warren Burger's unanimous opinion for the Supreme Court in the landmark case of Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424 (1971), Title VII had placed on employers the burden of showing that employment practices with a "disparate impact," (i.e., that operate to exclude women and minorities disproportionately) are required by business necessity. Last year, in Wards Cove Packing Co. v. Atonio, 109 S.Ct. 2115 (1989), the Court effectively overruled this Griggs rule and held that, no matter how strong the proof of discriminatory effect, the employer need no longer prove that its practices are required by business necessity. Instead, victims of discrimination must bear the heavy burden of proving that the employer has no legal justification for its exclusionary practices. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 restores the Griggs rule by providing that, once a person proves that an employment practice has a disparate impact, the employer must justify the practice by showing that it is based on business necessity.

FACILITATING PROMPT AND ORDERLY CHALLENGES TO CONSENT DECREES AND COURT ORDERS

In Martin v. Wilks, 109 S.Ct. 2180 (1989), a case involving a court-approved plan by the City of Birmingham to remedy past racial discrimination in its fire department, the Supreme Court held last year that whites who sat on the sidelines while the plan was being approved by the district court could later challenge it in a new lawsuit. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 guarantees notice to persons who might be adversely affected by a proposed court order, and a reasonable opportunity to challenge the order. But subsequent lawsuits challenging the court order will be barred except under certain unusual circumstances.

MAKING CLEAR THAT JOB BIAS IS ALWAYS ILLEGAL

In Price Waterhouse v. Hopkins, 109 S.Ct 1775 (1989), the Supreme Court suggested that employment decisions motivated at least in part by prejudice do not violate the law if the employer can show after the fact that the same decision would have been made if it had not engaged in intentional discrimination. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 provides that any reliance on prejudice in making employment decisions is illegal, while making clear that, in considering the appropriate relief for such discrimination, a court shall not order the hiring or promotion of a person not qualified for the position.

GRANTING WOMEN AND RELIGIOUS AND ETHNIC MINORITIES THE RIGHT TO RECOVER DAMAGES FOR INTENTIONAL EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION NOW AVAILABLE TO RACIAL MINORITIES

Under present federal law, victims of sexual, religious, or ethnic harassment on the job have no effective remedy. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 closes this loophole by amending Title VII to grant any victim of intentional discrimination the right to recover compensatory damages, and, in egregious cases, punitive damages as well. The Act makes the remedies available for sex, religion and ethnic discrimination claims under Title VII the same as the remedies now available under sec. 1981 for racial discrimination.

RESTORING FAIR AND EFFECTIVE CIVIL RIGHTS ENFORCEMENT

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 also includes additional, technical provisions to address other Supreme Court decisions hampering antidiscrimination cases and to ensure fair and effective civil rights enforcement. These provisions clarify and extend the statute of limitations under Title VII and ensure that job bias victims will be able to obtain adequate legal assistance. They include the following:

Correcting Statutes of Limitation: In Lorance v. AT&T Technologies, 109 S.Ct. 2261 (1989), the Supreme Court held that the statute of limitations for challenging discriminatory seniority plans begins to run when the plan is adopted, rather than when the plan is applied to an individual. As a result, persons who were laid off pursuant to discriminatory seniority plans may be barred from bringing suit before they even knew they would be dismissed. The Act overrules Lorance and permits persons to challenge discriminatory seniority plans when those plans actually harm them, rather than only when they are adopted. At the same time, the Act confirms that proof of discrimination in the adoption of the seniority plan that actually required the layoff is required.

Extending statute of limitations in Title VII cases. The Act extends the statute of limitations in Title VII employment discrimination cases from 180 days to 2 years in all except federal-government cases, where the limit would be raised from 30 to ninety days.

Permitting Recovery of Prejudgment Interest Against the U.S.: To overrule the Supreme Court's 1986 decision in Library of Congress v. Shaw, 478 U.S. 310 (1985), the bill permits the recovery of prejudgment interest against the federal government to compensate prevailing plaintiffs in job discrimination cases for delay in payment.

Permitting Award of Experts' Fees: To overrule a series of court of appeals decisions that extend the Supreme Court's 1987 Crawford Fitting Co. v. J.T. Gibbons, Inc., 482 U.S. 437 (1986), decision to the civil rights area, the Act permits prevailing plaintiffs to recover the reasonable costs of experts who assist them in preparing their case.

Permitting Recovery of Attorneys' Fees Expended in Defending Decrees: In response to the Supreme Court's decision last year in Independent Federation of Flight Attendants v. Zipes, 109 S.Ct. 2372 (1989), the Act makes it clear that parties who prevail in job discrimination cases may recover attorneys' fees expended in defending their court decrees against subsequent challenges.

Barring Forced Waiver of Attorneys' Fees Claims. To overrule the Supreme Court's 1986 decision in Evans v. Jeff D., 475 U.S. 717 (1986), the Act requires that courts entering consent decrees settling job discrimination cases must first obtain from the parties and their counsel an attestation that a waiver of attorneys' fees was not compelled as a condition of the settlement.

Rule of Construction in Civil Rights Cases. The Act adopts rules of construction reaffirming the intention of Congress that civil rights laws must be construed generously, in order to provide effective remedies to eliminate discrimination.

THE BILL DOES NOT ADDRESS THE SCOPE OF RACE-CONSCIOUS REMEDIES

The Act specifically makes clear that it does not affect or change the law governing affirmative action and other race-conscious remedies. The Act does not mandate quotas in any fashion.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. President, I am here today joining with a distinguished and bipartisan group of colleagues for the purpose of introducing the Civil Rights Act of 1990. This legislation, which has been eagerly anticipated since the Supreme Court issued the series of decisions last summer radically altering the civil rights landscape, is a direct result of and response to this effort by the Supreme Court to roll back the hard fought gains in employment equality for minorities and women won over the past 25 years.

Only the few have hailed the actions of the Court, while the many have condemned this retrenchment as a wrongheaded ideological attack, needlessly stirring up dissent where, more often than not, accord and accommodation had come to rule. Mr. President, I find myself with the many on this issue. One characteristic of these decisions that has particularly troubled me was the expansiveness of the holdings. Rather than observing the dictates of judicial restraint and issuing decisions on the cases presented to them, the conservative majority often leapt over the boundaries of the legal disputes involved in order to reach broad and wholly unnecessary conclusions and answering questions which had neither been raised by the parties nor mandated by the presented facts.

Like most Americans, I am proud of the progress our country has made over the past few decades in attacking job discrimination. In my opinion, the civil rights legislation enacted during that time has represented a historical high water mark and has created standards worthy of our continued, vigilant defense. By its recent actions, the Supreme Court has made it necessary for us to rise to the defense of those standards and we are here today to do just that.

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 was drafted with the specific intention of overruling some of these decisions, as well as to restore and strengthen our civil rights laws. Mr. President, it is my understanding that the text of the bill and a copy of a summary of its terms have been placed in the record. If this assumption is incorrect, I now ask unanimous consent that these items be included in the record after my remarks and that the bill be appropriately referred. I will not belabor the record with a lengthy and detailed recitation of the terms of the bill. However, I would like to highlight a few significant points.

First. In Patterson versus McLean Credit Union, the Court reached the astounding conclusion that the Reconstruction-era civil rights statute (42 U.S.C. 1981), which bars intentional discrimination in contracts, pertained only to the formation of contracts and not to any conduct occurring thereafter. Thus, in the employment context, the Court held that racial harassment on the job and other forms of posthiring discrimination were not prohibited by that act. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 amends section 1981 to reaffirm that the right to make and enforce contracts includes the enjoyment of all the benefits, privileges, terms and conditions of the contractual relationship. This is all the more significant because section 1981 is the only Federal statute which bars race discrimination in employment by the 3.7 million employers with fewer than 15 employees. Thus, absent this restoration, and despite the existence of title VII (which governs only larger employers), a sizable population of employees would be without this vital Federal protection. To those who contend that State law provides coverage for such employees, I must respond that the hodgepodge of State tort and/or wrongful discharge actions is not an adequate substitute for Federal protection. The happy accident of State residence should not be the factor determining the measure of protection an employee will receive in so vital a right.

Second. The Court's decision in Martin versus Wilks reversed the longstanding and judicially accepted doctrine of impermissable collateral attack. By application of this doctrine, courts previously have permitted court ordered or consentual settlement decrees to have finality after allowing ample opportunity for affected persons to challenge their formulation on a before-the-fact basis. However, once such challenges had failed, or the duly notified potential challengers had failed to come forward, the doctrine would bar the raising of subsequent disputes about the operation of the decrees. The Wilks decision reversed this trend and allowed persons who had sat on their rights while a decree was being approved by the district court to attack it later in a separate lawsuit.

While it does ot specifically reinstate the impermissible collateral attack doctrine, the Civil Rights Act of 1990 achieves a similar effect by mandating that notice be given to persons who might be adversely affected by a proposed court order, and guaranteeing them a reasonable opportunity to challenge the order before it is instituted. Subsequent lawsuits challenging the court order would be barred except under the same unusual circumstances; (for example, fraud, collusion, lack of subject matter jurisdiction) which previously were accepted as exceptions to the doctrine. Thus, the interests of all parties are preserved in a context which provides for the due process rights of notice and opportunity to be heard. Accordingly, despite the protestations to the contrary which undoubtedly will be raised, none will be denied their day in court as a result of this legislation.

Third. We can also expect the detractors of this bill to rail against the imposition of a statistical standard of discrimination which they contend will result in the legitimization of quotas. We have already heard it stated on the floor of the Senate that this will be the inevitable result of that section which deals with the Court's decision in Wards Cove versus Atonio. However, this assessment is incorrect, for the act specifically makes clear that it does not affect or change the law governing affirmative action and does not mandate quotas in any fashion. All that is intended by the framers of this provision and, we believe, all that is accomplished therein is the restoration of the Griggs versus Duke Power rule that once a plaintiff has proven an employment practice produces a disparate impact on the basis of sex, race, or other protected category, the burden shifts to the employer to justify the practice on the basis of business necessity.

Obviously, there are other portions of the act which I have not chosen to highlight here. These partake of both the need to correct or reverse the incursions made by the Court on the existing body of civil rights law; (for example, reaffirming that mixed motive discrimination is still unlawful discrimination [Price Waterhouse] and that civil rights laws are to be construed in a fashion which furthers, rather than hinders the objectives of equal opportunity), as well as the desire to strengthen the protections provided under those laws; (for example, equalizing the remedies available to women and religious, ethnic and racial minorities, extending the statute of limitations and assuring that job discrimination victims will be able to obtain adequate legal representation).

In these times when so many of the world's injustices are beginning to be addressed forthrightly an openly; when walls are coming down in eastern Europe and the doors of political prisons are being swung open in south Africa; now is no time for this Nation to backtrack on the civil rights promises it has been in the vanguard making. I have previously stated that I believe the Supreme Court's recent rulings represent an effort to renege on history and I, for one, am more than prepare to resist the effort. Equal employment opportunity is a worthy objecitve for this Nation. Whereas we have made great strides, we have not reached our goal and we must continue to strive onward. This bill presents us with an opportunity to do the right thing in this regard. Thus, I exhort my colleagues; let's continue to be the vanguard; let's do the right thing; let's give this legislation the prompt and complete attention it so rightly deserves; let's pass the Civil Rights Act of 1990.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I am proud to rise as an original cosponsor of the Civil Rights Act of 1990. At the outset, I want to commend Senator KENNEDY for his outstanding leadership on this bill. This is the latest example of his lifelong commitment to make America a better and fairer Nation.

The fact that there is a crying need for this legislation as we enter the 1990's is a sobering reminder that we are not moving forward as quickly as we should be to ensure justice and equality for all Americans. In 1965, I was privileged to join Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s march in Selma. One could not help but share his spirit of optimism and commitment to justice for every man, woman and child in our society. Those were heady days. A year earlier, Congress had enacted the historic Civil Rights Act of 1964. That was a hard-fought victory—thousands of Americans struggled, marched, prayed and some even died to convince Congress to protect the basic civil rights of all people. One of these basic civil rights is embodied in title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. That title holds out the promise of equal employment opportunity for all workers, regardless of race, creed, color, national origin or gender.

Twenty-five years later, despite significant progress, that promise remains unfulfilled. Women and minorities still fight major hiring and promotion barriers in our society. According to recent Government statistics, on average, a woman still earns some 30 percent less than a man. Black and Hispanic workers earn some 25 percent less than white workers. Even when women and minorities prove themselves at the highest levels of the corporate ladder they face discrimination. A major accounting firm recently denied a partnership to a woman because she was considered too "aggressive" and her managers suggested she stood a better chance if she would act "more femininely." A survey of black corporate executives indicates they feel frustrated and angry because they are continually stymied and they have not gained a level of acceptance from their white peers.

Regrettably, the situation is getting worse, not better. The Supreme Court, led by President Reagan's appointees, has taken aggressive action to turn back the clock on civil rights. In a stunning series of 5-to-4 decisions announced last spring, the new majority on the Court reversed longstanding precedents and denied protection to the victims of employment discrimination.

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 is a direct response to those decisions. It sends a resounding message to the Court and to the public: our march toward a more fair and just Nation will not be turned back. We must quicken the pace of reform to stop, once and for all times, discrimination and harassment against women and minorities.

This is a bipartisan initiative. Protecting civil rights is not a political issue. It is a matter of justice and fairness. But equal employment opportunity is also an economic necessity if we are to remain competitive in the world. As the Labor Department has reported, the demographic trends indicate that women and minorities will be the fastest growing segment of our work force. Irrational barriers to employment and promotion, based on erroneous stereotypes, cannot be tolerated. We, as a nation, cannot afford to exclude any workers as we strive to remain competitive.

Opponents of this initiative will attempt to downplay the significance of the Supreme Court decisions. But the impact of these decisions is devastating. For example, in the Patterson case, the newly constituted majority dramatically narrowed the scope of section 1981. That is one of the landmark statutes enacted immediately after the Civil War to enable newly freed slaves to enjoy the full rights of citizenship. The Patterson decision declared that section 1981 could not be used to remedy intentional racial discrimination or harassment that occurs on the job. The impact of Patterson has been sharp and swift: in the 6 months since the decision was announced, lower courts, relying on Patterson, have dismissed nearly 100 pending, intentional racial discrimination cases.

The decision in Wards Cove versus Atonio represents another stunning example of unwarranted judicial activism. That decision was particularly disturbing because the majority, in a case where the facts pointed to the worst kinds of institutionalized discrimination, reached out to repudiate a settled area of the law. Nonwhite employees were challenging an employment system that, according to dissenting Justice Stevens, resembled a "plantation economy" complete with racially segregated housing and dining facilities. Despite these egregious circumstances, the majority ignored the plight of these workers and effectively gutted the established precedent in this area. In particular, the majority rejected the 1971 unanimous decision in the Griggs case, a decision authored by Chief Justice Burger. Earlier this year, I introduced S. 1261, the Fair Employment Reinstatement Act, to reinstate the law set forth in the Griggs decision. I am pleased that the Civil Rights Act of 1990 incorporates fully the provisions of the Fair Employment Reinstatement Act.

We have already scheduled hearings in the Labor and Human Resources Committee on this important matter. Make no mistake, we intend to push forward with the legislation this year. I urge all of my colleagues, on both sides of the aisle, to support this bill so that the victims of discrimination will receive the protection of our laws to which they are entitled. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 is landmark legislation. Its passage will bring us closer to the day when there is full equal employment opportunity for all Americans.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the Civil Rights Act of 1990. I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of this important legislation and look forward to its prompt passage.

During the 1988-89 term, the Supreme Court issued a series of unfortunate decisions that cut back on the scope and effectiveness of various civil rights protections, particularly those protections applicable in employment discrimination matters. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 would essentially overturn those Supreme Court decisions.

Specifically, this act would do the following:

First, it would restore the prohibition against racial discrimination in the making and enforcement of contracts. The act reaffirms that "the right to make and enforce contracts" includes the making, performance, modification and termination of contracts, including the enjoyment of all benefits, terms, and conditions of the contractual relationship.

Second, the act restores the burden of proof of unlawful employment practices in disparate impact cases. In other words, it restores prior law that once an employee proved an employer's employment practices had a discriminatory effect, then the employer must prove that such practices were based upon business necessity.

Third, the prohibition against impermissible consideration of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin in employment practices would be clarified. The law would be amended to provide that as a general rule an employer may not use race, religion, gender, or ethnicity as a motivating factor in employment decisions, regardless of whether such discrimination is accompanied by legitimate motives.

Fourth, the act would facilitate the prompt and orderly resolution of challenges to employment practices that carry out litigated or consent judgments or orders. Those who might be adversely affected by a proposed court order would be given the opportunity to be heard prior to the entry of the order. Once an order is entered, however, challenges would generally not be allowed.

Finally, a damages remedy for international discrimination would be added.

Mr. President, I commend my colleagues for their efforts in producing a comprehensive bill that reaffirms Congress' commitment to meaningful civil rights protections. The majority of the current Supreme Court, with its narrow interpretations of our civil rights laws, seems to lack the necessary commitment. It is up to Congress, therefore, to restore and strengthen the legal protections necessary to ensure equal employment opportunity for all. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 would do just that.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of the Civil Rights Act of 1990. All Americans, as part of our birthright as citizens of this great Nation, should have equal opportunity to obtain a job, and should have equal opportunity for promotion and advancement once on the job. Today, more than ever before, our Nation must utilize the talents and productive capacity of all of its citizens in the work force, particularly that of minorities and women who frequently face the greatest barriers to employment opportunity.

Unfortunately, decisions reached by the Supreme Court last year put into place procedural and substantive roadblocks that serve to undermine the protections that Congress intended to be available to minorities and women under title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The recent Supreme Court decisions reflect a major shift away from equal employment rights established more than a quarter century ago when title VII of the Civil Rights Act was enacted.

Title VII has been an important weapon in the Nation's arsenal to eradicate discrimination in the workplace. As a result, women and minorities are integrated into the work force and have made major inroads where overt discriminatory practices once presented insurmountable barriers. But, the job is far from over. More subtle and intangible forms of bias still surface all too frequently in the workplace.

Last year, the Court changed its course drastically, narrowing the reach of title VII in ways that I believe Congress never intended. These decisions have already made it far more difficult for victims of bias to prove civil rights violations not only of title VII but also of section 1981, a long-established civil rights act guaranteeing equality in the making and enforcement of contracts. The protections that remain are not sufficient to provide women and minorities the justice that is their due. These recent decisions have, in effect, left many victims of discrimination with only hollow protection under title VII and section 1981.

It is now up to Congress to correct the mistakes made by the Court last year and to signal our clear intent that discrimination against women and minorities—no matter how unintentional or subtle—has no place in the workplace or in our society.

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 would reverse five Supreme Court decisions that do particular harm to the notion of equal employment rights for all. The bill would reverse Patterson versus McLean Credit Union to protect Americans against racial discrimination on the job and in private contracts. A legal system that does not include protection against racial harrassment on the job as a substantive part of an employment contract, as the Court ruled in Patterson, is unfair to employees and needs revision. Equal employment opportunity means little when it is limited only to the doorway of employment. What is opportunity when, as in Patterson, employers may not—under section 1981—discriminate against employees when the initial contract is formed, but as soon as the employee begins work, the employer has a free hand to discriminate against that worker on the basis of his or her race?

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 would restore the burden of proof in cases that involve employment practices that on their face seem neutral, but that in practice exclude minorities and women. A legal system that requires an employee who claims discriminatory treatment to unravel the complexities of an employer's personnel policies, as the Court ruled in Wards Cove Packing Co. versus Atonio, places a particularly unfair and unreasonable burden on employees and needs revision.

The Court's ruling in Wards Cove is especially troubling because it reverses a unanimous 1971 decision, Griggs versus Duke Power Co. Under Griggs, title VII has been used effectively by women and minorities to overcome not only individual bias, but also more subtle employment practices that have been used to screen out entire classes of people. Now we must repair the damage of the Wards Cove decision simply to maintain standards the court established 18 years ago.

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 would correct the Court's ruling in Lorance versus AT&T Technologies that would require an employee to anticipate, and to bring suit in advance of, a future adverse application of a seniority system in order to protect his or her rights.

The Lorance case involved an Illinois woman, Patricia Lorance, who lost her job and was denied any remedy by the Court. Patricia Lorance challenged a senority system that she believed had been changed to prevent her and other women from competing for mostly male, higher paying jobs in a manufacturing plant. She was laid off under this system in 1983, although the seniority system was actually adopted in 1979. The Supreme Court adopted the most narrow interpretation possible, holding that employees must file charges within 300 days after a seniority system or other employment practice is adopted; that is, 300 days from the date of adoption, not when the actual discrimination takes place. That's not a long time, especially in this world of complicated management, labor, and legal practices. The discriminatory effect of a senority system may not play itself out until well after its adoption, until well into those 300 days. It is easy to imagine the confusion an employee encounters when her company adopts a complicated seniority or benefit system, let alone keep track of when the courts allow a plaintiff to file charges or whether or not a system will affect her adversely months down the line. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 would protect those who do not realize, until too late, that certain employment practices jeopardize their ability to advance, as in the Lorance case.

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 would also reverse the Court's decisions in Price Waterhouse versus Hopkins, a decision that permits an employer to discriminate without ramification if the predominant reason for the employment decision was something other than the plaintiff's gender, and Martin versus Wilks, a decision that could undermine many affirmative action plans currently in place and discourage the voluntary settlement of disputes. These decisions seriously undermine the statutory objectives of fair employment laws and need to be revised.

Unfortunately, discrimination still limits work opportunities for many of our citizens in today's world, and the ideal of a work force based on equal opportunity and advancement through hard work and merit is a difficult goal to reach. That goal is pushed further from reach when the Supreme Court, long viewed as the protector of civil rights, restricts the scope and undermines the effectiveness of two of our most important antidiscrimination laws. Fortunately, Congress can, and should, step in to restore the civil rights safety net ripped open by the Supreme Court, to ensure that all victims of bias are afforded adequate remedies in our judicial system.

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 is legislation that deserves our attention and swift approval.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I rise today along with Senators KENNEDY and JEFFORDS and a number of our colleagues. Both Republican and Democrat, to introduce the Civil Rights Act of 1990. Identical legislation is being introduced in the House of Representatives today.

The genesis of all civil rights in our great country is the U.S. Constitution. This document prohibits the Federal Government from depriving any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law. Our Constitution also forbids States from denying any person the equal protection of the laws. States are further obliged to protect the rights of persons equally, that is, without discrimination against any class of persons. Slavery is prohibited and voting rights are guaranteed to all citizens.

The Constitution gives Congress the power to enforce our civil rights by appropriate legislation. The first Civil Rights Act, passed in 1866, guaranteed to every U.S. citizen the same rights that white citizens have to inherit, purchase, lease, and sell property. A series of other laws in the years following the Civil War made clear that our nonwhite citizens were to enjoy the same rights as whites in other areas such as contracting and sitting on juries.

Twentieth century civil rights laws reflect the growing recognition of Congress and the American people of the need for equal protection in the areas of voting, public accommodation, education, employment, housing, credit and access to Federal programs. In addition to the protection of these substantive rights, Congress has acted to extend constitutional protection beyond race to religion, sex, handicap, national origin, age, and marital status. Our history reflects a dynamic process, expanding protection to ensure that all basic rights of all groups are safeguarded.

Our courts have played a major role in enforcing the civil rights protections enacted by Congress. Where civil rights have been endangered by denial of equal opportunity to take part in the social, economic, and political life of this great land, those affected have been able to turn to the courts for protection of those rights.

During 1989, however, the U.S. Supreme Court issued a series of decisions in employment discrimination cases that threaten to set back our progesss in the area of job opportunity by decades. As a result of the decision in Patterson versus McLean Credit Union, victims of even the most egregious racial harassment in the workplace can obtain no meaningful remedy. Because of the decision in Price-Waterhouse versus Hopkins, a person who proves that illegal discrimination played a part in an action against them by an employer cannot receive any remedy if the employer shows that there was also a legal reason for the action. In other words, overt sexism or racism in an employment decision is acceptable so long as it is not the only reason for the decision. The Court's opinion in Wards Cove Packing Co. versus Atonio makes a person who proves discrimination by an employer that the employer had no justification for the discrimination.

The results in these cases indicate that the Supreme Court needs a clear signal from Congress that employment discrimination is unacceptable in all forms and under all circumstances, and that Congress expects the Court to reflect that in its decisions. That is what the Civil Rights Act of 1990 would do.

I urge my colleagues to support this bill because it is the right thing to do. It is our opportunity to begin this decade with a renewed commitment to civil rights.

But there is another reason to support this legislation. America's economic well-being depends as never before on the role of women and minorities in our work force. Work Force 2000, a study commissioned by the U.S. Department of Labor, states that by the end of this century, 47 percent of our work force will be women and 15 percent will be nonwhite. At the same time, new jobs will demand much higher skill levels. We will be more dependent on women and minorities as workers, and they must be increasingly better trained. We simply cannot afford the prejudice that keeps women and minorities from obtaining the best possible training and that keeps them from being able to give their best on the job.

I wish that this legislation were not necessary, but I conclude from the actions of the Court that we must now take steps to protect the gains of the last 25 years in eliminating employment discrimination. I am proud and pleased to be a sponsor of the Civil Rights Act of 1990.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I commend my colleagues for their work in bringing the issue of civil rights before this body. Deeply entrenched in American culture is the belief that all individuals—no matter what their color, race, sex, religion, or national origin—deserve equal and fair treatment. That is the principle upon which Congress has established civil rights laws; today, that principle is being reemphasized.

Congressional intent is one of the tools used by the courts to decipher the meaning of Federal statutes. One of the purposes of the bill being introduced today is to make clear congressional intent regarding, and support for, civil rights. I applaud that goal wholeheartedly.

Currently, as my colleagues know, the Federal Government prevents discrimination in the workplace under two major statutes: the Civil Rights Acts of 1866 and 1964. The 1866 statute, known as section 1981, guarantees equal rights, regardless of race, in the making of employment and other contracts. Title VII of the 1964 act prohibits discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex, or national origin, with regard to employment decisions and practices.

Last year, the Supreme Court handed down a series of civil rights and employment-related rulings that affected the body of civil rights law that has developed from section 1981 and title VII over the past four decades. Three areas of civil rights law—burden of proof of discrimination, court-approved consent decrees, and on-the-job discrimination—were significantly affected.

The Civil Rights Act of 1990, as introduced, addresses to some degree each of those decisions. In the body of civil rights law, there are clear precedents or standards that served as the guidelines for this legislation. Sections of this act do faithfully restore civil rights guarantees as outlined by Court precedent; but the act also goes beyond simply restoring longstanding Court precedents.

First, the act would address those recent decisions in which no clear precedent or standard had been established by the Supreme Court. Second, there are sections of the bill that may loosely be referred to as compromise provisions: those that codify a position somewhere between the Supreme Court's ruling and the standard assumed prior to that ruling. Third, and finally, the bill breaks what I consider to be entirely new ground in specific areas.

While I support many of these provisions, I recognize that none are small steps. Given the breadth, the importance, and the potential impact of this bill, I believe we must take the time for careful analysis. It is my understanding that 4 days of hearings on this measure have already been scheduled. The hearing process should prove invaluable, and the resulting discussion should produce more insight into how best to protect civil rights. Should more hearings be necessary, I hope that they, too, will be scheduled.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join as an original cosponsor of the Civil Rights Act of 1990. This legislation would clarify and strengthen Federal laws which forbid discrimination in employment based on race or sex and ensure that adequate remedies exist for victims of such discrimination.

Since the enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, countless Court decisions and congressional actions have underscored the need to be vigilant against discrimination. We have made steady progress toward achievement of a juster and fairer society. The current Supreme Court, however, doesn't seem to understand the depth of the problem of invidious discrimination in this country or the importance of maintaining strong and effective remedies to eradicate this problem.

Last year, the Supreme Court handed down a series of decisions which have blunted some of the most effective laws which protect employees from discrimination. The bipartisan legislation being introduced today is designed to reverse the adverse impact of these decisions and to restore our Nation's strong and effective weapons against employment discrimination.

Mr. President, last year's Supreme Court decisions dealt a crippling blow to the ability of victims of job discrimination to litigate cases under Federal civil rights statutes. One decision, Wards Cove, overturned 18 years of settled law on the burden of proof in employment discrimination cases. Another, Patterson, emasculated a 1866 civil rights statute by limiting its coverage to exclude on-the-job discrimination. A third, Martin, would allow long-accepted settlement agreements discrimination cases to now be reopened.

Mr. President, the devastating impact of these decisions is already taking effect. According to a survey conducted by the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, 96 claims involving racial and ethnic harassment and discrimination have been dismissed as a result of the Patterson decision.

One case thrown out as a result of the Patterson decision involved an employer found to have subjected one black employee to verbal and physical abuse, and a racially motivated demotion. The employer demoted the employee because it "wasn't right for a black to occupy such a high position." The trial court had found the employer guilty of illegal discrimination and awarded the victim $150,000 in damages. The appeals court reversed, on the grounds that the Patterson decision held that section 1981 of title 42 of the United States Code—the 1866 civil rights law—did not apply to on-the-job discrimination, only discrimination in hiring.

Since the only other remedy—Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964—does not apply to employers with less than 15 employees, no Federal remedy was available to redress the blatant discriminatory treatment of this employee. Mr. President, to leave a victim of this kind of discrimination without a remedy contravenes all that Congress has fought for in ensuring equal treatment for all Americans.

If we truly lived in a color and sex-blind society perhaps there would be no need for the type of civil rights laws which exist today. But one need not look far to realize that, while progress has been made, we are far from achieving that kind of a color- and sex-blind society. To make that dream a reality we must ensure that Federal equal employment laws remain strong and effective. We have come too far on the long and arduous path toward achievement of equality and justice to turn backward now. I strongly support this measure and will fight for its enactment.

S.J. Res. 251. Joint resolution designating "Baltic Freedom Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BALTIC FREEDOM DAY

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I rise today, along with 48 cosponsors, to introduce the Baltic Freedom Day resolution. I so do with great pride and feeling. This legislation will declare June 14, 1990, as Baltic Freedom Day. I hope and expect that before the day is out we will have fully half of the Senate as cosponsors of this legislation.

For each of the past 8 years Congress has overwhelmingly adopted similar legislation, and it has been important each year but no more so important than right now, this year, because today, with the dramatic developments unfolding in the Baltic States, this resolution continues to be an important expression of United States policy which has never recognized Soviet annexation of the Baltic States and has consistently supported the principle of self-determination.

Mr. President, for the past 50 years, our nonrecognition policy has been an important symbol of hope to the Baltic people. They have told us that time and time again.

Today, as the Baltic people prepare to take the final step toward regaining their lost independence, it provides important reassurance to them that our Government stands with them in their struggle to regain their freedom and independence.

The joint resolution that I am introducing today reaffirms that position and asks that in advance of the 51st anniversary of the signing of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, which led to the illegal Soviet invasion and occupation of the Baltic States, the administration submit to Congress a statement articulating specific actions our Government is taking to support and to encourage Soviet support for the peaceful restoration of independence and democracy in the Baltic States.

I call attention to the fact that the occupant of the chair himself is a cosponsor of this legislation. This is a symbol of support and hope on behalf of the American people going out to the peoples of the Baltic States, telling them that we stand with them, and one of these days soon it is our expectation that they will be able to reestablish their independence with the encouragement and support of the people of this country. That will be a great day for all.

Mr. President, today, hundreds of thousands of citizens in the Soviet-occupied Baltic States of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania are waging a heroic, nonviolent battle against a violent occupying power that has grossly violated their human rights during the past 50 years and that continues to deny them the right to shape their own future.

At this historic turning point, one would expect that our Government would be cheering the Balts on in their quest for independence. But instead, the response of the administration to the Baltic movement has ranged from silence to thinly veiled disapproval. Voices in the administration, echoed in the op-ed pages of major newspapers, argue that the United States should not be outspoken in its support of the Baltic independence movements, because the success of these movements could provoke a hard-line takeover in Moscow, thus spelling the end of Gorbachev's reforms and potentially unleashing a bloodbath. Interestingly, this is also the argument the Kremlin makes to oppose Baltic independence, and America's pundits seem to be buying it, lock, stock, and barrel.

Mr President, any conservative reaction in Russia would be most unfortunate, but we should not hold the Baltic States accountable for the possible intensification of this backlash.

An unraveling empire is always a breeding ground for progressive and regressive tendencies alike, and the Soviet Union, with over 100 different ethnic groups living in 15 separate republics, is certainly no exception. In the last few years we have seen ethnic violence erupt in Uzbekistan, in Kazakhstan, and in Georgia. And, today, the tragic conflict in Azerbaijan and Armenia continues to make front-page news. We have seen Soviet police and soldiers wielding tear gas, clubs, sharpened shovels, and poison gas against demonstrators in the non-Russian republics. Amidst this sea of violence, the Baltic States stand out for the consistently peaceful and disciplined nature of their protest. Why should we support Gorbachev in holding the Balts hostage because of what may or may not happen in republics less committed to nonviolent change?

The many forces for change within Soviet society may have been unleashed by Gorbachev's campaign of glasnost and perestroika, but at this point they are propelled by their own momentum. The Baltic peoples will continue to demand independence, regardless of cries for "patience" from Gorbachev, because they see independence as a matter of life and death. Despite Gorbachev's much touted reforms, in the Baltic States store shelves are still empty, industry and agriculture are still controlled by central planners in Moscow, heavily polluting factories are still ravaging the environment and the health of Baltic residents while providing hard currency income for Moscow, young men are still being forced to serve in the occupying Soviet army, where they are routinely beaten and even murdered, and trained to kill and be killed in distant lands, recently in Afghanistan and now in Azerbaijan. Having lost hundreds of thousands of their family and friends to the prisons and the gulag during the past five decades, the Balts feel they no longer have anything to lose, and they are not convinced that Gorbachev's maneuvering will bring about real freedom and democracy within the present structure of the U.S.S.R.

Mr. President, no matter what the United States does or does not say, the Baltic peoples will not give up the fight for freedom. And events in the Baltic States consistently suggest that sooner or later, and probably sooner, they will win. In the ongoing battle of wills with Moscow, it is the Balts who are setting the agenda and Gorbachev who is being forced to adjust. Thanks to Baltic pressure, last year the Soviet leadership acknowledged the existence and illegality of the secret protocols to the 1939 Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, in which Soviet Russia and Nazi Germany divided Eastern Europe into spheres of influence. Then they granted limited economic autonomy to the Baltic States and now they are officially considering the possibility of eventual independence. And, when Gorbachev, earlier this week, called on the Communist party to give up its constitutional monopoly on power and allow a multiparty system, he was simply making official something that, in practice, has existed in the Baltic States for many months.

As Gorbachev continues to follow the Baltic agenda, it remains for us to decide whether we want to move forward with the flow of history or lag behind, parroting Moscow's calls for "patience." Do we want to be remembered for upholding the principles of freedom and self-determination, or for turning our backs on these courageous peoples at a crucial moment?

If we do abandon the Baltic cause, we will be sacrificing freedom for the sake of an illusory notion of "stability"—illusory because it is founded on the suppression of democratic change and the maintenance of empire. In spite of Gorbachev's immense popularity abroad, neither the "Man of the Decade" nor any other Soviet leader can restore "stability" in an empire of over 100 restive ethnic peoples, while retaining these peoples through force.

While Gorbachev was sweating it out in fierce debates with crowds of Lithuanian citizens recently, White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater justified the White House's conspicuous lack of support for Lithuanian independence activists by claiming, "We don't want to take any positions that are not helpful to either side." Clearly, however, the United States cannot continue to avoid taking a position on this critical issue, and the position we take should be "helpful" to the side of the freedom seekers, not the empire-preservers. As Zbigniew Brzezinski argues in the lastest issue of Foreign Affairs:

> The West can no longer remain passive on this issue. A great historic drama is in the process of unfolding—and it can have either benign or malevolent international consequences * * * For the moment, silence on the part of the West may seem to be the better part of wisdom * * * [A]t some point the question will arise: by what standard does the West choose to support, for example, Polish independence but to ignore the cravings of say, the Lithuanians or, before too long, of the Ukrainians, for their own national statehood?
> It is therefore timely for the West to formulate its own general approach on this large issue before national turmoil in the Soviet world begins to undermine the East-West relationship as a whole. The West's attitude should reflect the norms that have gained universal acceptance in our age and should aim at creating arrangements that benefit the peoples swept up by the ground swell of national feelings. It should emphasize that the West does not seek the fragmentation either of Eastern Europe or of the Soviet Union but rather wishes to facilitate the historically significant process of transforming ongoing repressive political arrangements into more voluntary and cooperative relationships.

It is incumbent upon the United States and other Western nations to take an active position on the Baltic question because it is our moral and legal duty to do so, stemming from our commitment to the nonrecognition principle. When, in June and July 1940, the Soviet Union invaded the Baltic States, deported their political leaders, and staged sham elections leading to annexation by the Soviet Union, acting United States Secretary of State Sumner Welles denounced these "predatory activities." From that day forward, the United States Government has consistently refused to accept that the Baltic States belong to the Soviet Union.

Recently, however, the administration has demonstrated a reluctance to hold true to the nonrecognition principle. President Bush, while reasserting the nonrecognition principle in theory, has referred to the Baltic question as Gobachev's "internal" problem. And the Washington Post recently reported that senior administration officials are frustrated by the "captive nations" policy which they regard as "a cold war anchronism kept on the back burner as a cheap way of appealing to U.S. voters with roots in these countries."

But as attorney William Hough noted in testimony last October before the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe:

> The United States position on this issue is not a remnant of cold-war, anti-Soviet foreign policy, nor * * *" a conceit of diplomatic formalism." Rather, non-recognition of the annexation is the direct result of a long-standing continuum of United States foreign policy which deliberately seeks to promote values of human rights, self-determination, and democracy world-wide. Indeed, non-recognition of seizure or territory is an international legal requirement. * * * (emphasis added)

The significance of upholding the nonrecognition principle may escape

some American officials and journalists, but it does not escape the people of the Baltic states, for whom it has been a beacon of hope throughout 50 years of Soviet oppression.

Mr. President, for the United States now to abandon its commitment to that principle would be to turn our backs on the Baltic peoples at a supremely important moment, when they are closer then ever before to ending the illegal Soviet occupation.

When President Gorbachev, representing the government that destroyed twenty percent of the Baltic States' populations in the prison camps of Siberia, claims that Lithuania will be obligated to pay "compensation" to anyone who wants to stay in the Soviet Union and will have to move if Lithuania secedes, our Government should point out the historical and legal absurdity of this claim. And when Mr. Gorbachev insists that Lithuania wait until Moscow drafts a "divorce law" to regulate Lithuania's so-called secession, the United States should remind him that, in the words of Lithuanian independence activist Algimantas Cekuolis, Lithuania does not need a "divorce law," because she never "married" the Soviet Union, but was "raped." The United States should continually be reminding Moscow and the world that what the Balts are fighting for is not secession from their own country, but rather liberation from foreign domination.

To those who claim that the exercise of self-determination will precipitate chaos and bloodshed, I submit that responsible action on the part of our Government could actually foster stability in a highly volatile situation. Active support for Baltic independence does not, of course, mean sending in United States troops or issuing ultimata to Moscow. What it could mean, however, is bringing the Baltic issue into the realm of international diplomacy, where it belongs. Rather than waiting for the Kremlin to draw up "divorce papers," we could be working with other Western governments who have upheld nonrecognition, to develop, I quote again from Mr. Hough:

> A peaceful diplomatic solution for the Baltic region that would take into account the security interests of nations of East-Central Europe, including the Soviet Union. * * *
> Today, with the advent of the Soviet Union's avowed interest in a common European home, respect for international law, and renunciation of the Brezhnev doctrine, there is absolutely no reason why the Western democracies should not, and could not advance a common plan for the Baltic States. * * *

By the same token, Mr. Brzezinski maintains that:

> The West should not be shy in publicly stating that it favors the eventual transformation of the Soviet Union—which in reality is a Great Russian empire—into a genuinely voluntary confederation or commonwealth. . . . [I]t behooves Americans to proffer concrete suggestions for how to alleviate the intensifying Soviet inter-national conflicts through deliberate adoption of confederational arrangements" (emphasis added).

For those non-Russian nations that continue to seek complete independence rather than voluntary confederational membership, says Brzezinski—

> Secession could be made conditional on treaty-based associate status with a Soviet Confederation—especially in economic cooperation and perhaps even in some security arrangements.

The role of the United States Government should not be quietly to undermine the nonrecognition principle and offer Moscow free rein to use force against "ethnic unrest," but rather to put pressure on Moscow to fundamentally rewrite the political contract that holds the Soviet empire together. We cannot in good conscience ask the Balts to be "patient" and stop demanding independence, until the Soviet Government begins to demonstrate that there is something worth waiting for—until they replace imperial domination with democratic self-determination. If we really want to see democracy and stability in the Soviet Union, then, in the memorable words of Lithuanian activist Cekuolis:

> Why not give power to the people? * * * If Mr. Gorbachev is really for perestroika, let's do it. * * * [P]atient we are. Let's see progress.

Finally, when Soviet officials proclaim that the Baltic States will face economic disaster if they break away from Moscow, the United States should state unequivocally that an independent Estonia, Latvia or Lithuania would have the same opportunities to apply for Western economic assistance that were made available to Poland and Hungary and the other emerging democracies.

In conclusion, let me quote the "Man of the Decade" himself. In his New Year's address to the people of the United States, President Gorbachev proclaimed:

> The 1990's may become a decade when freedom, democracy and equality will begin to be established on a global scale and in an increasingly irreversible way.
> People may say that all these are long-known truths and age-old values. This is so, indeed. But never before were we prepared so well for implementing them as now, at the turn of the century. Let us work purposefully, patiently and with belief in their triumph.

Mr. President, let us enter the new decade firmly and responsibly supporting the "irreversible" move toward "freedom, democracy, and equality," not supporting efforts to maintain the status quo in a crumbling empire.

I urge all of my colleagues to join me and Senator KASTEN in cosponsoring this year's Baltic Freedom Day resolution and in calling upon the administration actively to support the peaceful pursuit of freedom in the Baltic States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 251

Whereas the people of the Baltic States of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania have cherished the principles of religious and political freedom and have recently held mass demonstrations calling for freedom and independence;

Whereas from 1918 to 1940, the Baltic States existed as independent, sovereign nations and as fully recognized members of the League of Nations;

Whereas 1990 marks the 50th anniversary of the invasion, seizure, and illegal incorporation of the Baltic States into the Soviet Union against the national will and the desire for independence and freedom of the Baltic people;

Whereas 1990 also marks the 50th anniversary of the continued policy of the United States of not recognizing the illegal forcible occupation of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union;

Whereas, due to Soviet and Nazi collusion, the Baltic States suffered a loss of one-third of their population by the end of World War II;

Whereas, under Soviet occupation, the native Baltic peoples have been deported from their homelands to forced labor and concentration camps in Siberia and elsewhere;

Whereas the people of the Baltic States have unique indigenous cultures, national traditions, and languages, which have been threatened by decades of russification;

Whereas the Soviet Union has introduced into the Baltic States ecologically unsound industries without proper safeguards, and the presence of those industries has critically endangered the environment and well-being of the Baltic people;

Whereas, as part of Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev's campaign of openness, restructuring, and democratization, Soviet leaders have officially acknowledged the illegality of the secret protocols to the 1939 Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, which led to the Soviet military invasion of the Baltic States in 1940;

Whereas, in the spirit of openness and democratization, the Baltic peoples are affirming their right, upheld both by international law and by the Soviet Constitution, to restore full independence through parliamentary and peaceful means; and

Whereas the United States, as a member of the United Nations, has repeatedly upheld the right of nations to self-determination: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That—

(1) the Congress recognizes the continuing desire and right of the people of the Baltic States for freedom and independence;

(2) the Congress, in keeping with the policy of the United States to deny recognition of the Soviet occupation of the Baltic States, urges the Soviet Union to recognize the sovereignty of the Baltic States and to yield to the rightful demands of the Baltic peoples for independence from foreign domination and oppression, as guaranteed by Principle Eight of the Helsinki Accords, to which the Soviet Union is a signatory;

(3) June 14, 1990, the anniversary of the first mass deportation of the Baltic peoples from their homelands in 1941, is designated as "Baltic Freedom Day", as a symbol of the solidarity of the people of the United States with the aspirations of the captive Baltic people; and

(4) the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe Baltic Freedom Day with appropriate ceremonies and activities, and to submit to the Congress within 60 days a statement articulating specific actions the United States Government is taking, in fulfillment of the intent of the nonrecognition principle, to—

(A) support the peaceful restoration of the independence of the Baltic States; and

(B) encourage Soviet support for a peaceful transition to independence and democracy in the Baltic States.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce along with Senator RIEGLE a resolution to designate June 14, 1990, as "Baltic Freedom Day." This is a critical time for the Baltic States, and I believe it is important that the United States—in line with our policy of nonrecognition of the Soviet occupation of these nations—support their aspirations in every way possible.

June 14 marks the 49th anniversary of a massive deportation of the Baltic people from their homelands. After this protracted bondage, these people are daily moving closer toward freedom. The historic visit of Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev to Lithuania reveals the Soviet leadership's fear of the inevitable. The question for the Baltic States is not whether but when they will demand their rightful place in the community of nations.

In late November, I and many of my colleagues wrote to the President, asking him to raise the issue of the Baltic States at his Malta summit with President Gorbachev. The State Department recently responded to this letter—reaffirming the United States policy of nonrecognition of the "forcible incorporation of Estonia, Lithuania, and Latvia into the Soviet Union" and reasserting America's support for "self-determination for the Baltic peoples."

President Bush did discuss the fate of the Baltic States at the Malta summit, making it clear that the "use of force in the Baltic States would have serious repercussions for the entire bilateral relationship." The Soviets' response was that they did not plan to use force.

So there is ample reason for hope for peaceful progress toward independence. But there is cause for concern as well. At this juncture, it is essential that we let Mr. Gorbachev know where the U.S. Congress stands. And we stand in unity and hope on the side of the people of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia.

By Mr. BENTSEN:

S.J. Res. 252. Joint resolution designating the week of April 15, 1990, through April 21, 1990, as "National Minority Cancer Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL MINORITY CANCER AWARENESS WEEK

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, today I am introducing a joint resolution providing for the designation of the third week in April as "National Minority Cancer Awareness Week."

We all know that cancer is a deadly disease that strikes thousands of Americans each year, throwing their lives, and the lives of those close to them, into turmoil. In recognition of this, and to promote awareness of the causes, types and treatments of cancer, the month of April in each year has been designated as "National Cancer Month."

But many of us are unaware that cancer has a disproportionately severe impact on certain segments of our population. Two of those segments that are unfortunate enough to be burdened with such a distinction are the minority and economically disadvantaged communities in our Nation. The overall incidence of cancer is higher among blacks and Hispanics as compared to the population in general. And while the overall cancer survival rate is improving steadily, the survival rate has actually dropped among blacks and Hispanics. In addition, the incidence of cancer and fatality rates among our economically disadvantaged population are higher than that in the general population.

National Minority Cancer Awareness Week will play an important role in our national fight against cancer. It will foster increased awareness of the causes, types and treatments of cancer among these population segments afflicted with high cancer rates. It will also give health care professionals and researchers an opportunity to focus on the characteristics of these at-risk populations and formulate new approaches to attacking their unique cancer problems. Finally, this week will focus attention on the need for increased collection of data regarding cancer and its impact in these groups.

I believe it is appropriate, and even necessary, for us to set aside 1 week each year to assess the problems posed by cancer to these groups as part of our overall struggle against cancer. A successful effort against cancer in its stronghold among minorities and the disadvantaged is a crucial element in the battle against cancer.●

By Mr. HARKIN (for himself, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. PELL, Mr. DODD, Mr. JEFFORDS, and Mr. GRAHAM):

S.J. Res. 253. Joint resolution to express the support of the Congress for Chile's transition to democracy; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

SUPPORT FOR CHILE'S TRANSITION TO DEMOCRACY

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I am proud to join with a bipartisan group of Senators, including Senators LUGAR, DODD, MCCAIN, DURENBERGER, GRAHAM, JEFFORDS, and PELL, in introducing a bipartisan joint resolution commending the people of Chile for the dramatic step they took last December toward restoring democracy to their country.

In the last days of the 1980's, Americans watched with awe as communism began its dramatic withdrawal from Eastern Europe and as democracy took its place. But while Germans chipped away at the last remnants of the Berlin Wall, the Chilean people were making their own mark on history.

On December 14, 1989, more than 7 million Chileans demonstrated their commitment to the return to democracy of Chile. From the desert regions of Arica, in Northern Chile, to the most southern city in the world, Punta Arenas, Chileans waited in long lines to express their commitment to the democratic process and cast their votes for President of their country, the first democratic election in nearly two decades.

The shots fired in Romania may have drowned out sounds of the slow march of Chileans to the polls on December 14. Although the clamor of change in Eastern Europe may have been louder, developments in Chile are just as important an expression of the wave of democracy and freedom sweeping across the world. Furthermore, the fact that Chileans—from all political quarters—conducted themselves in such a civil and orderly manner on December 14 is a testament to the depth of their commitment to freedom and peaceful change.

The American people could learn a few lessons by observing the way the Chileans conducted themselves during the presidential and legislative elections last December. The turnout figures alone—more than 97 percent of all registered voters—demonstrate the profound commitment that Chileans have to a democratic system of government.

Equally impressive was the order and efficiency with which the elections were conducted. Credit on this score belongs to the National Electoral Service, which designed and administered the overall process.

The thousands of ordinary Chileans who administered the elections at polling sites throughout the country should be acknowledged. Also important was the Ministry of Interior's speedy presentation of results on the day of the elections. Whereas last year the Interior Ministry's delay in announcing results of the plebiscite caused unnecessary tensions, the Ministry's conduct this year was exemplary.

The conduct of Chile's presidential candidates was a vivid demonstration of all Chileans' desire for peaceful democratic transition. On election night, as it was clear that Patricio Aylwin had won the majority necessary to avoid a runoff, the two losing candidates, Hernan Buchi and Francisco Javier Errazuriz, personally congratulated Chile's President-elect and pledged their support for the new civilian government.

Elections by themselves cannot make a country democratic. Indeed, particularly in a country like Chile, which has survived more than 16 years of military dictatorship, citizens must be vigilant as they make the transition to democratic rule.

Patricio Aylwin, when he becomes president on March 11, faces significant obstacles in efforts to insure that democratic rule is consolidated in Chile. President-elect Aylwin must deal with an armed forces that has ruled Chile with an iron hand since seizing power in 1973. As we well know, maintaining this delicate civil-military balance has eluded many of Latin America's elected leaders in the 1980's.

To resume military ties with the United States, Chile's new government must deal with the case of the assassination of Orlando Letelier and Ronny Karpen Moffitt. According to current law, outstanding issues of compensation and accountability must be resolved before Congress fully restores military aid to Chile. It is my hope that a plan for handling both aspects of this case can be formulated and implemented so that all aspects of UnitedStates relations with Chile can be normalized.

Fortunately, the new government will inherit one of the most stable economies in the region—in large part due to the current regime's success at lowering inflation, reducing the foreign debt and cutting fiscal deficits. However, the Aylwin government must develop policies and find the funds to satisfy the frustrated social aspirations of those Chileans who have not benefited from Chile's overall economic successes. To reduce government expenditures, the military junta significantly reduced spending on health and education that serve middle- and working-class Chileans. Unemployment has dropped to record lows, but purchasing power for Chilean workers has yet to reach 1970 levels.

While striving to redress this social debt, President Aylwin will have to maintain recent macroeconomic stability as well as meet Chile's foreign debt obligations. How to satisfy the needs of the poor and the working class who have suffered the most during military dictatorship while reassuring investors is a critical task confronting the new government.

I am optimistic about the Chileans chances of success. Chileans have completed a long march to democracy—from the disunity that had characterized Chilean political parties even before the dictatorship to the slow often painful process of reconciliation and unity, from the National Accord in 1985, to the campaign for the NO in the 1988 plebiscite, to the coalition of 17 opposition parties supporting Aylwin's Presidential candidacy. Over the past few years, Chilean freedom fighters have peacefully fought for democracy, and struggled against a military dictatorship's financial and political advantages, media censorship, and more than a generation of political violence and repression.

The courage and the dignity they have shown during this process of reconciliation, unification, and campaigning should give them the strength and wisdom to take the step from a transition to the consolidation of democracy in Chile.

To complete this task and insure that Chile's democratic traditions remain uninterrupted for another 160 years, Chileans will need our support. Today, we are taking the first step by acknowledging the triumph of democracy last December. Over the next year, we can provide small but significant assistance to the new government to help it meet the challenges of administering democracy.

I know I speak for my colleagues in the Senate in telling the Chilean people that the slow and relatively silent progress they have made and plan to make toward guaranteeing democracy in their country will be heard here. Their voices will not be lost amidst the clamor of rapid changes now sweeping across Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 253

Whereas the people of Chile have shown tremendous courage and determination in their efforts to return their nation to civilian democracy;

Whereas Chile's transition to civilian rule reached a critical turning point on October 5, 1988, when 97 per centum of the registered voters of Chile cast ballots in a nationwide plebiscite and, by a significant majority, voted to reject the presidential candidate of the military dictatorship;

Whereas in compliance with the results of the 1988 plebiscite, multiparty elections were scheduled for December 1989, and an open, competitive, and vigorous campaign for public office began;

Whereas Chile's major political parties and the Chilean Government reached an agreement on significant constitutional reforms to eliminate certain antidemocratic elements of the Chilean Constitution;

Whereas this package of constitutional reforms was put before the Chilean people in a second nationwide plebiscite on July 30, 1989, and was approved overwhelmingly;

Whereas three widely respected candidates, representing a broad spectrum of political opinion in Chile, were nominated for the office of President;

Whereas national elections were held on December 14, 1989, under conditions that were proclaimed free and fair by observers from around the world, in which Presidential candidate Patricio Aylwin received 55 per centum of the vote;

Whereas President-elect Aylwin commended the Chilean Armed Forces for their role in the administration of the electoral process;

Whereas, in a gesture of dignity and national unity, the defeated Presidential candidates congratulated the new President-elect and pledged their commitment to Chile's new civilian government;

Whereas the new government adopted a platform designed to continue Chile's economic prosperity, promote professionalism in the Chilean Armed Forces, exert civilan control over the military, and respect and guarantee the human rights of all Chileans; and

Whereas on March 11, 1990, the people of Chile will take another significant step in their transition to democracy when Patricio Aylwin is inaugurated as the first civilian president in almost two decades, reclaiming Chile's proud, century-old tradition of democracy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress—

(1) commends the people of Chile for their courageous commitment to democracy;

(2) congratulates President-elect Patricio Aylwin for his decisive victory; and

(3) pledges support for the new civilain government as it leads Chile into a new era of democracy.●

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am honored to be a cosponsor of this joint resolution to express the support of the United States Congress for Chile's transition to democracy. It has been a long, hard, and torturous struggle, but thanks to the efforts of true democrats like Patricio Aylwin, and many others like him who never lost hope, democracy is about to dawn once again in Chile. The transition to democracy has been incredibly smooth and tranquil indicating the depth to which the democratic spirit has remained in the hearts and minds of Chileans through the years of the military dictatorship. Chileans from all sectors of society, including those of the many political parties and within the military institution as well have demonstrated outstanding cooperation and goodwill to bring Chile through the plebiscite of October 1988, the free and fair elections of December 1989, and now, finally, the inauguration of March 11, 1990, when the world will witness the rebirth of democracy in Chile.

The people of Chile deserve the commendation of the United States Congress for their commitment to democracy. The Congress as a whole should join in congratulating President Aylwin and the Chilean people as Chile resumes its democratic path.●

By Mr. GORE:

S.J. Res. 254. Joint resolution designating May 1990 as "National Digestive Disease Awareness Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL DIGESTIVE DISEASE AWARENESS MONTH

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, today, for the sixth year in a row, I am introducing legislation to recognize the terrible hardship of digestive diseases. This bill, which will designate May 1990 "National Digestive Disease Awareness Month," is an integral part of our continuing, successful effort to raise the awareness of the American people, the Congress, and the administration to this very serious problem that too often doesn't get the attention it deserves. Similar legislation has been introduced in the other body by my friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. ROYBAL] who chairs that body's Select Committee on Aging and who is a recognized expert on health issues.

Digestive diseases are more widespread than many imagine. More than 20 million Americans suffer from chronic diseases of the digestive system. Over 14 million cases of acute digestive diseases are treated in this country each year, and one-third of all malignancies are of the digestive tract.

Digestive diseases lead to 25 percent of all surgical operations. These illnesses represent one of the Nation's most serious health problems in terms of discomfort and pain, personal expenditures for treatment, lost working hours, and lost lives.

They rank third among illnesses in total cost in the United States—estimated at $17 billion per year in direct health care expenditures alone, and if you figure in the working hours lost and other economic losses, the total annual bill for digestive disease is a staggering $50 billion. Of course cost measured in dollars does little to accurately describe the heartfelt cost in terms of human suffering.

The bill I am introducing today reaches out to all who suffer from these diseases by calling for a unified, national effort to increase public awareness and to combat digestive disease.

I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this initiative, as so many have done in the past.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

EXCELLENCE IN EDUCATION ACT

WILSON (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 1244

Mr. WILSON (for himself, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. COATS, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. REID, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. WIRTH, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. MCCONNELL, and Mr. BAUCUS) proposed an amendment to the bill (S. 695) to promote excellence in American education, by recognizing and rewarding schools, teachers, and students for their outstanding achievements, enhancing parental choice, encouraging the study of science, mathematics, and engineering, and for other purposes, as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill insert the following new section:

SEC. . (a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of Education is authorized to award grants to local educational agencies in consortium with entities which have experience in assisting school districts to provide instruction to students grades kindergarten through six to recognize and resist pressures that influence such students to use controlled substances, as defined in schedules I and II of section 202 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 812), the possession or distribution of which is unlawful under such Act, or beverage alcohol, such as Project Drug Abuse Resistance Education, that meet the requirements of subsection (b).

(b) REQUIREMENTS.—A local education agency in consortium with an entity shall not be eligible for a grant under subsection (a) unless such local education agency in consortium with an entity will use assistance provided under such grant to provide or arrange for the provisions of services that shall include—

(1) drug abuse resistance education instruction for students grades kindergarten through six to recognize and resist pressures to experiment that influence such children to use controlled substances, as defined under subsection (a), or beverage alcohol, including instruction in the following areas—

(A) drug use and misuse;

(B) resistance techniques;

(C) assertive response styles;

(D) managing stress without taking drugs;

(E) decisionmaking and risk taking;

(F) media influences on drug use;

(G) positive alternatives to drug abuse behavior;

(H) interpersonal and communication skills;

(I) self-esteem building activities; and

(J) resistance to gang pressure;

(2) classroom instruction by uniformed law enforcement officials;

(3) the use of positive student leaders to influence younger students not to use drugs; and

(4) an emphasis on activity-oriented techniques designed to encourage student-generated responses to problem-solving situations; and

(c) APPLICATION.—The Secretary shall not make a grant under subsection (a) unless—

(1) an application for the grant is submitted to the Secretary;

(2) with respect to carrying out the purpose for which the grant is to be made, the application provides assurances of compliance satisfactory to the Secretary;

(3) the application otherwise is in such form, agreements, assurances, and information as the Secretary determines to be necessary to carry out this section; and

(4) the application contains an assurance that the applicant will provide funds, either in cash or in kind that are not less than 10 percent of the amount of the grant under subsection (a);

(d) SUPPLEMENTAL FUNDS.—Amounts received under subsection (a) by the entity shall be used only to supplement, not to supplant, the amount of Federal, State, and local funds expended for the support of projects of the type described in subsection (b); and

(e) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out this section, $10,000,000 in fiscal year 1990, and such sums as may be necessary for each of the 3 succeeding fiscal years.

WILSON AMENDMENT NO. 1245

Mr. WILSON proposed an amendment to the bill S. 695, supra, as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill, insert the following:

SEC. . HEALTHY START DEMONSTRATION GRANT PROGRAM.

(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) The Secretary is authorized to pay the Federal share of the costs of making demonstration grants to local educational agencies to assist local educational agencies in coordinating support services to children and youth.

(2)(A) The Federal share shall be 80 percent.

(B) The non-Federal share of the costs of the demonstration grant under this subsection shall be supplied from sources other than the Federal Government.

(C) The non-Federal share of payments under this Act may be in cash or in kind fairly evaluated, including planned equipment or services.

(b) REQUIREMENT.—A local educational agency shall not be eligible for a grant under subsection (a) unless such local educational agency is eligible to receive financial assistance under chapter 1 of title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

(c) COUNCIL.—(1) Each local educational agency desiring a grant under subsection (a) shall, in conjunction with other local social service and law enforcement providers, establish a local service delivery coordination council which consists of not more than 20 members, including—

(A) the chairman of the county board of supervisors or his designee;

(B) the county superintendent of schools;

(C) a representative of school principals;

(D) a representative of teachers;

(E) a representative of parents;

(F) a representative of students;

(G) a representative of child protection and welfare agencies;

(H) a representative of a public health agency;

(I) a child psychiatrist;

(J) a child development specialist;

(K) a drug and alcohol treatment specialist;

(L) a mental health services specialist;

(M) a representative of a public safety and justice agency;

(N) the district attorney for the area served by the local educational area;

(O) a representative of community based organizations with experience in child development and service delivery;

(P) a public housing official;

(Q) a representative of the local school board;

(R) a representative of the private sector; and

(S) a representative of any other appropriate human support services agencies.

(2) Each local service delivery coordination council established pursuant to paragraph (1) shall develop a coordinated service delivery plan which includes the establishment of—

(A) formal channels of communication between public agencies and organizations responsible for service delivery to children and youth;

(B) cooperative service delivery agreements between public agencies and organizations responsible for children and youth services; and

(C) procedures to better coordinate interagency budgeting and planning for children and youth services.

(d) REPORTS.—Each local education agency which received a grant under subsection (a) shall submit a report to the Secretary which includes—

(A) a description of the local coordinated service delivery plan;

(B) a timetable for implementation of the coordinated service delivery plan;

(C) the identification of any Federal, State, or local regulations which impede coordinated service delivery to children and youth;

(D) recommendations for administrative or legislative action to provide for greater coordination of service delivery to children and youth;

(E) an accounting of local budget savings, if any, resulting from the implementation of the coordinated service delivery plan; and

(F) any other information the local education agency may deem appropriate.

(2) The Secretary shall annually prepare and submit a report to the Congress on the success of the demonstration grants under this section.

(e) APPLICATION.—Each local educational agency desiring a grant under this subsection shall submit an application to the Secretary at such time, in such manner, and accompanied by such informaton as the Secretary may reasonably require.

(f) DEFINITIONS.—For the purposes of this section—

(1) the term "local educational agency" has the same meaning given such term in section 147(12) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965; and

(2) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education.

(g) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated $10,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1991, 1992, and 1993.

HELMS AMENDMENT NO. 1246

CLEAN AIR ACT AMENDMENTS

HATCH AMENDMENT NO. 1248

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. HATCH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1630) to amend the Clean Air Act to provide for attainment and maintenance of health protective national ambient air quality standards, and for other purposes, as follows:

On page 281, insert between lines 17 and 18 the following new section:

ENVIRONMENTAL ASSISTANCE TO LATIN AMERICAN NATIONS

SEC. 115. (a) The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency (hereinafter referred to as the Administrator) shall make available to the Governments of Chile, Mexico, and Peru, such advice and counsel as may be appropriate and reasonable to assist those nations in putting in place an environmental clean air program designed to reduce the relatively high concentrations of sulfur dioxide in the gases emitted from their copper smelting and converting processes.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury shall cooperate with the Administrator in encouraging the nations referred to in subsection (a) to undertake the clean air program described in subsection (a). For such purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury shall establish a debt reduction program which shall include the following:

(1) A nation referred to in subsection (a) shall receive a credit against debt held by the United States Government and private United States financial institutions in an amount equal to the amount spent by such nation, including the costs of establishing and operating private or public enterprises to operate in such nation, on technology, equipment, or services bought from United States providers designed to carry out subsection (a).

(2) The United States Government shall reimburse United States debt holders in the amount of the purchase of such technology, equipment, or services from the United States seller, upon notification to the United States Treasury by the seller that the contract has been consummated, subject to the following limitations and conditions:

(A) The United States Government shall apportion the amount available for reimbursement along all United States debt holders or creditors. Priority shall be given to private creditors in a manner to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

(B) The aggregate amount of credits for all nations shall not exceed the sum of $50,000,000 in any single fiscal year.

(C) At the end of the first calendar year of the operation of this program, the Administrator shall report on the progress made by the nations referred to in subsection (a).

(D) If any nation referred to in subsection (a) has not achieved—

(i) a level of 90 percent control of the sulfur dioxide emissions from its domestic smelting and converting processes, or

(ii) compliance with another emission standard determined by the Adminstrator to be of equivalent value for sulfur dioxide control, at the end of the first calendar year of the operation of this program, the Administrator may recommend to the Secretary of Commerce that a tariff be imposed on copper and copper product imports from that nation into the United States. The Secretary of Commerce shall take any appropriate steps necessary to encourage compliance with the objectives in this section, to include tariff or other generalized system of preferences actions.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I send to the floor an amendment to S. 1630, the Clean Air Act, and ask for its immediate consideration.

I intend to make a very short statement on my amendment, delaying further debate until after the recess, in accordance with the desires of the committee.

However, I want to file my amendment today to bring attention to the issue that it addresses, and to allow parties on both sides of the issue time to prepare their responses.

Let me tell you what my amendment proposes, Mr. President:

First, it recognizes that air pollution is a global problem, and for the United States, an acute regional problem because of our proximity to Latin America.

Second, it provides a plan for Third World Latin American countries to clean up their air, while crediting the costs of buying environmental technologies against their privately held debt in the U.S.

Third, it helps American firms that sell environmental clean air technologies, equipment and services since the debtor countries must buy American-made products to qualify for the debt reduction credits.

Fourth, Mr. President, my amendment assists the United States banking community, which at the insistence of our own Government, risked their shareholder and depositor funds to make loans to Latin American countries to promote United States foreign policy objectives there.

Finally, this amendment uses as a model the copper industry. In the United States, tens of thousands of jobs were sacrificed to pay the costs of scrubbing sulfur dioxide out of the gaseous emissions created by copper refining.

These expenditures also cost the industry market share in the United States and abroad. My amendment will take a long step toward making the U.S. copper industry more competitive again, and, at the same time, provide an incentive for our cleanup industries to compete in the foreign marketplace.

I look forward to much more debate on these issues after the recess, Mr. President, and thank the Chair for its considerations.

FEDERAL CRIME CONTROL ACT

SPECTER AMENDMENT NO. 1249

(Ordered referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.)

Mr. SPECTER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1972) to enhance the ability of the Federal Government to enforce the criminal laws in drug cases, and for other purposes, as follows:

At the appropriate place, insert:

SEC. 1236. DECEIVING CONGRESS OR ITS COMMITTEES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Chapter 47 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section, as follows:

"§ 1032. Deceiving Congress or its committees.

Whoever, in any matter within the jurisdiction of the Senate or the House of Representatives of the United States, or any committee or subcommittee thereof, knowingly and willfully falsifies, conceals, or covers up by any trick, scheme or device a material fact, or makes any false, fictitious or fraudulent statement or misrepresentation, or makes or uses any false writing or document knowing the same to contain any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statement or entry shall be imprisoned for not less than one year nor more than five years and may be fined not more than $10,000. Liability under the provisions of this section may be avoided by notifying the appropriate committee or subcommittee of the Senate or House of Representatives of the United States of any violation hereof and providing the truthful information in its place within five days.

(b) TABLE OF SECTIONS.—The table of sections for chapter 47 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"1032. Deceiving Congress or its committees.".

Lyons (MD) to be Director of the Commerce Department's National Institute of Standards and Technology [NIST].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Wednesday, February 7, 1990, at 9:30 a.m. to hold a hearing in preparation for the 1990 farm bill; the administration's views.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE, SCIENCE, AND TRANSPORTATION

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on February 7, 1990, at 9 a.m. to hold a hearing on Ervin S. Duggan (SC) to be a member of the Federal Communications Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Communications Subcommittee, of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on February 7, 1990, at 9:30 a.m. to hold a hearing on S. 1660, Telephone Operator Consumer Services Improvement Act of 1989 and S. 1643, Telephone Operator Service Consumer Protection Act of 1989.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSUMERS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Consumer Subcommittee, of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on February 7, 1990, at 10:30 a.m. to hold a hearing on the subject of child passenger safety.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Finance be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on February 7, 1990, at 10:30 a.m. to consider an original bill to provide for the restoration of certain trade benefits for Panama; and, to hold a hearing on Oversight of the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

AFGHANISTAN

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I want to bring the Senate's attention to an article on Afghanistan by John F. Burns that appeared in the magazine section of the New York Times on February 4, 1990. This is an important piece, and I hope my colleagues on both sides of the aisle will read it and think about its implications for human rights, for American leadership, for simple decency.

Several months ago, in an op-ed article that was published in the Washington Post I called upon the administration to reevaluate its policy toward the war in Afghanistan and to begin seriously to explore ways to end that conflict. Mr. Burns' description of what has been going on in the intervening months—mounting civilian casualties, continuing dissension and disarray among the military commanders, cynicism and confusion among administration officials—lends fresh urgency to that call, which I repeat today.

Mr. President, when Soviet troops invaded Afghanistan, I was among the first to advocate arming the resistance. I supported that policy until 1989 when the Soviet armed forces withdrew. That withdrawal was a victory for Afghanistan and a victory for the United States and those countries that joined with us in opposing the Soviet invasion. It was also a victory for the Soviet people who, as glasnost revealed the scope and costs of that terrible war, became increasingly open in their opposition. But as Mr. Burns' article makes clear, we have not capitalized on that victory to bring peace to a war-torn land or to begin the long, slow process of economic and political reconstruction. Instead, as he puts it "we have squandered that opportunity."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place Mr. Burns' article and the op-ed piece I referred to in the RECORD.

The articles follow:

AFGHANS: NOW THEY BLAME AMERICA

(By John F. Burns)

At first, it was just a morbid whistling overhead, the sound of an antipersonnel rocket in the dying moments of flight. Then it exploded in a shattering burst of smoke and dust.

A group of children had been playing a noisy game of tag near their mud-walled homes. Now, as the smoke cleared on this bright December afternoon, there was only moaning. Near the crater dug by the rocket lay two children, a boy of 17 and his 6-year-old sister, shattered by shards of twisted steel. Around them nearly a dozen other children were strewn about, many of them grievously wounded.

Throughout 1989, rocket attacks by United States-backed rebels had been pounding Government-held cities and towns; in major cities like Kabul and Kandahar I had seen these rockets kill as many as 40 people in a single blast. But this was Khost, a Government outpost in a remote, southeastern corner of the country (map, page 28), a place so small and so long besieged that its services barely function at all. It took 20 minutes for any help to appear. By then, another youngster, a 4-year-old girl, had died. By dusk, three more children were dead.

As a crowd gathered around the children, I was identified as an American reporter. There were murmurs as the word passed; the United States provides the rebels with $700 million in support each year—by far their largest single source—and the rockets are widely regarded as an American responsibility. One old man stepped forward. "Get away!" he shouted. "Why do you do this to us? Tell us why!"

The cry was familiar to the handful of American reporters who remained in Afghanistan after the last Soviet troops withdrew on Feb. 15, 1989. In the courtyards of 1,000-year-old mosques, in the sinuous back streets of ancient cities, in smoky restaurants where men in turbans chewed mutton kebabs, ordinary Afghans regularly approached and asked—sometimes in puzzlement, more often in anger—how the United States could allow the rebels to fire American-supplied weapons into neighborhoods and bazaars, killing and wounding the ordinary people on whose behalf they claim to be fighting.

During 1989, according to estimates made by Western relief agencies, rebel rocket attacks killed at least 1,000 people in Kabul, the capital, and perhaps several times that many across the country. But through it all, American officials insisted that the United States would continue to arm and finance the rebels, while supporting their refusal to negotiate with the Soviet-backed regime in Kabul. By the fall, the officials had begun to speak almost casually of the need for another "season" or two of fighting before the rebels could force the capitulation of the Kabul Government.

But the Government has shown no willingness to surrender, and no sign of collapsing in the face of the rebel attacks. Instead, it has pursued its own murderous military policies, killing large numbers of civilians—probably far more than the rebels—with its own long-range Soviet-made Scub-B missiles, a European battlefield weapon that is notoriously ill suited for the pinpoint accuracy required in strikes against guerrillas, and in high-altitude bombing raids that only rarely hit rebel targets.

Still, for many Afghan civilians, it was the rebels' resort to similar tactics that seemed the most troubling aspect of the war, so contrary was it to everything the United States had professed to seek in Afghanistan. That these tactics worried American officials was plain from the remarks of Peter Tomsen, President Bush's special envoy to the rebels, who told reporters during visits to rebel headquarters in Pakistan that their use of rockets against civilian targets reminded him of atrocities against civilians that he had seen in Vietnam, where he had served as a junior diplomat.

Mr. Tomsen said he had appealed to the rebel groups to end the attacks against civilians. But there was no sign that the United States was ready to cut back weapons supplied to the groups responsible, or to discipline them in any way. As 1990 began, the rocket attacks continued, with the overwhelming majority of them—more than 90 percent, according to the estimates of the International Committee of the Red Cross—hitting nowhere; near military targets.

The damage to American prestige has been immense. Since the Soviet Union sent its troops into Afghanistan in late 1979, Afghans had looked to the United States as the one foreign power with the resources, and the concern, to help end the country's miseries. It was American money and arms—together with support from China, Iran and Saudi Arabia—that ultimately helped force the Kremlin's decision to withdraw its troops.

But once the Russians were gone, many Afghans began to see the United States in a new guise, as a distant power that sanctioned the routine killing of civilians. And although these attitudes were widespread by last summer, it was only in the last few weeks, almost a year after Soviet troops withdrew, that there was any sign that the Administration was seriously reviewing its policy. Last month, the Administration sent a fact-finding mission to South Asia, led by Under Secretary of State Robert Kimmitt, the third-ranking official in the department. According to Administration officials, Mr. Kimmitt's conclusions will influence the United States position in the Moscow talks later this week between Secretary of State James A. Baker 3d and Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze, where Afghanistan is expected to be high on the agenda.

It remains to be seen whether Mr. Kimmitt's mission has reaffirmed Washington's existing policy, or laid the groundwork for a shift toward a negotiated settlement. But one thing is certain. After the last Soviet armored vehicles slipped and slid through the snow-bound mountain passes of the Hindu Kush on their way home to the Soviet Union, few who witnessed the relief among ordinary Afghans could have imagined the situation a mere 12 months later—that the United States would come to be blamed by many of these same people for prolonging the suffering of the war, while the Soviet and Afghan Governments presented themselves as the harbingers of peace.

Though Afghanistan has a long history of invasions, no marauders have done more to stir hatred than the Russians. During the last decade of war, at least half of the country's more than 30,000 villages were obliterated. In ancient cities like Kandahar, founded by and named for Alexander the Great, Soviet fighter-bombers, seeking to root out rebels, carpet-bombed entire districts. The Soviet bombs, together with their rockets and mortars and shells, killed most of the 1.3 million Afghans (out of a prewar population of 12 million to 15 million) that Western relief agencies estimate have died in the war.

As I traveled about the country, I saw devastation that went far beyond anything I had seen in half a dozen other distant wars. In Darwaza-i-Mashad, the oldest section of the 2,500-year-old city of Herat, every building for miles was destroyed. In streets that had been thriving when Alexander's army passed through three centuries before the birth of Christ, nothing remained but rubble overgrown with weeds. A Russian military interpreter who had worked in the country throughout the Soviet occupation quietly wept as he looked over the devastation. "Look what we have done," he said. "My God, how can we be forgiven?"

In the Salang valley north of Kabul, beside the mountain road used by Soviet troops for their withdrawal, scores of villages had been leveled. Of the life that had sustained the valley since well before Columbus landed in America, nothing remained but flocks of scavenging birds. On the road, and on the river banks below, lay the wrecks of hundreds of fuel tankers, trucks, tanks, armored personnel carriers and jeeps, burned and destroyed in rebel attacks. These, and the wrecked aircraft and helicopters that litter the ravaged terrain, are the only memorials that remain to the 15,000 Soviet soldiers who died in the war.

Set against the Soviet barbarity, the United States seemed ideally placed to help usher in the peace. This prospect spread a mood of triumph among American officials. Jon Glassman, charge d'affaires of the American Embassy in Kabul, caught the mood when he called the Kabul Government, in the wintry days just before the last Soviet unit departed, "a house without girders," and predicted that it would fall to the rebels in a matter of weeks, months at the most.

Those forecasting a swift collapse did not reckon on the doggedness of a Government with its back to the wall. Last March, pressured by their American and Pakistani advisers, the rebels massed for an attack on Jalalabad, a strategic city 50 miles from the rebels' home base in Pakistan. Through Jalalabad was considered the most vulnerable of the Government's strongholds, after four months and perhaps 5,000 dead, the great majority of them rebels, the city had not fallen. The American officials who had encouraged the attack were soon acknowledging it as a "catastrophe" that should never have been launched.

In September, again on American advice, the rebels mounted another major attack, at Khost. Three months later that siege, too, had bogged down, and Government generals were boasting to visitors that they could hang on for years. It was the same story everywhere Western reporters went—at Kabul, Kandahar, Herat and a dozen other urban centers. By the end of the year, the Government had not lost a single city or town it had held when Soviet forces withdrew. In some districts, it had even extended its area of control, re-occupying terrain that Soviet forces had given up as lost.

Meanwhile, on the rebel side, there was growing disarray. Within two weeks of the Soviet pullout, the rebels established a "provisional government," largely at the urgings of the Americans. But this "government," based in Peshawar, Pakistan, remained mostly a fiction; its telephone numbers could be obtained only at the American consulate in Peshawar, and the numbers rarely answered. Privately, American officials came to regard the provisional defense ministry—which Mr. Tomsen, the American delegate, claimed was preparing to take over management of the war—as a joke.

"They're just a bunch of mullahs over there," one American diplomat in Peshawar told me. "Go ahead and talk to them, have a cup of tea, but don't expect to learn anything useful about the war."

Not only did the 15 rebel parties continue to operate as separate units, but the ethnic, religious and political splits that run like fissures through their ranks widened. Some groups stopped fighting. A few concluded their own cease-fire arrangements with the Government. Two major groups, Gulbuddin Hekmatyar's faction of the Islamic Party and Burnahuddin Rabbani's Islamic Society, began a private war, ambushing and assassinating each other's fighters whenever the opportunity arose.

Still others, while they continued to receive American arms, turned their energies toward a burgeoning trade in opium, a traditional Afghan enterprise that grew so rapidly in rebel-held areas that the country now exports at least 800 tons, and perhaps as many as 2,000 of opium gum a year—figures which, according to American drug enforcement officials, places Afghanistan second only to the "golden triangle" of Burma, Thailand and Laos as the world's largest source of the raw material for heroin.

"It's travesty," a Scandinavian aid official said last spring, after he had traveled on horseback through districts of Helmand province, in south-central Afghanistan, that are the biggest source of the opium. On some days, the official said, he had traveled for a dozen miles through fields vivid with the pink, red and white opium poppies, and saw rebel commanders consulting with peasants about the crop.

Most of the opium is processed in laboratories in the rebel areas, or shipped—generally aboard donkeys, but sometimes aboard jeeps bought with United States funds—to processing plants in Pakistan. According to official American estimates, perhaps proportions of the heroin—tons every year, worth billions of dollars on the street—is eventually sold in the United States, accounting for perhaps one in three heroin deals in the country.

For Americans, the enormous growth in the heroin trade may be the most lasting consequence of the war. Yet American officials made little of it in public until recent months. By last fall, the officials were sufficiently concerned about the heroin traffic—and about the potential damage that could be done to Congressional support for the rebels—that Robert B. Oakley, the United States Ambassador to Pakistan, was authorized to arrange an unusual diplomatic encounter; a meeting at the Islamabad Embassy between American officials and Maulvi Nasim Akhundzada, the 34-year-old rebel commander who is the drug kingpin of the upper Helmand Valley.

Mr. Akhundzada had let it be known before the October meeting that he was ready to suppress the opium traffic in return for payments of $2 million a week, enough to support a private army of 7,000 men. According to embassy officials, no deal was considered, much less struck. Instead, the officials said, they told Mr. Akhundzada that American aid for the area would only be considered once heroin trafficking stopped.

Mr. Akhundzada listened to the Americans, then went back to Helmand, where he has continued his drug-running. While cut off from American weapons and money—a belatedly adopted United States policy denies aid to any rebel commander known to be drug trafficking—Mr. Akhundzada has little immediate cause for concern. With his drug profits, he has found other rebel groups who still receive American backing only too eager to sell him the weapons and vehicles he needs.

The day after the last Soviet troops were withdrawn, Mikhail S. Gorbachev sent President Bush a letter outlining a proposal for a cease-fire: Washington and Moscow would suspend arms shipments, encourage the Government and the rebels to join in a coalition, and act as guarantors until the country could choose a permanent government. Soviet officials spoke of holding elections under United Nations supervision, and urged the deposed King, Mohammed Zahir Shah, to return to Kabul, where he reigned for 40 years until his exile in 1973.

But Washington promptly rebuffed the Soviet initiative, and continued to brush off all Soviet proposals for almost a year. Until the Kimmitt mission last month, American officials took the position that the Afghan fighting would continue until the Kremlin agreed to effect by manipulation what the rebels have failed to accomplish by force—the removal of the Kabul Government.

This demand originated with the rebels, who refused to have any dealings with President Najibullah, the 43-year-old Kabul leader and former head of the notorious Khad secret police, whom the rebels accused of killing thousands in Kabul's prisons. Initially, many Afghans saw a policy that demanded the removal of a Government with such a grisly record as hard to fault. But as the months passed and the war stagnated, they began to question whether demanding Mr. Najibullah's ouster as a precondition for talks made sense, especially if there was a chance that the same thing could be accomplished by negotiation.

The Kabul leader himself made this point in virtually every interview and speech, declaring that he and his Government were prepared to share power with the rebels, to compete in fair elections, and to step down if they lost. "Najibullah is not the issue," he said in an interview with The Times in June. "The issue is how to stop the war." As for his past as head of the secret police, Mr. Najibullah noted that the Bush administration has negotiated with other political groups and leaders it abhors, citing its participation in talks with, among others, the genocidal Khmer Rouge of Cambodia.

If the American policy had any hope, it appeared to rest with dissidents in the Government army, who attempted to remove Mr. Najibullah in at least three abortive coups in 1989. But for its part, the Kremlin pledged to stand by the man it installed as Kabul leader in 1986. And even if the Soviets did decide to replace him, the rebels would almost certainly have a tougher time in any negotiation now than they would have had at the time of the withdrawal. Then, the Government was at its weakest, uncertain how well its troops would fare once the Russians were gone.

Now the Government's confidence has been bolstered, and morale among front-line troops seems higher than it has been in years. The defections that were occurring around the time of the Soviet withdrawal have slowed, in part because the rebels greeted some of the first soldiers to cross over by executing them. "Come back next year, or the year after, I'll still be here," said Brig. Gen. Abdul Sattar, commander of frontal units in Khost. Soldiers around him, Kabul loyalists hardened by years of seige, chuckled as he spoke.

The Najibullah Government has made some unexpected headway on the political front as well. In part, this is because Mr. Najibullah has proved to be a far more effective performer than his detractors had imagined. Almost daily, he has met with civic delegations—peasants, teachers, doctors, Islamic scholars, anybody who would give him a hearing—to present the Government's new image. Step by step, he repudiated virtually everything the 1978 revolution originally stood for, apologizing for trying to substitute the "utopianism, rhetoric and flashy slogans" of Marxism for common sense, for attempting to implement land reform in "a half-baked manner," and for riding roughshod over the country's deeply rooted Muslim faith and its complex structure of clans and tribes.

The expediency of all this is transparent, since Mr. Najibullah was a major figure in the Government during the years when many of the excesses were committed. But he has been assured an audience by the fact that he has been pressing for a negotiated peace at a time when the rebel leaders remained pledged to the continuation of the war. Even in refugee camps in Pakistan, among the 3.5 million Afghans who had fled their country, families gathered around their radio sets to listen to broadcasts of Mr. Najibullah's speeches and dialogues from Kabul. And in Afghanistan itself, in the Government-held cities and towns, and in the rebel-held valleys and villages, increasing numbers of Afghans were coming to the conclusion that the rebels, though they had driven the Soviets out, had not proved they were fit to govern the country.

For one thing, many Afghans seemed unpersuaded that the rebel leaders were likely to offer the country the social and political reforms it required. The Kabul Government's performance has been so heinous that few outside the country have remembered what it was about Afghanistan in 1978 that made the country such fertile ground for a communist coup—the fact that four Afghan children out of five received no education, that one child in two died before his or her fifth birthday, that as recently as 1971 more than half a million people had died of starvation in a single winter, and that the per capita income, at $157 was one of the lowest in the world. In Africa, such statistics are commonplace; in Asia, they put Afghanistan at the bottom of just about every list.

These facts help explain why, after all that had occurred in Kabul, there were still people of conscience working in the Government bureaucracy and army. Over flickering campfires, in backstreet restaurants and in the intimacy of their homes, many of these people expressed a loathing for Mr. Najibullah and his associates no less intense than that among the rebels. Yet they remained with the Government—in part because of their hope that from the ashes of the revolution a new regime would arise, a Government equally opposed to the religious fundamentalism of the rebels and the brutality of those who made the 1978 coup.

"What would you have people like me do?" one American-educated official asked one evening, as he sat on the balcony of a Kabul hotel room sipping a whisky and watching the sun slip behind the Koh-i-Baba mountains. "I know far more about the blood-thirstiness of Najibullah and his people than you ever will. But as I see it, it makes better sense to me to hope for a negotiated settlement of this war, something that doesn't simply hand the country over to the bearded men up there in the mountains."

By autumn, reports out of Washington were telling of skirmishes between the Central Intelligence Agency and the State Department, as officials scrambled to explain why forecasts of an early rebel triumph remained unfulfilled. Some blamed the C.I.A., which they said had been so confident of a rapid rebel victory that it began cutting back on weapons deliveries even before the Soviets had withdrawn. Others said the key blunder was in launching the Jalalabad attack, which cost the rebels their heaviest casualties of the war, without gaining any significant terrain.

In November, after hearing testimony from Mr. Tomsen and other officials, Congress voted to continue funding the rebels' military operations through the fall of 1990. New and more powerful munitions would be added to the rebels' armory, officials said, to help offset the heavier Soviet weaponry delivered in a daily airlift to Kabul.

But hearing Mr. Tomsen and other officials stretching their deadlines—in the summer, they spoke of victory by the fall, but by the winter they were talking of the need for another "season" of fighting, and possibly two—some old Asia hands thought they heard distant echoes of Vietnam. It was not only that officials greeted each new rebel failure with appeals for perseverance; they also began to show an unusual prickliness toward critics, within the bureaucracy and outside, who questioned the policy.

An early casualty was Edmund R. McWilliams Jr., a State Department officer who had been assigned to Kabul until 1988, then transferred to Pakistan. Despite a reputation as an uncompromising supporter of the rebels, Mr. McWilliams ran into trouble with his State Department superiors when his reporting from Pakistan began to cast doubt on the rebels' ability to prevail in the war. A few months after the Soviet withdrawal, he was ordered home to Washington, where he was assigned to duties that had nothing to do with Afghanistan. Among American officials who remained, talking to reporters came to be regarded as a hazardous pastime.

American reporters, too, became targets. When James Rupert, a reporter with extensive experience in Afghanistan, wrote in The Washington Post that public sentiment in Kabul appeared to be shifting in favor of Mr. Najibullah, Mr. Tomsen said the newspaper was "unreliable." After a Times story appeared reporting that rebel rockets were stirring anti-American sentiments in Kabul, another senior State Department official, Howard Schaffer, implied to a Congressional committee that this reporter had been duped by the Kabul Government.

Few of these officials had any firsthand knowledge of the situation inside Afghanistan; and some, like Mr. Tomsen, had no personal experience there at all. Neither they, nor any American political figure, included Kabul and the Government-held areas of the country on their visits to the region. And under a longstanding rule, no American official (at least none working in an overt capacity) was allowed to enter the country from the rebel side. All of this virtually guaranteed that perspectives appropriate to an earlier stage of the war would be slow to change.

Similar forces helped shape American reporting on the war. From 1980 until late 1986, few American journalists were allowed to visit Kabul or any other Government-held area, which meant that coverage of the war was left primarily to reporters working from the rebel side. Those venturing into the war zones carried back powerful accounts of the rebels' struggle, and of the destructiveness of the forces they faced. But it was inevitable that over the years, what Americans learned of the conflict came increasingly to reflect the rebel viewpoint; whatever balance access to the other side would have offered was lost.

In addition, much of the Afghan reporting available to Americans came from resident freeelancers, many of them relatively inexperienced. The result was that strong bonds often developed between those covering the conflict and the rebels. Many of the reporters became identified with a particular rebel group, usually the one that arranged their journeys "inside." To often, abuses by these groups went unreported, or at least underplayed.

In Peshawar's American Club, reporters skeptical of an approach that celebrated the rebels' virtues encountered ostracism. One visitor, Mary Williams Walsh of The Wall Street Journal, had her entry to the club "suspended" after reporting sardonically on the rebel boosterism she found. Later, after The New York Post ran a series of stories alleging that the CBS Evening News had used faked film footage in some of its reporting on rebel attacks, Ms. Walsh, who had done much of the initial reporting on that story, became a focus for renewed hostility. When in the fall of 1989 word of her departure from the Journal reached the American Club, some of the freelancers involved called for drinks all round.

Such attitudes did not encourage even-handed reporting. Little attention was given, for example, to the involvement of rebel commanders in the opium traffic, though it had been known in Peshawar for years. Nor, until his murderous attacks on other rebel groups attracted Washington's condemnation in 1989, did the Peshawar-based reporters—or American diplomats—pay much attention to the sinister nature of Mr. Hekmatyar, the dominant figure among the rebel leaders and the recipient, for years, of the lion's share of American money and weapons. But stories had long circulated in Kabul and Peshawar of how, as a Kabul student leader during the early 1970's, he had dispatched followers to throw vials of acid into the faces of women students who refused to wear veils.

Such selective reporting extended to the war itself. When in November 1988 the rebels executed more than 70 Government officers and men after they had surrendered at Torkham, the story was missed by many Peshawar-based American reporters. And there was little coverage in the United States, either, of massacres that occured in areas taken by the rebels, not even when Western human-rights groups offered well-documented accounts, as they did after the rebels engaged in a frenzy of rape and pillage in Kunduz in late 1988.

As the year passed, it became increasingly common to find among Westerners following the war a conviction that making clear-cut moral and political choices between the two sides no longer made sense, from the point of view of Afghanistan or of the West's future standing there. A restiveness with what one Peshawar-based diplomat described as the "evil empire" approach was broadly detectable among Western officials following the war from Pakistan and other regional capitals, including some Americans. It surfaced, too, in the attitudes of Western human rights and relief agencies, many of which had contributed powerfully, through their pronouncements and publications during the course of the war, to the grim image of the Kabul Government and its Soviet backers.

In public, agencies of the United Nations and organizations like the International Committee of the Red Cross maintained a posture of impartiality. But by this winter, Westerners working for these organizations in Peshawar and Kabul, including some whose Afghan duties involved dealing with policy makers in Washington and Moscow, had come to a broad consensus—that the Western interest, as well as that of the Afghan people, required urgent steps to end the war, even if this required negotiations with Kabul.

Last fall, one senior international diplomat returned from a trip to Washington dismayed by the lack of interest that he had found in the State Department and other United States Government agencies in such a political initiative. "They sat there and talked about the need for another 'season' of fighting, just as though they were talking about baseball," the diplomat said. "And when I spoke to them about civilian casualties and human rights, they had their answer. 'Don't talk to us about human rights in Afghanistan,' they said. 'Go and talk about that in Moscow.'"

Now, with last month's Kimmitt mission and this week's meeting between Mr. Baker and Mr. Shevardnadze, this attitude may be changing. State Department officials briefing reporters before the Kimmitt trip told them that one option was a plan involving a cease-fire and an arms cutoff by both the United States and the Soviet Union—a plan that sounded remarkably like Mr. Gorbachev's proposal of a year ago, although the American officials made no mention of it.

As Mr. Baker prepared to head for Moscow, it seemed unlikely that the United States would agree to direct negotiations involving Mr. Najibullah, since the rebel leaders have sworn to fight on against the Kabul leader with or without American support. But a wide variety of diplomatic options are available to Moscow and Washington if, at last, they can agree that the war must end.

The two superpowers might play the role of umpires in the transition to a new government led by the exiled King, Mohammed Zahir Shah; or they might agree to give more active backing to the United Nations in a revival of the intermediary role it played in arranging the Soviet troop withdrawal. In any event, since peace is the professed goal of some of the more moderate rebel groups, and of almost all ordinary Afghans, inventive diplomacy would begin with a better than even chance.

But for those who witnessed the carnage of 1989, the conundrum of the American policy will remain. Was it simply a matter of momentum—of a new Administration with close links to the one that espoused the rebel cause failing to adjust to new realities? What role was played by President Bush's reluctance to provoke the Republican right, with its passionate commitment to a war that offered the United States an opportunity to confront and humiliate the Soviet Union, at virtually no cost in American lives? Or was there a deeper message, one that laid bare the cold-war reflexes of an American Government that enters the 1990's struggling to cope with a world that seems less and less amenable to the foreign policy approaches that have served it for more than two generations?

These will be questions for the historians to ponder. But in Afghanistan this winter, they are matters of life and death. In the country's dusty cities and towns, and in the deep valleys that spread like fingers through the Hindu Kush, millions of people are listening this winter for the terrifying whistling of the rebel rockets, and wondering when the men who fire them—and their enemies in Kabul—will be subjected to a new kind of influence from the superpowers; one that, instead of prolonging the killing, prevails on the combatants to stop it.

IT'S TIME TO WORK FOR PEACE IN AFGHANISTAN

(By Bill Bradley)

Even as military dictators trample popular democracy in China, Benazir Bhutto's pledge to uphold democracy in Pakistan rekindles hope that freedom will triumph over oppression. That is why the prime minister's visit to the United States should prompt a change in our policy toward South Asia. What is needed is a much more concerted effort to reach a negotiated settlement to the Afghan war. Otherwise we will have missed our greatest opportunity to support Pakistan's new democracy.

As long as Soviet troops continued their brutal occupation of Afghanistan, U.S. policy correctly focused on forcing their withdrawal. That goal has been achieved. Yet our policy has continued on automatic pilot, raising serious questions about American interests and objectives in the region.

I believe our interests are twofold: promoting a stable, independent Afghanistan and supporting democracy in Pakistan. These goals are fully consistent, provided we begin to define our interests less in terms of what America is against—Soviet expansion and Communist repression—and more in terms of what we are for—democracy and peace.

Benazir Bhutto's election is unambiguously the best hope for democracy in Pakistan and peace in South Asia. So the United States has a big stake in her success.

But unless we articulate an American vision for a political settlement to the Afghan conflict, we risk prolonging the enormous economic and social problems Bhutto's government has inherited from Gen. Zia. She has promised to liberate her people from poverty and illiteracy—people Americans applaud. Yet, her ability to deliver on those promises is seriously hindered by the presence of more than 3 million Afghan refugees who cannot return to their homeland without a credible peace.

The Soviet withdrawal was an unprecedented victory for the heroic Afghan freedom fighters and their Pakistani and American supporters. We must now begin working together to achieve the broad-based government on which a peaceful future depends. So far, U.S. support for the Afghan cause has consisted of supplying the mujaheddin's military struggle against the Soviet puppets. But military solutions alone, even if attainable, are not enough. It is time to begin, in partnership with Afghanstan, Pakistan and others, to plan for the political and economic reconstruction that is essential to lasting peace and genuine independence.

The naysayers will argue that total military victory over the Soviet-backed government in Kabul is required for political reconstruction. They will argue for such a policy even if it means making common cause with Islamic extremists. They will argue for it even if the fighting lasts for years and the flood of refugees pouring into Pakistan strains its economy to the breaking point and threatens the fragile democracy that has begun to take root there. They will pay this price because they believe that military victory is the only way to ensure that Soviet forces won't return.

I disagree. The mujaheddin already control most of the countryside. They would not agree to a political settlement unless it reflected this strategic reality and unless it excluded Najibullah and other key antagonists. For these reasons, a negotiated peace acceptable to the patriotic resistance commanders would be highly unlikely to produce a government that would permit, much less invite, Soviet soldiers to return. And no reasonable Soviet leadership would dare repeat the mistakes of its predecessors by fabricating new pretexts for military intervention in Afghanistan.

There is another reason why the Soviets will not risk a new invasion. Even before glasnost and perestroika, Soviet Moslems—the fastest-growing segment of the Soviet population—opposed the war in Afghanistan. That opposition became such a big concern to the Soviet leadership that it withdrew Central Asian troops from Afghanistan early in the conflict. Recently, Mikhail Gorbachev and his supporters, as a part of their political strategy, have begun to reduce limits on religious expression, including Islamic activities in Soviet Central Asia. As a result, mosques and religious organizations seem to be increasing, as I saw firsthand on a recent visit to Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan. This reinvigorated Islamic consciousness would make it even more risky for future Soviet leaders to get into another war with the people of Afghanistan.

A political settlement that leads to an independent, peaceful and pluralistic Afghanistan will not be easy to achieve, though it is likely to be welcomed by war-weary Afghans in the countryside, in Kabul and in exile. But if progress toward such a settlement is put off by protracted military campaigns and the tide of refugees flows into Pakistan uanbated, the prospects grow dim not only for Afghanistan but also for Bhutto's efforts to nurture an unprecedented Islamic democracy in Pakistan.

Yesterday Prime Minister Bhutto told Congress that she is counting on American help in ending the Afghan war. The time has come to join her in encouraging the recently constituted interim government of the seven-party alliance to broaden its base by including additional Afghan leaders, commanders and emigres. This would make it a more credible and effective competitor to the regime in Kabul. We should also assist Bhutto in enlisting Saudi Arabia's support for a negotiated settlement that would serve our mutual interests in a pluralistic, independent Afghanistan.

The prime minister's visit has made it clear that the time is ripe for the United States and Pakistan to join in a new partnership to end the Afghan conflict and repatriate the refugees. Let's not delay in advancing our common interests in democracy and peace.●

THE DECLINE OF CENTRAL GOVERNMENT

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I call to the attention of my colleagues a speech on "The Decline of Central Government" by Mitchell E. Daniels, Jr., president and chief executive officer of Hudson Institute in Indianapolis. The speech, delivered last fall at Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs, was published in the November 1 issue of Vital Speeches of the Day.

Mr. Daniels argues that a number of factors—historical, economic, technological—are converging to render central governments around the world less influential and relevant in people's lives, that history is on the side of "the small, the nimble, the decentralized, the private."

Mr. Daniels offers some specific suggestions for a response to the new realities we face: "Government that sees * * * citizens not as objects of therapy but as persons of innate dignity, will be relevant government. Government that measures its success by the scarcity, not the annual increase, of its dependent clients, can still be active government. Government that constantly searches for ways to attract, liberate and incentivize human talent will be successful government."

I ask that Mr. Daniels' entire speech be entered into the RECORD.

The speech follows:

[Vital Speeches of the Day, Nov. 1, 1989]

THE DECLINE OF CENTRAL GOVERNMENT

(By Mitchell E. Daniels, Jr.)

I was once instructed in Winston Churchill's five rules of public speaking. Of the three I can remember, I am about to violate one. Churchill believed that "amenities are inanities;" he preferred to shun initial pleasantries in favor of a dramatic opening chord of some kind. I hope the great man will not consider me disrespectful when, presented with this very special opportunity, I do take a moment to express sincere thanks at your invitation to spend an afternoon in this place of high standards and fond memories.

Another 20th Century statesman and phrasemaker, who resembled Churchill in physique and presence if not precisely in outlook, expressed my feelings: Hizzoner Richard Daley, on some occasion special to him, said he felt that he had reached the "pinochole of success." And so do I.

This year, as in Churchill's time, the headlines have often been dominated by news from Poland. There, a brave people undertakes the awesome challenge of transition to free political institutions, institutions for which its new leaders are, by their own admission, entirely unprepared.

Exactly 50 years ago, Nazi tanks and Stukas were annihilating a Polish Army that had proclaimed itself ready for anything. A bulletin of the Polish Information Service dated July 1, 1939, just 60 days before the blitzkrieg fell, praised the late Marshal Pilsudski for his foresight in building "one of the first class military powers of Europe."

Of special pride to the Poles was their horse cavalry, to which they had committed more than a quarter of their 132 standing regiments. A military observer of the day termed the cavalry "the outstanding feature of the Polish Army." He wrote "I should class this the best in Europe." And so it was. Regrettably, its skilled and courageous soldiers had prepared for the wrong war.

I am apprehensive that, many of today's Wilson School students may, like the cavalry graduates of the Polish military academies, be preparing for irrelevance. And, more like those Poles than the Solidarity leaders of today, today's public service trainees may not recognize fundamental transformations of the institutions they expect to lead, and the challenges they expect to face.

A basic fact of our time is that the American federal government is losing its purchase on events and is becoming less and less relevant to the outcomes with which it busies itself. Only some of the causes of this declining influence are temporary, domestic, or reversible.

My contention is not Paul Kennedy's; America is not in decline, not necessarily, versus other nations. But American government, along with central governments everywhere, is in decline versus private institutions, private individuals, private decision making. Leaders of 21st Century central government must anticipate with humility roles of facilitation and liberation rather than the Platonic "best and the brightest" status to which their intellect and training may have beckoned them.

One of Princeton's greatest products, Adlai Stevenson, said to a class on this campus in 1955, "The power of this American political organization is virtually beyond measurement. All of this is to say that your power is virtually beyond measurement." Stevenson spoke from an experience, and to an audience, steeped in confidence that a well-trained American elite, manning the levers of an active central government, was destined to be the decisive change agent in national and world events. This is the role for which places like the Wilson School have prepared their progeny.

By now, many have detected—and many, for reasons I find distasteful, have welcomed—a declining influence of the American central government on world affairs. But the reality is that our central government, the government to which I presume most of you are looking for careers "in the nation's service," is a diminishing factor in most outcomes, foreign and domestic. Moreover, this diminution is common to all central governments of our time, and is going to continue steadily. Ironically, the century that saw the near-perfecting of totalitarianism, and in the liberal countries the explosion of central authority, will close with a rapid erosion of government's centrality of structure, and centrality in events.

Let's examine the causes of this phenomenon, beginning with our own country.

A little over a month ago, I received a call from one of the country's top reporters, a White House and political correspondent for the Boston Globe. It was that time, he said. Time to write his annual "August" story, about the sudden shutting down of Washington for the summer recess. But what struck him this year, he said, was that "It's been like August all year long." He meant that, to the extent Washington had been newsworthy at all, it was due to small issues, or non-issues, such as the Tower nomination, flag desecration, or the Jim Wright contretemps. Sen. Patrick Moynihan had spoken of the "hush" fallen over the city. David Broder had lamented "small stakes" government.

In the Globe, my friend ultimately wrote "Thanks to a series of coincidences, Washington in 1989 has lost some of its ability to command attention, and with it some of (its) intoxicating allure. . . . [The] capital city's inflated sense of self-importance has been punctured this year." I agree, except that I don't think the situation is coincidental; although the puncture will surely be patched, I think a slow leak will persist over the long term.

The Globe identified some causes of this "year of Augusts." One most certainly is the fiscal handcuffs into which Congress has slowly locked itself.

After subtracting interest costs and untouchable entitlements spending, the discretionary share of the federal budget is down to about 40 percent. Of this portion, defense spending, cut for five straight years, has proven the easiest, almost the only budget category, Congress is capable of cutting meaningfully. But even the most reckless proposals for further defense cuts are small by comparison to the structural deficits the nation now runs.

The upshot is that massive domestic interventions of the sort that Wilson School seminars studied and devised over the last quarter century have long since become extinct. For evidence, consider this month's long-awaited drug policy. Backed by overwhelming political momentum, the Administration and Congressional negotiators labored all year, scoured the budget for extra cash, and finally gave birth to—what?—$2.2 billion in additional spending, a mouse in the context of a $1.1 trillion budget. By contrast, the CETA program of the '70s was a $10 billion program in unadjusted dollars, roughly three times the total spending on today's consensus crisis problem.

This bind is not going to loosen; if anything, it will tighten in the decades ahead. Even though flattened spending and continued economic growth will gradually grind down the annual deficit, the brakeless locomotive of entitlement spending hurtles on. The demands of Social Security, Medicare, civil service and military pensions, and other open-ended obligations will continue to eat up any spare cash that restraint elswhere might produce.

Reform is not in prospect. Congress' most recent foray into the field produced an expansion of benefits for the elderly, who are now the country's wealthiest age group. The catastrophic health legislation of 1988—a title that has beome more apt with time—had one virtue, in that for the first time the elderly were to finance their own benefit. As we meet, Congress is in headlong retreat on this point and, incredibly, is considering paying for the bill by yet another payroll tax increase on the working-age population.

Capitol Hill Democrats dream of income tax increases, but even if obtainable this would be no answer. Income tax hikes large enough to fund deficit reduction plus domestic initiatives would be self-defeating, economically and at the polls. Tax indexing, a fundamental triumph for governmental integrity, has ended "stealth" tax increases, and closed another door to federal expansionism.

A rising fraction of the money Washington does have is provided by the aforementioned payroll tax. All of its proceeds are being spent currently; its "trust funds" are untrustworthy; in fact, they are mythical. Sometime in the '90s, when it becomes apparent that this most regressive of all taxes, already the biggest tax payment for a majority of Americans, is providing zero security to its payors, that there is no real money in the drawer, the next tax revolt will occur.

Payroll tax relief may be accompanied by some moderation of entitlement spending, but on a net basis the fiscal noose will probably tighten another notch. Creative federal service eventually could reduce to designing the ideal check-writing software.

Already the effects are showing up. Foreign assistance spending, Congress' other pet target, is a post-war lows. After deducting payments to the most favored nations of Israel and Egypt, Washington has virtually nothing left for the rest of the world. Japan has surpassed us in foreign aid spending. President Bush's recent trip to Eastern Europe underscored the fact that the cupboard is essentially bare; and that any romantic encounters between the U.S. and East Bloc freedom-seekers are likely to be Dutch treat.

Richard Fisher, a bright young Texan, left government after distinguished service in the Carter administration for what he found the more stimulating arena of capital management. He recently commented that "[T]he federal government . . . is effectively a poorly run business and, like any business suffering under the weight of anemic cash flow and excessive contingent liabilities, its influence is waning."

The public policy marketplace began to react even before most people in Washington were alert to their predicament. The first and most interesting sign was the reemergence of state governments. To an extent, Reagan policies aimed at devolving power to the states were responsible, but Congress thwarted or diluted most of these. In truth, the change was more de facto than de jure.

Across the board, states have reclaimed the policy initiative. They are innovating, reforming, regulating and, yes, taxing and spending in ways that Congressional liberals can only envy. The new Bush drug policy, it turns out, calls in actuality for two to three times more new spending by states and localities than by what we used to call Uncle Sugar.

In a striking political development, members of Congress are reversing the traditional career path by leaving Washington and running for state offices. Liberal Democrats whose undergraduate dreams were of lifelong prominence in D.C. are bailing out for statehouses where there is still a chance to flex their social engineering talent. Here in New Jersey, James Florio is making his second escape attempt against, I would note, another Congressman.

The states' resurgence does not even stop at the water's edge. In trade, the State and Commerce Departments frequently find themselves spectators to bilateral dealmaking by governors. You may be intrigued by the fact that, as of this year, more states are maintaining field offices in Tokyo than in Washington. Kentucky has recently floated an $80 million bond issue in Japan, yen-denominated.

Let's suppose for a moment that these trends can be arrested. Maybe a real implosion of the Soviet empire will produce a "peace dividend" well beyond the cuts of the last five years. Maybe the boom of the '80s will become even louder in the middle-aged, productive, high-income '90s. Maybe Washington will summon the courage to bell the entitlements cat and come into some "mad money" once again. Will it make a difference? Will central government become central again?

I think not. Still bigger forces are taking us elsewhere.

Let's start, as great trends usually do, in the world of ideas. Robert Heilbroner, who wrote to my generation of students on the merits of Maoism, now writes that "The contest between capitalism and socialism is over: capitalism has won. "Earlier, Jean Francois Revel had commented from France, "Anymore, when we want a Marxist for a debate over here, we have to import one from an American university."

By the '90s, Comintern convention planners will be down to a choice between Havana, Pyongyang, and Albania—if the meeting is still held at all.

The wholesale rout of Marxism as a credible economic theory has its greatest importance, of course, for those enslaved millions who have endured its practice. But the behavior of free nations will be affected as well.

Even before the abandonment of central planning by the East Bloc, Western governments were rearranging their policies away from central planning. The American tax rate cuts of 1981 and 1986 touched off a furious round of modeling which has now seen 55 countries reduce their top rates, and only two raise them, since 1984.

Privatization of parastatal industry is now the rage worldwide. Many LDCs are moving even faster than the multilateral lenders, who underwent their own conversion earlier in the decade, prod them to move.

In Jamaica, a devoted Socialist left office in defeat as the decade opened, and returned to power as a capital-chasing privatizer, all within an eight-year period. In Latin America, the acknowledged revolutionary doctrine is the populist capitalism of Hernando DeSoto, who castigates both "rightist" oligarchs and would-be Marxist dictators in favor of property rights and free economic entry for the masses.

It is not necessary to believe, with the author of this year's most provocative essay, that we have reached the "end of history" and a permanent worldwide victory for liberal ideals and consumerism.

It suffices to note that American policy will be constrained against retrogression by the emulation, and the competition, of a world scrambling to create incentives and private sector growth, through reduced statism. It is awkward to accept a standing ovation while unstringing the instrument with which you performed.

Finally, as my Hudson Institute colleague George Gilder has depicted in a brilliant new book, technology, led by microelectronics, is irresistibly pulling decisions downwards and outwards from central authorities of all kinds. Capital is able to evade and escape the clutches of the state. It already moves to international commerce in amounts rivaling the annual U.S. federal budget every day.

An economy more creatively destructive than Schumpeter ever envisioned dissolves and reforms industries faster than government can regulate them. More and more, governments are regulated by business: the Chinese are more at risk from disinvestment and curtailed tourism than from any sanction George Bush could impose.

Natural resources and geographic position, the main historic objectives for which mighty central power has been assembled and employed, are less and less relevant to the production of wealth. A silicon chip is 1 percent raw material, 99 percent mental input. Barren rocks off the Asian mainland, half a globe from their biggest markets, now house the earth's most dynamic economies.

As one totalitarian state after another has learned, their essential power to atomize society and isolate their population is ineffective before the arsenals of faxes, phones, and modems that now enable humans everywhere to reach each other, within and across national boundaries.

In this world, attempts to reconstruct greater central authority will wash downstream against an overwhelming current. Paul Johnson has observed that "scientific genius, for good or for ill, impinges on humanity far more than any statesman or warlord." The science of the late 20th Century impinges against the statesman and against the warlord on behalf of the small, the nimble, the decentralized, the private.

The great Senator Hubert Humphrey did not study at the Wilson School but, for his era, he received roughly equivalent training. He was a pharmacist, and it has been said that he thought of government as pharmacy, a process of prescription dispensed by the wise and compassionate.

Senator Humphrey would have been a frustrated pharmacist in the Washington of today and tomorrow. But, happily, room for active and creative government service will remain for those with different role models.

Churchill, describing the non-stop activism of the first Gladstone government, called it the "Golden Age, when Liberalism was still an aggressive, unshackling force."

In this framework of "aggressive unshackling" lies the continued viability of government in an age of liberalism more golden, because it is global, than Churchill imagined. Active policies that liberate, enable, and empower individuals will be needed and, I think, demanded.

To cite only a few examples, centralized action is needed to create the liberating infrastructure of the era ahead. Fiberoptic cable, connecting every home and workplace, will be the REA and the interstate highways of the next century, unleashing individual potential in massive degree. The digital network, a revolutionary force multiplier for small units of all kinds, must first be created by the standardization, deregulation, and perhaps direct investment of the federal government.

An entire empowerment agenda of vouchers, private ownership, and free choice awaits enactment. The federal goverment should forget about micromanagement in areas like education and transportation, and attack the R&D deficiency that impedes adoption of new technologies. At less than $50 per employee, education invests in R&D only 1 percent of the average for all business, and 1/600th the investment of high-tech businesses. Instead of wasting billions on urban mass transit in an increasingly suburban society, the federal government could fund hardware and software development aimed at maximizing the efficiency of the national transportation system.

Enormous opportunity awaits the policymakers who can bring off sensible risk management over the obstruction of the pop scientists, the Luddites, and the "I've got mine" lobby. The farcical but damaging cases of cyclamates and Alar could be trivial compared to the errors of which the current policy process is capable: global warming, for all we know now, may be the Piltdown

Man or "cold fusion" of its day, but we may spend billions before we "undiscover" it.

Our educational shortcomings notwithstanding, the Americans of coming years will be the best educated, best informed, and technologically most powerful individuals the world has known.

These Americans will be less and less prone to be herded into unions, political parties or other group identities for the convenience of experimenting paternalists. They will make their own decisions with declining guidance from government at any level. Government that sees these citizens not as objects of therapy but as persons of innate dignity, will be relevant government. Government that measures its success by the scarcity, not the annual increase, of its dependent clients, can still be active government. Government that constantly searches for ways to attract, liberate and incentivize human talent will be successful government.

A leading Democratic pollster recently emerged from a series of focus groups to say, "[P]eople were not expressing pro- or anti-Washington views. They just don't care. Washington is not a factor in their consciousness." He had glimpsed the future.

Thomas Mann once declared that, fundamentally, the life of men has nothing to do with politics. But, at levels beneath the metaphysical, 20th Century man has had everything to do with politics. Government has, for a large share of mankind, been inescapable. This has been, in Paul Johnson's phrase, the century of the career politician.

Secretary of State George Schultz once said to a few of us that he sometimes felt like the ant on a log in a rushing river. He said, "The ant runs and runs, believing he is rolling the log. But he's really just running to stay out of the creek."

In Kurt Vonnegut's Jailbird, he proposed that the Presidential limousine be outfitted with one of those toy plastic steering wheels, to remind whoever was President that he could only pretend to drive.

These are not the images I wish for federal government in our country, nor the ones I foresee for graduates of this school.

But if Washington is to avoid irrelevance, and an aeon of Augusts, it will be because its oncoming leadership brings great creativity and due humility to the task of "aggressively unshackling" the energies of free beings everywhere.●

THE WE THE PEOPLE . . . BICENTENNIAL PROGRAMS ON THE CONSTITUTION AND BILL OF RIGHTS

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, one of the most important things we can give our children is an understanding of the fundamental principles on which our Nation was founded. The Constitution and the Bill of Rights are the cornerstones of our Nation. These documents outline both our freedom and our responsibility. The Constitution is a living document—it depends on educated citizens to understand and interpret it, and to safeguard it against those who wish to restrict liberty.

In New Jersey, Alan Markowitz and Margaret Hayes are leading the effort to educate our children about the Constitution. As coordinators of the "We the People . . . Bicentennial Programs on the Constitution and Bill of Rights," they have volunteered their time and energy to help children learn about their precious legacy.

This program includes the national bicentennial competition, its noncompetitive program, Congress and the Constitution, and the national historical pictorial map contest in congressional districts. Thousands of New Jersey school children have taken part in these innovative programs that mark the bicentennial of the Constitution.

I ask my colleagues to join me in commending Dr. Markowitz, Ms. Hayes and the many other volunteers who are helping our children to learn more about the rights and responsibilities of democracy.●

BUDGET SCOREKEEPING REPORT

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I hereby submit to the Senate the latest budget scorekeeping report for fiscal year 1990, prepared by the Congressional Budget Office in response to section 308(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended. This report was prepared consistent with standard scorekeeping conventions. This report also serves as the scorekeeping report for the purposes of section 311 of the Budget Act.

This report shows that current level spending is under the budget resolution by $3.5 billion in budget authority, and over the budget resolution by $4 billion in outlays. Current level is under the revenue floor by $5.2 billion.

The current estimate of the deficit for purposes of calculating the maximum deficit amount under section 311(a) of the Budget Act is $114.6 billion, $14.6 billion above the maximum deficit amount for 1990 of $100 billion.

The report follows:

U.S. CONGRESS,
CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
Washington, DC, February 5, 1990.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
Chairman, Committee on the Budget, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The attached report shows the effects of congressional action on the budget for fiscal year 1990 and is current through February 1, 1990. The estimates of budget authority, outlays, and revenues are consistent with the technical and economic assumptions of the 1990 Concurrent Resolution on the Budget (H. Con. Res. 106). This report is submitted under section 308(b) and in aid of section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act, as amended, and meets the requirements for Senate scorekeeping of section 5 of S. Con. Res. 32, the 1986 First Concurrent Resolution on the Budget.

This is my first report on the second session of the 101st Congress. There has been no action that affects the current level of spending or revenues.

Sincerely,

ROBERT D. REISCHAUER.

CBO WEEKLY SCOREKEEPING REPORT FOR THE U.S. SENATE, 101ST CONGRESS, 2D SESS., AS OF FEB. 1, 1990

[In billions of dollars]

PEGGY SAY'S LONG ORDEAL

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, it has been nearly 5 years since the chief Middle East correspondent for the Associated Press was abducted in Lebanon. Since his kidnaping in March 1985, Terry Anderson—and his family and friends—have endured immeasurable pain and suffering.

The January 1990 edition of Kentucky Living contains an article that all my colleagues should read. Entitled "Peggy Say's Long Ordeal," it provides keen insight into the tireless efforts of Terry Anderson's sister. Mr. President, Peggy Say has done an exceptional job in keeping the faith: She has been described as a virtual one-woman diplomatic unit working to win the release of the hostages and to keep their plight in the public consciousness.

When asked if Terry Anderson knew of his sister's efforts, Marcel Fontaine, a former French hostage and the last person known to have seen him alive, replied:

He knows absolutely what you're doing and you are his hope for freedom. He knows that as long as you are out there, he's not going to be forgotten.

I think it is important for all Americans to know that Congress—indeed, America—has not forgotten our citizens held captive abroad. In his State of the Union Address, President Bush reaffirmed our commitment to their release: "Our hearts go out to our hostages—our hostages who are ceaselessly on our minds and in our efforts."

Mr. President, I ask that the article on Peggy Say appear in the RECORD so that all my colleagues may read of her heroic efforts.

The article follows:

PEGGY SAY'S LONG ORDEAL

(By Gary Luhr)

Peggy Say has a fantasy about what it will be like when her brother, Terry Anderson, is finally released by the Lebanese terrorists who have held him hostage for almost five years. "The house is going to be clean, the clothes are going to be packed (and) I'm going to get out of here before the press gets to me," she says. "The reality," she quickly adds, "is it's probably going to come at the worst of times."

As if times could get any worse than the last five years have been. Any worse than the more than 1,750 days (longer than any other hostage has been held) since her brother was abducted at gunpoint on March 16, 1985. Any worse than the emotional roller coaster she has endured, soaring every time there is news, even rumors, of activity that could lead to her brother's release, and plunging again every time the hoped for result failed to materialize.

Five years of anger laced with hope, of courage tempered by frustration. Five years in which she has become, as the New York Times described her, "a virtual one-woman diplomatic unit working to win the release of the hostages and to keep their plight in the public consciousness." The only thing, one imagines, that could make her life worse would be evidence that her brother had died or been executed by his captors.

That possibility is one she refuses to concede for now; not for Anderson or the seven other Americans and five other hostages imprisoned, presumably in Beirut. So strong is her belief that last year she bought the house next door to her own home near Cadiz in Western Kentucky. She expects Anderson to stay here, at least for a time, after he is released.

Until then she will continue to write and travel and speak out in her brother's behalf to anyone who will listen. She sat with relatives of other hostages across from President Reagan in the White House. She has been to the Middle East and other countries seeking help from anyone who might be able to influence her brother's captors. She is a persistent presence in Washington, where she makes the rounds of foreign embassies and of Administration and congressional offices, keeping the pressure on officials, whom she feels have forgotten about the hostages. She gives speeches and interviews freely, though the demands for such are so great she has to use an answering machine to screen telephone calls even when she is home.

The Associated Press, for whom Anderson was Chief Middle East Correspondent when he was captured, pays her phone bills and travel expenses. She talks at least once a day with someone at AP headquarters in New York. "My phone number is posted right in front of their faces," she says. "If any hostage story comes on the line they are to call me."

She and her husband, David, a self-employed general contractor, moved to Kentucky in July 1988 to escape the public and media attention that had dogged them whenever they left their house in Batavia, NY. They had considered moving to Nashville to be near friends whom they sometimes visited at the friends' cottage on the backwaters of Lake Barkley. When they learned the cottage was for sale, they bought it. "People in New York and Washington said, 'Why in the world did she move to Kentucky?' I guess they thought I had dropped off the end of the world or something," she says. "Once they come down here, there's no more questions. You get out on the lake and look around and it doesn't get any prettier."

The lake and the couple's 24-foot pontoon boat are a release from the daily demands of dealing with the hostage situation. For Say, it is a full-time job of answering mail, monitoring news broadcasts, and maintaining contact with the families and friends of other hostages.

"A lot of people have the perception that I'm in this alone. Far from it," she says. "The circle goes out and out. We have a mailing list of 2,000 people that, when anything happens, we notify. These are friends that have written for the whole four years, that have events (for the hostages) in their towns and everything."

Still, she concedes, things sometimes get frantic even on the best of days.

"You have to learn to go with that, you know—to be prepared. I can be doing the most mundane things and the phone will ring and it will be something in which the whole press goes nuts. You've got to be able to set everything else aside."

She has two telephones, one for reporters and other outsiders and a private line on which only a handful of people can call. Both have long extension cords so she can move about the room as she talks. On a "quiet" day she might get a dozen calls. When something significant occurs, the phone rings continuously.

"When anything happens," she says, "everybody is hitting all of their contacts to try to find out what it is about (and) we are all frantically passing information to each other to come up with a coherent story."

She spends at least two hours every day writing speeches, answering letters and distributing postcards addressed to President Bush with pictures of the American hostages. To date more than 400,000 have been mailed. A television set in the corner of the living room stays turned to the Cable News Network, the volume kept just loud enough for her to stop working if she hears any news about the hostages. For more than a year after moving to Kentucky, she could only watch news on the three network stations because she didn't have cable. Last fall, however, a satellite receiving dish was installed in the yard beside her home, a gift from the Kentucky Association of Electric Cooperatives and a fellow Western Kentuckian, former Governor Edward T. Breathitt. The association bought the dish and a year's worth of descrambled programming through Kentucky Telecommunications, Inc. of Owensboro with the money it saved when Breathitt declined any honorarium for speaking at the group's annual meeting in Louisville last November.

The nerve center of Say's crusade is a tiny office next to her bedroom where she has a small desk and a word processor. She uses it to produce periodic newsletters for the 2,000 people on her mailing list. She also uses it to write the letter she publishes in the Beirut press each October on her brother's birthday. The walls of the room are covered with pictures of Anderson and with newspaper articles about his capture and captivity. "I get days when I just want to rip everything off the wall, I get so frustrated," she says, "but I'm sure Terry feels that way too."

Her own description of her brother and those of former hostages portray Anderson as in intense personality ill suited for coping with conditions the hostages must endure. He reportedly doesn't know that his father and brother both died in 1986. He has never seen his four-year-old daughter. The ex-Marine, who served two tours of duty in Vietnam, sits chained and blindfolded in a roach-infested cell for all but 10 minutes every day. He has been likened to a caged animal, working off his frustration by doing as many as 600 push-ups a day and wearing out his socks from running in place. He has gone on hunger strikes and, on Christmas Eve 1987, he beat his head against the wall until blood ran down his face and he had to be subdued by one of the guards. Eventually he was allowed to make a videotape in which he told President Reagan he was tired and lonely and there was a limit to how long the hostages could last.

Peggy Say is angry that the U.S. government hasn't worked harder for the hostages' release—that their lives have been, in her words, "devalued."

"This is a humanitarian issue and a human rights outrage," she declares. "This whole situation with these hostages, the injustice from day one and the fact that we're still debating what we should do for them. I don't think anybody can say that if there were 100 involved there would be a debate.

It was the government's willingness to negotiate the release of 39 Americans aboard a TWA airplane hijacked to Beirut in June 1985 that started her hostage crusade. For three months after Anderson's capture, she had remained silent at the urging of the U.S. State Department. Publicity, she was told, would only prolong her brother's ordeal. But when she saw the government was willing to ignore its non-negotiation policy for the hijack victims, she went on the Cable News Network to remind people there were then 46 hostages, not 39. There followed a nearly non-stop series of appearances on news broadcasts and at public forums that continued until November 1986, when the country learned that the government had tried to sell arms to Iran in exchange for the hostages' release.

"Iran-contra was the Waterloo for us," she says. "It destroyed us. Destroyed any hope for the hostages for a long, long time. It's just now that the feelings are coming back with people. But for a solid year, nobody wanted to hear it."

Critics attacked her on call-in shows and hate mail mounted from people who said she had forced the Administration to act irresponsibly. "They continue to do that to this day," she says. "They say, 'It's your fault. You made (the President) do something he shouldn't have done. I really feel that they should be ashamed of themselves, trying to blame what they did on the hostage families. It's ridiculous."

Although she sent President Reagan a letter supporting his initiative, she spent the next year in self-imposed silence, something she now regrets.

"Our distaste for terrorists does not alter the fact that such people hold the keys to our hostages' cells," she wrote in a New York Times column in November 1987. Her conviction that she is doing the right thing by speaking out was confirmed when she visited Marcel Fontaine, a former French hostage who had lived for a year with Anderson and the last person known to have seen him alive. She asked him if Anderson knew what she was doing and what he thought of it. Fontaine told her, "He knows absolutely what you're doing and you are his hope for freedom. He knows that as long as you are out there, he is not going to be forgotten."

Despite such assurances, the job of keeping the hostages' plight in people's minds grows more difficult with every week they remain in captivity. Last year, she says, she approached writing her brother's annual birthday letter with "a terrible sense of failure."

"I keep thinking I don't have the energy to go through another year, and then we find out we can and we do. I think basically that's what's gotten us through it." She credits her husband with helping her keep on fighting. "People don't see David, and they have this picture of me as a cyclone woman that is going out and daring to argue with the government. They don't understand that it's with David's support that I can do this," she says. "If I had to come home and argue or fight about what I'm doing, I couldn't do it. He never knows when he comes in the house (but) that I might say I'm leaving for Damascus or I'm going to Florida for two or three days. I've got to know that I'm free to do that, that he's not going to give me a hard time."

Since moving to Kentucky, her husband has been able to accompany her on more of her trips. "I'm paranoid about flying anyway," she says, "and it's just been easier for me when he goes with me.

"My family, my friends, they all say that I haven't changed, yet I know in some ways that I have. I'll never look at the world in the same way again, that's for sure. There's been so many disillusionments."

She longs for the day she can resume life as she knew it before March 16, 1985. She was three weeks away from earning a social work degree at a community college in Florida when her brother was abducted. She hopes to return to that field one day, yet she knows her present work won't be over until all of the hostages are home.

"Every year you think surely this is going to be the year," she says. In the meantime, she sits at the kitchen table and asks herself, "What do I have to say to people to make them care?"●

HERBERT AND FLORENCE BROWN

● Mr. REID. Mr. President, I have a friend named Jay Brown. I have had the privilege of knowing Jay for many years and have been fortunate to have him as a friend. Once I asked him who or what shaped him into the person he is, one so devoted to his family. Jay answered simply and quickly, "my father."

Jay's father's name is Herbert Brown. He was born to Jewish Polish immigrants in 1914. With eight brothers and sisters, Herbert Brown was raised in New York City.

Young Herbert had a simple childhood. He learned reading, writing and arithmetic at the New Utrecht School. From his parents and his synagogue he learned the ethics of his religious culture—the teachings of the Torah and the wisdom of the Talmud.

The ancient words touched the young man, and he has spent his entire life as a living example of the integrity of faith.

After graduating from high school, he took a job in a New York department store. At this place of employment he met a young woman named Florence, and they were soon married.

Together they made a Kosher home and raised one son, my friend Jay. Herbert Brown left the department store and opened his own business, a dry goods store in Brooklyn.

Herbert Brown's store was open 6 days a week, 9:30 a.m. to 9 p.m., except on Wednesdays when the store closed at 6 p.m. Herbert always worked when his store was open. Jay tells me it never occurred to his father to do otherwise. Burn out, stress, even tired were just not a part of Herbert Brown's vocabulary.

Today, Herbert and Florence Brown have been married 50½ years. Always together, they endured the inevitable hardships of life and wisely relished the good times.

Mr. President, I know that even as member of this prestigious body I cannot legislate the kind of values Herbert Brown embodies. As edicts and demands, hard work, family, faith and honesty are nothing more than abstract and intangible words. Only by living example do these words gain weight and definition.

However, here, on the floor of the U.S. Senate, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues and my fellow Americans the inspiration of the life of Herbert Brown.

There is an old saying: "By the fruit of the vine, one can judge the beauty of the tree."

From my friend Jay I know and humbly respect the beauty of his father. Today as we grapple with ever increasing complexities, I am moved by the simplicity of one man's honor, living life in accordance to the will of the God of his understanding, and how freely his life provides an example of inestimable value for us all.●

THE HEALTH OBJECTIVES 2000 ACT

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague from Iowa [Mr. HARKIN] in cosponsoring the Health Objectives 2000 Act.

For years we have known the challenge is not only to cure or treat illness, but that more should be done to prevent illness in our society. It is less painful, even painless some would claim, and it is certainly less expensive. This bill would help implement the strategies developed by the U.S. Public Health Service. The 21 priorities the service has identified include: reducing tobacco use, reducing alcohol and other drug abuse, improving nutrition, increasing physical activity and fitness, detecting and controlling high blood cholesterol and high blood pressure, immunizing against infectious diseases, and others.

There is a clear need in our Nation for a comprehensive national health care policy. The legislation we are introducing today puts in place a fundamental component of such a policy. It creates and develops a partnership between Federal, State and local health agencies and other groups to develop initiatives for preventing disease and illness.

This legislation will help reduce health care costs. Expenditures for health care reached an estimated $544 billion in 1988. This amounts to $2,235 per person. Most of these funds pay for hospitalization and physician services.

We are already beginning to see support for preventive health programs in the private sector as more and more companies are incorporating preventive health services into their health benefit packages. It is time that the Federal Government encourage through the allocation of its resources a national preventive health initiative as a means of combating the escalating costs of health care and improving the quality of life for millions of Americans.●

ELMONT MEMORIAL HIGH SCHOOL MODEL UNITED NATIONS TEAM; ONLY UNITED STATES DELEGATION RECOGNIZED AT WORLD COMPETITION IN THE HAGUE

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to offer both congratulations and praise to the fine group of students from Elmont Memorial High School, in the Sewanhaka Central High School District, who this past January ranked at The Hague fourth best in worldwide Model U.N. competition. Certainly an honor of high distinction. One must also commend their adviser, Mr. Lee Marcus, and his assistant, Mrs. Elaine Murphy, for their continual dedication to the program. This is an opportunity to applaud the excellence of these teachers and to demonstrate for all the ability of our students to meet the intellectual challenge and emerge victorious in the competitive international arena. As a former Ambassador to the United Nations I take special pride in such outstanding achievement by these students from New York State.

After unprecedented sweeping victories at the Georgetown University competition and their first national title earned at the 1988 Harvard University competition, this group of talented young men and women earned an invitation to the Model U.N. world finals at The Hague. The generosity of the Elmont community allowed the students to raise the funds necessary for the long journey to The Hague. Assigned to represent the island nation of Mauritius, recognition was given to these delegates for excellence in accurate representation of the country's policies, demonstration of consensus building, negotiating and leadership skills, responsible use of rules of procedure, knowledge of the issues, and effectiveness in speechmaking. It is no wonder that this team of future diplomats emerged with honorable mention, earning the title of fourth in the world in this most spirited competition.

NISSAN'S "DREAM" AD

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I was extremely distressed to learn that, during television coverage of the Super Bowl a couple of Sundays ago, Nissan premiered an advertisement that seems to promote irresponsible driving.

The Nissan 300ZX is first shown fleeing at high speed from a motorcycle. Gaining velocity, the Nissan eludes the bike whereupon a race car picks up the chase. The 300ZX continues to accelerate, hurtling ever faster and faster, until it once again outguns its challenger. Pursuit is engaged a final time—this time by a jet. Still, the Nissan revs higher and higher, until it pulls away from the plane. Based on the number of revolutions per minute displayed on the tachometer, it is estimated the 300ZX reaches a speed in excess of 150 miles per hour in the last seconds of the advertisement.

Nissan claims the commercial is merely a fantasy. Try telling that to the families of the two Virginia men who went out of control at high speed in a 1990 ZX and collided with an oncoming truck.

One can certainly appreciate the need for creative license by advertisers whose goal is to sell products. A problem arises, however, when television is used to promote not only a product, but, unintentionally, a mode of behavior that can result in tragedy. High speed automobile crashes are a major cause of death and injury on our highways.

The message conveyed by Nissan's advertisement is unmistakable: Driving at high speeds is an enjoyable experience, which can be achieved in this car. As a strong supporter of legislation to require greater automobile passenger safety, I firmly believe that the message of this commercial is one that manufacturers ought not be sending to consumers.

The costs of reckless driving in lives and human suffering are tremendous. Furthermore, the skyrocketing costs of the medical care necessitated by high speed accidents are increasingly being paid for by the taxpayer. This fact disturbs me greatly. To address this situation, I am sponsoring the National Highway Fatality and Injury Reduction Act, S. 1007, legislation to encourage States to approve laws requiring the use of seat belts and motorcycle helmets.

But Government alone can not solve this problem. We must encourage a safety ethic among our citizens. Advertisements like Nissan's only frustrate our efforts here in Congress to focus greater attention on this issue.

Networks sell commercial air time during the Super Bowl at an enormous premium. I am sure Nissan invested great amounts of money, time, and effort into effectively bringing its car to the attention of a vast audience, but I would urge the company to find some other way to promote its product.

Today I have written to the chairman of Nissan Motors Ltd. to express my dismay over this matter. The Insurance Institute for Highway Safety has done much to bring this matter to the public's attention, and along with several other groups, is also urging Nissan to withdraw the ad. I ask that material provided to me by the Institute appear in the RECORD at this point.

The material follows:

"BUILT FOR THE HUMAN RACE"—BUT NOT FOR HIGH-SPEED CRASHES; NISSAN COMMERCIAL TOUTS SPEED—DISREGARDS HEALTH AND SAFETY

ARLINGTON, VA, January 22, 1990.—A Nissan commercial scheduled to air during the Super Bowl on Sunday "irresponsibly promotes excessive speed and exhibits a blatant disregard for public safety," says Insurance Institute for Highway Safety President Brian O'Neill. The Institute is joined by 18 medical, insurance, and law enforcement groups (see attached list) in asking Nissan to withdraw the ad.

O'Neill says he and others in the public health and safety community question whether Nissan's advertising tagline, Built for the Human Race, is true "or whether Nissan's 300ZX Turbo model in particular is built simply to race, without regard for human safety at all." The Institute is asking Nissan "to live up to the company tagline and build cars for the human race" by equipping all of its vehicles with state-of-the-art safety technology such as air bags.

The commercial scheduled to air during the Super Bowl shows the Nissan 300ZX Turbo fleeing from a motorcycle, then from a race car, and finally from an airplane. The commercial's chase scene involves the ZX going faster and faster until it reaches an estimated 150 mph in the final seconds of the 60-second spot, O'Neill says "the only message in the commercial is, look how fast this car can go." And, he adds "this is a very irresponsible message."

"Nissan has been totally insensitive to the laws, goals, and hopes we have to improve the quality of life and safety on the road," adds General Robert McDermott, Chairman of USAA in San Antonio, Texas.

The 300ZX Turbo has excessive speed capability built into it, but it doesn't have adequate safety technology. "In particular it doesn't have air bags," O'Neill points out. "Virtually every other car in its class does, but the 300ZX Turbo doesn't." Only about five percent of all 1990 Nissans will be equipped with air bags, compared with 100 percent of all Audis, BMWs, Mercedes, Porsches, Saabs, and Volvos. Among domestic automakers, Ford will put air bags in almost half of its 1990 models, and Chrysler will have this state-of-the-art technology in 90 percent of its models. Meanwhile, ZXs have automatic belt systems that are shown disconnected in sales brochures, even though there's a federal requirement that such belts be connected when they're displayed.

Nissan says the commercial is a fantasy having no "connection with real-world driving situations." O'Neill counters that "what isn't a fantasy at all—what's all too real—is that people are dying in high-speed crashes involving Nissan ZXs." Research shows 1985-87 ZXs with the fifth highest death rate among the 103 most popular cars on the road during 1986-88.

Excessive speed is a serious safety problem on U.S. highways. Travel speeds and motor vehicle deaths have increased dramatically on rural interstates since speed limits were raised from 55 mph to 65 mph. "Excessive speed is a growing problem," O'Neill explains, "which is why Nissan's commercial promoting speed is so irresponsible. It's a much worse problem even than a single objectional ad. Nissan is running a print ad for the 300ZX Turbo that it cannot claim is a fantasy—it unabashedly touts high speed as the car's main attraction."

STATEMENT OF BRIAN O'NEILL, PRESIDENT, JAN. 22, 1990

When we at the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety hold a press conference—and we don't hold many—we hope to do it in order to hail a breakthrough in safety on the highway. But this isn't the case today. This is a press conference we'd rather not have to hold at all because it's about hitting a new low in car advertising. It's about a company that makes and markets cars by touting excessive speed, which we know contributes to highway deaths and injuries.

Nissan plans to air during the Super Bowl this Sunday a new commercial for the 300ZX Turbo model that's the worst example of an out-and-out speed ad we've ever seen. The tagline on Nissan advertising says this company's cars are built for the human race. But we in the public health and safety community question whether this is true or whether Nissan's 300ZX Turbo model in particular is built and promoted simply to race without regard of human safety at all. The ZX advertisement has only one message—look how fast this car can go.

Promoting excessive and unsafe speed is irresponsible, and we have called this press conference to publicly ask Nissan to withdraw the ad. The time is overdue for Nissan to focus on safety—for Nissan to put air bags into the 300ZX Turbo, as has been done for competing models, and for Nissan to begin promoting safety instead of speed in its advertising.

Nissan excuses the new ZX ad by saying it's a fantasy. The company says it sees no "connection with real-world driving situations." Let's look at the commercial now and see . . .

. . . Nissan claims this ad is a fantasy. But what isn't a fantasy at all—what's all too real is that people are drying in high-speed crashes involving this car. Just a short while ago, for example, two Virginia men were riding in a 1990 ZX when it went out of control at high speed and slammed into an oncoming truck. The result is what you see in this photo—both men were killed. Even more recently, an earlier model ZX was being chased by a police car on a Virginia highway, hit a bump, went out of control, and sailed through the air—sort of like in Nissan's commercial—but, unlike the commercial, the real ZX then crashed into a fire truck. The car looked like this after the crash. And, unlike the driver in the commercial, the young man in this car didn't escape from danger by going fast—he died.

These are just a couple of examples of the reality of high-speed crashes involving Nissan ZXs. And to give you other perspectives on why we're asking Nissan to withdraw this ad, I'd like to introduce . . .

. . . Some of you here today may wonder whether we're simply bringing more attention and publicity to this Nisssan ad, whether we're making the ad itself a media event as Nissan wanted to do. Well, maybe so. But I don't think so, because the issue here involves more than just one irresponsible commercial. It involves Nissan's approach to safety in general as well as one car in particular. Nissan's 1990 ZX is unlike virtually all of its direct competitors in that it doesn't have state-of-the-art occupant crash protection like air bags, which are a must, especially in high-performance cars. Instead, Nissan equips ZXs with vastly inferior detachable automatic belt systems. And then Nissan deliberately disconnects these belts for the company's fancy sales brochures, even though the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration requires the belts to be connected when they're displayed.

Where is Nissan's commitment to safety? We estimate that only about five percent of all new Nissans sold this year will have air bags. In contrast, 100 percent of all Audis, BMWs, Mercedes, Porsches, Saabs, and Volvos will have air bags. On the domestic front, Ford will have air bags in almost half of its 1990 model cars. Chrysler will put this state-of-the-art safety technolgy into more than 90 percent of the cars it sells this year. And, in contrast to Nissan, responsible automakers are promoting safety in commercials like this one . . .

. . . Where are Nissan's safety ads? We cannot find any—none at all. Is it because, as the Chrysler ad suggests, Nissan has nothing good to say about the safety features of its cars? We challenge Nissan to start engineering air bags into all of its cars and begin promoting safety instead of speed. And we ask the company to take the first step toward this today by withdrawing the Super Bowl commercial as well as all other speed-promoting ads. In short, we're asking Nissan to live up to the comany's tagline and build cars for the human race.

The following organizations have joined the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety in calling on Nissan and/or CBS to withdraw Nissan's commercial promoting excessive speed:

Advocates for Highway and Auto Safety, Aetna, Alliance of American Insurers, American Academy of Pediatrics, American Trauma Society, Center for Auto Safety, Consumer Federation of America, Epilepsy Foundation of America, and GEICO. Also, International Association of Chiefs of Police, Kemper National Insurance Companies, National Association of Governors' Highway Safety Representatives, National Association of Independent Insurers, Nationwide Insurance Companies, National Head Injury Foundation, Professional Insurance Agents, Public Citizen, and USAA Group.

SPEED FACTS

High speed was a factor in many of the 47,093 motor vehicle deaths that occurred in 1988 (25,700 occupant deaths in passenger cars). Speed increases not only the likelihood of crashes but also crash severity.

Laws of physics dictate that, at high speeds, more destructive energy is involved in crashes so they are more severe. Crash forces increase with the square of the impact speed so that a crash occurring at 60 mph is four times as severe as one occurring at half the speed, or 30 mph.

The number of people injured per 100 crash involvements increases from 40 when the estimated travel speed prior to the crash is 50 mph to more than 140 when the travel speed prior to the crash is 80 mph, based on a widely cited 1964 study of rural highway crashes.

Increases in speed limits from 55 mph to 65 mph on most rural interstate highways have led to higher travel speeds, including especially more drivers going 70+ mph. Higher speed limits have also caused a 20 to 30 pecent increase in crash deaths on rural interstates where speed limits have been raised.

Among all citations issued for traffic violations in California, speeding convictions are the strongest predictors of future crash likelihood.

The five 1985-87 model cars with the highest death rates among the 103 most popular cars on the road in 1986-88 were the Chevrolet Corvette, Chevrolet Camaro, Dodge Charger/Shelby, Ford Mustang, and Nissan 300ZX.

INSURANCE INSTITUTE FOR HIGHWAY SAFETY,
Arlington, VA, November 20, 1989.

TAKASHI ISHIHARA,
Chairman, Nissan Motor Company, Ltd., 17-1 Ginza 6-Chome Chuo-ku, Tokyo 104 Japan.

DEAR MR. ISHIHARA: According to the Wall Street Journal, Nissan Motors is "back to basics: sex, speed" in car advertising. And it's disturbing. One ad in particular that your company is reportedly planning to debut during the Super Bowl in January shows a Nissan sports car speeding away from a motorcyclist, a racing car and, finally, a fighter jet.

Glamorizing high speed is a wholly irresponsible approach to advertising. Higher travel speeds are already causing a substantial increase in deaths on U.S. highways. Now car companies like Nissan are making matters worse by using their ads to promote the view that high-speed travel is fun. In reality, high-speed travel adds to the problem of highway deaths and injuries.

What's even more alarming is that the very car Nissan is touting in its new ad is the ZX Turbo. According to new Insurance Institute for Highway Safety research, the 300ZX has the fifth highest death rate among 103 popular cars (see attached report). The ZX is thus in a league with Corvettes and Camaros when it comes to occupant deaths. It's one of the very worst.

Yet you're planning to sell this car on national television by emphasizing performance and speed. This is an irresponsible ad that shouldn't even be seen. We ask you stop promoting excessive speed and performance that cause death and injury. We ask you to drop all plans to air this Turbo ad and similar ones.

Sincerely,

BRIAN O'NEILL,
President.

NISSAN MOTOR CORP. IN U.S.A.,
January 5, 1990.

Mr. BRIAN O'NEILL,
President, Insurance Institute For Highway Safety, Arlington, VA.

DEAR MR. O'NEILL: Your letter to Nissan Motor Company, Ltd. has been forwarded to my attention.

We have reviewed the issues that you expressed in your letter. Nissan and the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety share the belief that advertising communications should not encourage irresponsible or unsafe driving practices. Certainly, as a major marketer in the United States, Nissan's interests are best served by presenting our products in a positive manner.

Our 300ZX Turbo commercial is one of a series of TV commercials in our new "Fantasy" advertising campaign which depicts the dreams of drivers. We do not believe that the Turbo Z commercial, or any of our fantasy commercials, encourage irresponsible driving practices. The futuristic Turbo Z commercial is so fanciful and farfetched that we see no confusion or connection with real-world driving situations.

The wonderful thing about advertising is that everyone has an opinion, including the Wall Street Journal writer whose articles was the basis of your letter to Nissan. However, we are confident that when you get a chance to actually see the imaginative Turbo Z commercial during the Superbowl on January 28th your feelings will be tempered from those formed by a newspaper description.

The American public respects and enjoys advertising that is intelligent and presents a message in an entertaining manner. They understand that good advertising can be an art form with its own poetry and sense of reality. This recognition of the good judgement and common sense of the American public is a point of view that you and your organization hopefully share with Nissan.

Sincerely,

R.R. HANNUM,
Director, Marketing.

INSURANCE INSTITUTE FOR HIGHWAY SAFETY,
Arlington VA, January 12, 1990.

Takashi Ishihara,
Chairman, Nissan Motor Company, Ltd., 17-1 Ginza 6-Chome Chuo-ku, Tokyo 104 Japan.

DEAR MR. ISHIHARA: This is a followup to my previous letter (November 20, 1989) as well as a response to the insulting reply to that letter received today from R.R. Hannum, Nissan USA's Director of Marketing (enclosed).

I have already expressed the Institute's serious concern about the Nissan commercial planned for debut during the Super Bowl. The basis of our concern is the fact that high speed travel on U.S. highways is a serious public health and safety problem, and advertising that glorifies speed can only add to this carnage.

Since writing the first letter, I have seen the commercial in question as well as a print ad for the 300 ZX Turbo that has no purpose at all other than to glorify speed. We find both the print ad and the television commercial to be irresponsible and offensive. In fact, the commercial scheduled for the Super Bowl and the print ad (enclosed) are the worst examples of excessive speed promotion we at the Institute have ever seen.

Nissan's commercial portrays speed as a fantasy, but the reality is that the 1985-87 models of the 300 ZX had the fifth highest death rate among more than 100 cars in the United States during 1986-88. The "chase scene" in Nissan's commercial is depicted as a dream, but the results of head and spinal cord injuries from high-speed crashes are a very real nightmare.

At a time when American concern about highway safety is growing, Nissan's advertising is totally inappropriate. It's especially inappropriate because, unlike virtually all competing models, the 300 ZX Turbo doesn't have state-of-the-art occupant crash protection technology such as air bags, a feature the U.S. safety community and most automakers consider a necessity in high-performance cars—cars like the Turbo ZX that will be driven at high speeds by motorists trying to live the fantasy portrayed in Nissan's commercial. Unfortunately, far too many of these motorists trying to live the fantasy will end up, in reality, dead in a crash.

We understand that a number of other organizations interested in reducing highway deaths and injuries have contacted you about this matter. Further, we have contacted appropriate Standards and Practices officials at CBS to communicate our views.

We urge you, once again and in the strongest possible terms, to withdraw both the print and television advertising. We further urge you to demonstrate safety leadership by building and promoting cars with state-of-the-art safety technology, instead of encouraging motorists to indulge in dangerous speed fantasies.

Sincerely,

BRIAN O'NEILL,
President.●

JOHN HVASTA FINDS FREEDOM

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, 41 years ago John Hvasta was arrested and imprisoned in Czechoslovakia. He was accused of espionage in behalf of the American Consulate General which I had established. Not only was he arrested, but brutally treated.

He escaped from Leopoldov prison, spent 2 years hiding in the countryside and eventually made his way to freedom via the American Embassy.

Having been through this ordeal of fire and misery, he emerged a very fine, idealistic and decent human being. In this regard, I ask that an article that appeared in the Washington Post on Saturday, February 3, 1990, concerning my old friend John Hvasta, be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 3, 1990]

SLOVAK NATIVE COMES FULL CIRCLE ON VISIT HOME

(By Yasmine Bahrani)

Forty-one years ago, John Hvasta, a Slovak native and naturalized American citizen, was arrested and imprisoned in Czechoslovakia by the hard-line Communist government, which had just seized power. After escaping from prison 3½ years later and hiding in haystacks and caves for two years more, he made his way back to the United States in 1954.

Last month, buoyed by the changes sweeping through his native land and much of Eastern Europe, Hvasta, now 62 and an Oakton, Md., businessman, fulfilled a four-decade-old dream and returned to Czechoslovakia just as Communist rule was ending there.

Because his arrest and subsequent escape were later publicized in Czechoslovakia, and because his success as president of the public relations firm American Public Research Council, Hvasta became known to Czechoslovaks through interviews on Voice of America and Radio Free Europe.

"It's ironic. He was there at the inception of communism and I suppose he had to be there at the finish of Communist rule," said his wife, Helen.

Hvasta was born in Miglesov in eastern Czechoslovakia and left for the first time a week after Adolf Hitler marched into Prague. Hvasta was 10 years old when his mother took him and his brother to New Jersey, where their father already had a job working for the Ballantine brewery.

Hvasta is a tall, heavy-set, conservatively dressed man with bright eyes, glasses and evidence of a New Jersey accent.

When he was 20 and an American citizen, Hvasta returned to Czechoslovakia as a student and was hired in Bratislava part-time by then U.S. Vice Consul Clairborne Pell, now a U.S. Senator from Rhode Island and chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Eight months later, Hvasta was arrested by the secret police and accused of being a U.S. agent and of photographing underground munitions factories. Hvasta denied the charges and continues to deny them today. After a secret trial, the government sentenced him on June 1, 1949, to 10 years, but he escaped after serving 3½ years at Leopoldv prison.

During this time Pell said he did what he could to gain the release of Hvasta. Pell said Hvasta "showed great bravery, he went through a crucible of fire."

He and four other men fled Leopoldov after they were sent to mend holes in the wall surrounding their prison. On Jan. 2, 1952, when the whistle signaled time to go inside, they stayed behind. They had no trouble pulling the new bricks from the wall they had just mended and wiggling through. They ran to a railroad embankment 250 yards away where they hid until dark, then separated.

Afterward, Hvasta made his way to a farmhouse and begged for help. The family hid him in a haystack and later in a cave that Hvasta described as "a grave." Each night, the farmer's wife or daughter would sing, and if she included a specific song, Hvasta knew it was safe to come out for food and exercise.

After 21 months of hiding there, he made his way to the U.S. Embassy in Prague, where he hid for four months until he was officially expelled by the Czechoslovak government in February 1954.

When he arrived in time for a demonstration last month in Bratislava, Hvasta was ushered to the podium. "It was a sight to see. A crowd of about 5,000 were gathered at the square, rejoicing each time a new concession was made by the Communists. This was a real revolution going on, it was exciting!" he said.

Hvasta quickly notices how much things had changed at home when he was caught speeding toward Bratislava last month. He showed the Czechoslovak policeman his U.S. passport and explained that he was rushing to speak at an anti-government demonstration. The policeman gave back the passport, saluted and said, 'Just watch for potholes. Give them hell.' "

However, the home of dissident Lubomir Feldek, where Hvasta stayed, was watched by the secret police during most of his stay in Czechoslovakia. "We were meeting in the dugouts in the hallways. The secret police was still eavesdropping," said Hvasta, squeezing his brow into deep furrows.

Hvasta told the story of how he and the family noticed a man shivering in the driver's seat of a car with the motor switched off. Olga Feldek, like her dissident writer husband Lubomir, knew that the man was watching their home. She went outside and approached the man and said, " 'If you are watching that nothing happens to us, we are very grateful but I'm afraid you will freeze to death.' Then she offered him coffee or tea. Finally he looked up and said, 'Some tea, please?' " He was there for several more days.

Hvasta said the struggle is not yet over for the Czechoslovak resistance movements of Civic Forum and Public Against Violence, even though after 40 years of hard-line rule, the Communist leadership relinquished power when Party Leader Milos Jakes resigned Nov. 28.

Hvasta said the coming spring elections are crucial. "If the Communists get 51 percent of the vote all will be lost!"

Hvasta is planning a letter-writing campaign. He will ask Czechoslovak Americans to write to their relatives in Czechoslovakia and ask them not to vote Communist.

Though Alexander Dubcek, then first secretary of the Communist Party, exonerated him in 1969, the Czechoslovak government would not allow Hvasta to enter Czechoslovakia until 1986.

Hvasta discovered that the resistance, far from being professional politicians, were primarily philosophers, environmentalists and literary critics who asked him basic questions about U.S. politics and government. One request from members of Public Against Violence was for copies of the U.S. Constitution—preferably in Slovak.

Hvasta and his wife, who is of Hungarian and Ukrainian descent, are active in the D.C. area Slavic community. But Helen Hvasta was concerned for her husband's safety on his trip.

"I told him if he did go, he could stay there. That's how strongly I felt about it," she said. He delayed his trip for several more days. "But his emotions won out. I suppose that was something he had to do," Helen Hvasta said.

Last month, Hvasta was at Wenceslas Square in Prague, and messages of solidarity were read to the crowd from around the world. "So I wrote a message on back of my calling card telling the people that they had the support of 6 million Czechoslovak Americans, and then the man reading the messages said, 'Come up, come up!' "

Hvasta climbed up to the podium and spoke to the crowd. That was when he heard that the Communist government had relinquished its power. He was "elated because that was the beginning of the steps, one after the other, which the Communist Party relinquished power," he said.

While Hvasta believes communism crippled the country in the last 41 years, he still has faith in Czechoslovakia's potential. "Now, just as one whose leg was broken and needs to stand and walk on his own, all of the inhabitants under communism will have to walk on their own, without the crutches," he said.●

PROTECTING PANAMA'S TROPICAL FORESTS

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, when I was in Panama last week I saw how desperately that country needs our help to get back on its feet after the devastating corruption and mismanagement of General Noriega. One statistic that says more than perhaps any other is that over 30 percent of the labor force is unemployed. Without this aid to "jump-start" the Panamanian economy, the economic and political instability that exists there will only get worse.

One of the obvious consequences of that number of jobless people is that they are looking for any source of income anywhere they can find it, and one of the first casualties is the natural environment. The scarcity of jobs and services has unleashed a flood of emigration of peasants toward the country's tropical forests, including three critical areas which are in imminent danger. They are the Amistad International Park which protects fragile watersheds which have the capacity to generate 90 percent of Panama's future energy needs, the "Darien Biosphere Reserve," and the watersheds that directly feed the canal. Although these areas are theoretically under the protection of Panama's Institute of Natural Renewable Resources [INRENARE], that agency is totally bankrupt and unable to provide even the most basic protection. General Noriega confiscated its equipment and incorporated many of its staff into the Panamanian Defense Forces.

These areas are being taken over by swarms of poachers, loggers, squatters, miners and looters. INRENARE estimates that 90 percent of the 70,000 hectares of tropical forest that will be burned this year in Panama will be destroyed during the next 3 months of the dry season.

Mr. President, this emergency aid package we are approving today will be used primarily for housing for displaced families, to spur investment and create jobs, and to train and equip civilian law enforcement personnel. I support that. But just as important is the immediate threat to these natural areas. For a few hundred thousand dollars we can give INRENARE the support it needs—equipment for forest rangers, trucks, canoes, fuel and radios—to protect the integrity of these areas during the next crucial 3 months. I strongly urge the Agency for International Development that will be administering these funds to designate up to $500,000 for these urgent needs.●

POSITIVE MOVEMENT IN SOUTH AFRICA

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, South African President F.W. de Klerk has announced that his government would release imprisoned African National Congress [ANC] leader Nelson Mandela and other political prisoners and detainees, lift the bans and/or restrictions on the ANC, the United Democratic Front [UDF] and other antiapartheid organizations, and remove certain regulations imposed under the nationwide state of emergency which has been in place since June 1986. I welcome President de Klerk's announcement.

The steps that his government is proposing are a necessary prelude to the opening of negotiations for a peaceful end to apartheid. The South African Government must now move quickly to turn these proposals into reality, particularly the release of Nelson Mandela, to demonstrate without question that it is serious about achieving a democratic, united, and nonracial South Africa.

For many months, the ANC, the UDF, and other antiapartheid organizations have been calling upon the South African Government to create the climate for negotiations. The step de Klerk outlined today will help to do this. However, they need to be complemented quickly by the termination of the state of emergency, the release of all political prisoners, and the repeal of all emergency regulations so that all South Africans, regardless of color or political persuasion, can have complete freedom of expression and association. Then the stage will be set for negotiations to begin.

This is a time of rising expectations in South Africa. Under de Klerk's leadership, the South African Government has offered millions of black South Africans the prospect of an imminent end to apartheid. The Government must now deliver. It must move quickly to open negotiations. It must be prepared to sit down at the bargaining table with genuine leaders of the black community in South Africa, not simply with those of its own choosing. And it must recognize that any viable solution to South Africa's problem must fulfill the aspirations of black South Africans for full political rights and democratic freedoms and be based on individual, not group, rights.

No doubt many factors have led the South African Government to move toward an end to apartheid. Surely one of these is pressure, both internal and external. Now is not the time to release that pressure. We must wait and see whether the South African Government will deliver. We must be sure that the course President de Klerk has charted is irreversible and that the "new South Africa" that he calls for will be created by and for all South Africans.●

UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, after more than four decades of suppression, the ban on the Ukrainian Catholic Church, at long last, has been partially lifted. On December 1 of last year, officials in the Ukrainian SSR announced that Ukrainian Catholics will be allowed to register their congregations. Since then, over 700 congregations already have applied for registration. In the months leading up to this decision, over half of the Senate wrote individual letters to President Gorbachev calling for recognition of the Ukrainian Catholic Church. I would like to take this opportunity to commend my colleagues for their efforts on behalf of Ukrainian Catholic believers.

While permitting registration is an important step in the right direction, the Ukrainian Catholic Church still faces a struggle to achieve status as a full legal entity, particularly regarding the question of return of confiscated Church property.

Mr. President, I ask that the full text of a February 1, 1990, Wall Street Journal article by Edward McFadden appear at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This article aptly and accurately describes the current status of the Ukrainian Catholic Church.

The article follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Feb. 1, 1990]

IN UKRAINE, FAITH IN GOD—NOT IN GORBACHEV

(By Edward McFadden)

When the Soviet Council for Religious Affairs announced on Dec. 1 that Ukrainian Catholics would be allowed to register and "enjoy all the rights established by law for religious communities in the Ukrainian SSR," members of the long-banned church were justifiably unenthusiastic. Last week leaders of the Ukrainian Catholic Church gathered in the Church of the Transfiguration in Lvov, declared the church's dissolution in 1946 null and void, and announced that the church would from that moment on function as a fully legal entity within the Soviet Union.

The Ukrainian Catholics' faith in God and lack of same in the Soviet system has led to a quiet revolution.

The Ukrainian Catholic Church's history began in 1596 through an agreement between the Ukrainian Church of the Byzantine Rite and the Church of Rome in which the Ukrainian Catholics, also known as Uniates, pledged allegiance to the papacy but kept their Byzantine liturgy, language and church hierarchy. Josef Stalin banned the church in 1946 through the socalled Synod of Lvov, which forcibly "self-dissolved" the church and merged it with the Communist-backed Russian Orthodox Church. Uniate clergy who refused to surrender their allegiance to Rome and become Russian Orthodox priests were sent to Siberia. All Uniate property was confiscated, most of it going to the Orthodox Church.

Since then, many Ukrainian Catholics have practiced their faith in fields, forests or late in the evening in private homes. Today there are an estimated 3.5 million practicing Ukrainian Catholics in the Soviet Union, the majority of whom reside in Western Ukraine and are counted in official Soviet documents as Russian Orthodox. The Ukrainian Church is overseen by Cardinal Myroslav Lubachivsky from Rome along with 10 bishops in Ukraine, seven of whom only recently came out of hiding (where the other three remain).

Because the Uniates make up the largest Catholic group in the Soviet Union, Pope John Paul II has long placed the relegalization of the Ukrainian Church high on his list of concerns in his limited dealings with the Soviet Union. During the historic two-day meeting between Mikhail Gorbachev and the pontiff in Rome in late November, the Ukrainian Church was discussed often.

Vatican officials, whose policy it is to comment only under the condition of anonymity, say that the pope was willing to make a major concession, promising that should Mr. Gorbachev allow the full legalization of the Uniate Church the pontiff would not press for the return of all church property, the major stumbling block to the Russian Orthodox Church supporting legalization of the Ukrainian Catholic Church.

Despite the talks, however, the Ukrainian Church gained little from the Soviets that it already didn't have. Ivan Hel, head of the Lvov-based Committee for the Defense of the Ukrainian Catholic Church, told reporters that the new policy giving Ukrainian Catholics the right to register as Uniates "does not provide a real legal basis for the church. It does not recognize the 1946 [self-dissolution of the Church] as illegal and does not guarantee the return of property." In fact, there is no guarantee that congregations that apply for registration will even be accepted by the government.

According to officials of the Ukrainian Church in Rome, more than 700 congregations have applied for registration with Soviet officials but only 20 have been approved. More important, the church still does not have legal standing.

Over the past two years, Mr. Gorbachev has used his still-unenacted "Freedom of Conscience" bill, which purportedly would give all religions the same legal standing and property privileges as the official Russian Orthodox Church, to placate religious groups and their leaders—first with Lithuanian Catholics in mid-1988, and then in early 1989 when unrest among Moslems began to grow. When the pope pressed for Ukrainian Church legalization, Mr. Gorbachev once again promised a law early in 1990.

Vatican officials say they have not been consulted by Soviet officials about the law, and Ukrainian Church officials have not seen any of the three draft versions that are said to exist. The issue of church ownership of property might not even be considered in the law, since a Vatican source familiar with the continuing negotiations between Rome and Moscow says that Mr. Gorbachev feels that return of Ukrainian Church property is an issue to be resolved between the Russian Orthodox Church and Ukrainian Catholics.

Such inter-church negotiations began two weeks ago in Moscow, but the Russian Orthodox Church is hesitant to surrender any of the property it holds in Ukraine and the numbers bear out why: The Orthodox Church claims to have more than 10,000 parishes in the Soviet Union. More than 5,700 of the total are in Ukraine—3,000 of these in Western Ukraine. All told, about 60% of the Orthodox Church's holdings are in the republic. A mass re-conversion of members and property to the Ukrainian Catholic Church could be crippling to the Russian Orthodox Church.

In October, before the registration rule was enacted, Ukrainian Catholics were already growing weary of the lip service from Mr. Gorbachev and the Russian Orthodox hierarchy. Beginning with the annexation of Lvov's Church of the Transfiguration, believers have peaceably seized more than 600 churches formerly held by the Russian Orthodox Church. More than 350 Russian Orthodox priests have asked to be accepted as priests for the Ukrainian Church—all have been accepted. While the buildings technically belong to the Russian Orthodox Church, there is little the Orthodox Church can do when an entire parish—led by the parish clergy—returns to the fold of the Ukrainian Church.

In some areas of Western Ukraine, such as the town of Ivano-Frankivsk, where 100,000 of the 250,000 residents have been known to hold Sunday prayer services in the town square, there are no longer any functioning Russian Orthodox churches. Reports from Ukraine confirm that the taking of these churches has been peaceful, yet the Russian Orthodox Church has attempted to distort the story.

In a confidential cable sent Dec. 23 to Russian Orthodox Church leaders outside the Soviet Union, Archbishop Kirill, chairman of external church relations of the Moscow Patriarchate, reported that the Resurrection Cathedral in Ivano-Frankivsk had been taken "by force. . . . [And] many Orthodox churches in Lvov, Ternopol and other cities and villages have been seized. . . . I ask you to exert influence on the Christian and social circles of the country in which you are residing in favor of a most swift and peaceful resolution of the problem." This is the same man who has called publicly for brotherly negotiations between the two churches.

The Russian Orthodox Church, in the hope of coming away with something for its 44-year domination of the region's religious life, is requesting inter-church dialogue based on Christian love and understanding to resolve the current impasse without the aid of the Soviet government. But the Uniates note that only the state can give back what the state has taken away: the rights of religious freedom and the ownership of property.●

PRESIDENT GORBACHEV'S FUTURE—AND OURS

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, perhaps the most fundamental question facing American foreign policy today is that of whether and how the United States can act to further an evolution in the Soviet Union toward political freedom and a market-based economy.

To the debate over this question, Arthur Macy Cox, a member of the American Committee on United States-Soviet Relations, has made a useful contribution in a recent issue of the Los Angeles Times. A former CIA official who was involved in creating and implementing the multilateral restrictions on the export of sensitive technology to the Soviet Union, Mr. Cox speaks with a voice of long experience. His concern is that, even in the face of revolutionary developments triggered by President Gorbachev, American policy today continues to be constrained by "old thinking." Mr. Cox himself is not, and I ask unanimous consent that his wise words be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Jan. 28, 1990]

GORBACHEV WON'T MAKE IT WITHOUT MORE OF OUR HELP

(By Arthur Macy Cox)

WASHINGTON.—The Baltic states demand independence, the Red Army tries to prevent Azerbaijanis and Armenians from killing each other, Eastern Europe goes its separate way, the Soviet economy is in shambles—will Mikhail S. Gorbachev survive?

These are serious problems, but none is insurmountable for the man who has emerged as the world's most resourceful politician-statesman. Yet Gorbachev will probably fall if he loses the majority support of the Communist Party in his drive toward democracy. To succeed, he needs to show progress in the economy. To do that, the Soviet president needs the urgent assistance of the United States and its European partners in the form of mutually beneficial disarmament agreements.

It's almost miraculous that Gorbachev has been able to take perestroika and democratization as far as he has. This could not have happened without the support of the KGB. Western intelligence has thus failed to give sufficient attention to the role of Yuri V. Andropov.

According to Fedor Burlatsky, a former speech writer for Nikita S. Khrushchev and now a commentator, the idea of perestroika was first presented by Andropov in December, 1964, two months after Khrushchev was forced into retirement. Andropov, who was then a secretary in the Central Committee, recommended to First Secretary Leonid I. Brezhnev and Premier Aleksei N. Kosygin that Stalinism's totalitarian structure be replaced. He was rebuffed.

He did not give up. Although a dedicated communist, Andropov was convinced that the Stalinist system was slowly destroying the foundation of the Soviet Union. He helped younger men and women who shared his views advance their careers. When Andropov became head of the KGB, he was better able to encourage reforms both within the Communist Party and the KGB leadership. When Brezhnev died in 1982 and Andropov was named general secretary, there was jubilation among reformers in the party, the KGB and the military.

The star in the young crowd around Andropov was Gorbachev. Many key men and women who have emerged as leaders of Gorbachev's programs were protégés of Andropov as well. The current KGB chairman, Vladimir A. Kryuchkov, first served the future president when Andropov was Soviet ambassador to Hungary before and after the 1956 revolution. The Andropov factor, then, helps explain why Gorbachev has moved so far, so fast in destroying much of the machinery of the Stalinist police state.

But the resulting battle within the system is intense. The demand for political pluralism rises throughout the Soviet Union. Milovan Djilas, former Yugoslav deputy to Marshall Tito and the author of "The New Class," has discussed Gorbachev's dilemma: "While [apparatchiks] may well be forced, lured or cajoled into supporting reforms for a more productive economy," said Djilas, "they cannot be lured or cajoled into underwriting the dissolution of the party and the destruction of their own jobs and security."

Gorbachev and his advisers know this is correct. He knows as well that the Communist Party is the sole source of power in the Soviet Union and, as such, must bless the country's transition to democracy. Perestroika involves large ideas but it is not a fixed plan. Gorbachev is too much the improviser for that. His critics on the left chastise him for moving too slowly, but Gorbachev remains in power because he keeps his eye on the reality of the Communist Party. Like all superior politicians, he always strives for balance, but within the framework of his considerable moral integrity and courage.

Gorbachev has already moved a surprising distance toward democracy. The formation of the Congress of People's Deputies and its operating arm, the Supreme Soviet, have started in motion the insitution of parliamentary democracy. Its rules still give the party a dominant position, but most of the deputies were elected by secret ballot.

The upcoming elections for the local soviets will take democracy to the grass roots. Glasnost has permitted the revolution of communications technology to spread throughout Soviet society. Popular activism is rampant. Perhaps Gorbachev can avoid the looming hemorrhage of chaos, anarchy and civil war by forming a confederation of autonomous nations with a common econmic market.

Fortunately, President Bush has concluded that Gorbachev's survial is demonstrably in the national-security interests of the United States. The President realizes that it is important to consolidate the foreign-policy gains made during Gorbachev's five years in power—a conservative successor might reverse many of the advances. But the Bush Administration is moving at an almost unbelievably slow pace, with little sense of leadership.

The President wants perestroika to succeed but claims there is not much he can do about it. Bush is a victim of "old thinkers" who still dominate the White House staff, the Pentagon, the conservative think tanks, the military academies and many universities. These Sovietologists have been wrong almost every step of the way since Gorbachev came to power because they couldn't believe—or didn't comprehend—the dynamics of Soviet "new thinking." They were certain that a Soviet communist leader could not advocate policies that should be supported by the United States. They consider Gorbachev and his reforms a temporary aberration.

George F. Kennan, the dean of American Sovietologists and one of the few "new thinkers," and "it is doubtful that Gorbachev could have remained in office as long as he has were it not for his high international prestige." The Administration should take Kennan's cue.

U.S. actions can further strengthen Gorbachev's prestige. For example, the Soviet president needs secure American agreement for rapid disarmament. Proposed Pentagon spending for the next five years would cut military spending by only 2% and essentially continue President Ronald Reagan's buildup of new strategic and conventional weapons. Although North Atlantic Treaty Organization proposals for conventional-arms reductions have already been overtaken by events in Eastern Europe, there is no sense of urgency in the Administration to correct them.

In other areas as well, American actions reflect "old thinking" inconsistent with the Administration's professed desire to see perestroika succeed. The United States grants most-favored-nation tariff status to the totalitarian regime in Beijing, not to the Soviet Union. It permits export licenses for sophisticated technology to China, not to the Soviet Union.

By contrast, if the U.S. Administration makes clearer that the United States no longer regards the Soviet Union as the enemy, Gorbachev would be greatly helped. He would benefit politically if we discontinue the military pressure implied by such weapons programs as the Strategic Defense Initiative. He would benefit most from broad-scale disarmament that would permit him to transfer scientific brainpower to consumer production. In short, American help can help answer the question: "Will Gorbachev survive?"●

EXECUTIVE SESSION

EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to executive session to consider the following nominations:

Calendar No. 592, Ronald J. Sorini, for the rank of Ambassador during his tenure of service as the U.S. Negotiator on Textile Matters; and Calendar No. 593, George W. Haley, to be a Commissioner of the Postal Rate Commission.

I further ask unanimous consent that the nominees be confirmed, en bloc, that any statements appear in the RECORD as if read, en bloc, that the motions to reconsider be laid upon the table, that the President be immediately notified of the Senate's action, and that the Senate return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The nominations considered and confirmed en bloc are as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

Ronald J. Sorini, of the District of Columbia, for the rank of Ambassador during his tenure of service as the U.S. Negotiator on Textile Matters.

POSTAL RATE COMMISSION

George W. Haley, of Maryland, to be a Commissioner of the Postal Rate Commission.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will return to the consideration of legislative business.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO FILE REPORTS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, during the recess period of the Senate, Senate committees may file reported Legislative and Executive Calendar business on Thursday, February 15, from 12 noon to 3 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

USE AND DISTRIBUTION OF CERTAIN INDIAN JUDGMENT FUNDS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 1096.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the bill from the Senate (S. 1096) entitled "An Act to provide for the use and distribution of funds awarded the Seminole Indian in dockets 73, 151, and 73-A of the Indian Claims Commission", do pass with the following amendments:

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House on disagreeing votes of the two Houses and the Chair be authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Chair (Mr. ROBB) appointed Mr. INOUYE, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. REID, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. COCHRAN, and Mr. GORTON conferees on the part of the Senate.

INDIAN PREFERENCE ACT OF 1989

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of Calendar No. 411, S. 321, a bill to revise provisions of law that provide for preference to Indians.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 321) to revise provisions of law that provide for preference to Indians.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Select Committee on Indian Affairs, with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be referred to as the "Indian Preference Act of 1989".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress, after careful review of the economic conditions on Indian reservations, and the historical and special legal relationship of the Federal Government with Indian people, finds that—

(1) economic self-sufficiency is an essential element in achieving self-determination by Indian tribes and Indian people;

(2) increased Indian employment and business opportunity is a critical element in the elimination of the poverty, alcoholism, high suicide rates, substandard housing, and other problems that are the focus of many of the Federal programs serving Indians;

(3) the funds spent by the United States on reservations or otherwise spent for the benefit of Indians need to be utilized, not only to purchase goods and services but, to the maximum extent feasible, to promote Indian employment and business opportunities;

(4) the awarding of a preference in training, employment, contracting, and subcontracting opportunities has proven to be an exceptionally effective means of ensuring that Indians receive the maximum benefit from Federal funds appropriated on their behalf;

(5) the existing Federal laws on Indian preference in contracting need to be updated, revised, and consolidated to include appropriate recognition of tribal laws that establish preference programs for tribal members; and

(6) companies and individuals that seek to take improper advantage of Indian preference opportunities do not contribute to Indian economic development and damage the credibility of Indian preference programs.

(b) The Congress declares that—

(1) a major national goal of the United States is to ensure that the procurement of goods and services on Indian reservations or otherwise for the benefit of Indians shall be carried out in a manner that achieves the maximum benefit for Indian employment and business development; and

(2) a secondary but essential goal is to prevent and prohibit companies from misusing Indian preference programs.

BUY INDIAN ACT AMENDMENTS

SEC. 3. (a) Section 23 of the Act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. 861; 25 U.S.C. 47) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 23. (a)(1) Each Federal agency administering funds appropriated for the benefit of Indians that are awarded or distributed under a contract or grant shall—

"(A) provide a preference to Indian preference enterprises in the award of the grant or contract, including (but not limited to) contracts for construction or printing,

"(B) require that the recipient of the contract or grant—

"(i) provide preferences to Indians for training and employment in connection with such contract or grant and require any recipient of a subcontract or subgrant under such contract or grant to provide such preferences, and

"(ii) provide a preference to Indian preference enterprises in the awarding of subcontracts and subgrants under the contract or grant.

"(2) The Secretary of the Interior may authorize preferences for Indian preference enterprises in the award by any Federal agency of contracts that do not involve funds appropriated for the benefit of Indians upon the request of that agency if the Secretary of the Interior believes the preferences will help to fulfill the special responsibilities of the Secretary of the Interior toward Indians.

"(3) The preferences provided by reason of this subsection shall have priority over all other Federal procurement preferences.

"(4)(A) For purposes of this section, funds awarded or distributed under a contract or grant are appropriated for the benefit of Indians if—

"(i) Indians are the primary beneficiaries of the contract or grant,

"(ii) the majority of the activity to be undertaken under the contract or grant takes place within the exterior boundaries of an Indian reservation, or

"(iii) the contract is entered into under, or the grant is provided under, the Act of April 16, 1934 (48 Stat. 596; 25 U.S.C. 452, et seqq.), or under title II of the United States Housing Act of 1937 (42 U.S.C. 1437aa, et seqq.).

"(B) The provisions of this section shall not apply to the awarding of contracts under the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act (25 U.S.C. 450, et seqq.), but shall apply to the awarding of subcontracts of such contracts, to employment and training opportunities under such contracts and subcontracts, and with respect to the awarding of, and opportunities under, grants and subgrants provided under such Act.

"(C) The provisions of this section shall not apply with respect to—

"(i) contracts for the procurement of expert advice and testimony in litigation conducted by the United States as trustee for Indians or Indian tribes; or

"(ii) contracts awarded under section 8(a) of the Small Business Act (15 U.S.C. 637(a)).

"(D) This section shall apply with respect to the Five Civilized Tribes and the members of the Osage Tribe.

"(5)(A) A Federal agency shall implement the preference provided under paragraph (1)(A) by limiting the competition for the awarding of a contract to Indian preference enterprises if—

"(i) there is a reasonable expectation that offers will be obtained from at least—

"(I) 3 responsible offerors in the case of a contract for architectural-engineering services, or

"(II) 2 responsible offerors in the case of a contract for the procurement of any other services or for the procurement of any product, and

"(ii) the contract can be awarded at a fair and reasonable price.

"(B) If only one offer is received under a competition restricted to Indian preference enterprises for a contract for a product or service other than architectural-engineering services, the procuring agency may negotiate an award of the contract at a fair and reasonable price.

"(6)(A) If it is not feasible for a Federal agency to limit the competition for the award of a contract under the authority of paragraph (5), the agency shall award the contract after full and open competition. In such case, the contract shall be awarded to any responsible Indian preference enterprise submitting the lowest bid that does not exceed the lowest bid submitted by any other responsible bidder by more than the percentage prescribed by the head of the Federal agency in regulations. If a factor other than price is determinative in the award of the contract, the Federal agency shall utilize a comparable method to provide a preference to Indian preference enterprises in the selection process.

"(B) The percentage prescribed under subparagraph (A) that establishes a maximum limitation on the difference between the bids shall not be less than 5 percent nor more than 10 percent.

"(7) The preference requirements of this section may be waived only upon extraordinary circumstances. The determination to make such a waiver may only be made by—

"(A) if the procuring agency is within the Department of the Interior, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Indian Affairs,

"(B) if the procuring agency is within the Department of Health and Human Services, the Director of the Indian Health Service, and

"(C) in all other cases—

"(i) the senior procurement executive of the procuring agency, as designated under section 16(3) of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy Act (41 U.S.C. 414(3)), or

"(ii) the principal deputy of such executive who is—

"(I) a general officer (as defined in section 101(40) of title 10, United States Code) or a flag officer (as defined in section 101(41) of such title), or

"(II) a civilian employee in a position in grade GS-16 of the General Schedule under section 5331 of title 5, United States Code (or an equivalent position in the Senior Executive Service).

"(8)(A) Each Federal agency subject to the provisions of this subsection shall, at the beginning of each fiscal year, provide to the Office of Indian Preference a list of the contracts of such agency to which this section applies.

"(B) Each Federal agency shall advertise the contracts to which this section applies at a date sufficiently in advance of the date performance must begin under the contract to permit a subsequent open market advertisement of the contract if the contract cannot be awarded under the limited competition provision of this subsection.

"(9)(A) Except as otherwise provided in this paragraph, the preferences required to be provided to enterprises under this section may only be provided to Indian preference enterprises.

"(B)(i) An Indian preference enterprise may benefit from a preference provided under this section only if the enterprise submits to the agency or person that is to provide the preference an affidavit certifying that the enterprise continues to meet the requirements necessary for certification by the Director as an Indian preference enterprise. The affidavit shall be executed and submitted at the time the contract or subcontract bid, or grant or subgrant application, is submitted and again at the time the contract, subcontract, grant, or subgrant is awarded.

"(ii) Any agency or person that receives an affidavit submitted by an enterprise under clause (i) shall submit a copy of the affidavit to any Indian tribe that would be affected by the contract, subcontract, grant, or subgrant for which the enterprise seeks a preference under this section.

"(C)(i) Any Indian preference enterprise that—

"(I) is engaged in construction activities, and

"(II) has successfully completed, independently, at least one contract, may enter into joint ventures with other enterprises that are not Indian preference enterprises.

"(ii) Any Indian preference enterprise that enters into a joint venture under clause (i) shall remain eligible, and the joint venture shall be eligible, for preferences under this section so long as the Indian preference enterprise—

"(I) owns and controls at least 51 percent of the joint venture and receives at least 51 percent of the profits of the joint venture, and

"(II) has successfully completed, independently, at least one contract for each contract awarded to the joint venture for which a preference is provided under this section.

"(b) For purposes of this section—

"(1) The term 'Indian preference enterprise' means an Indian enterprise that is certified by the Director of the Office of Indian Preference as eligible for the preferences provided under this section.

"(2) The term 'Indian enterprise' means—

"(A) an enterprise which—

"(i) is engaged in construction (within the meaning of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act), and

"(ii) is entirely owned by one or more Indians, or Indian tribes, that receive 100 percent of the profits of the enterprise,

"(B) an enterprise—

"(i) which is engaged in any business other than construction, and

"(ii) at least 51 percent of which is owned by one or more Indian tribes that receive not less than 51 percent of the profits of the enterprise, or

"(C) an enterprise—

"(i) which is engaged in any business other than construction,

"(ii) at least 51 percent of which is owned by one or more Indians who receive not less than 51 percent of the profits of the enterprise, and

"(iii) which has an Indian owner who—

"(I) acts as the chief executive officer of the enterprise, and

"(II) has the experience and training to manage, and does in fact manage, the day-to-day activities of the enterprise.

"(3) The terms 'Indian' and 'Indian tribe' have the respective meaning given to each of such terms under section 4 of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act (25 U.S.C. 450b).

"(4) The term 'Secretary' means the Secretary of the Interior.

"(5) The term 'Director' means the Director of the Office of Indian Preference of the Department of the Interior.

"(6) The term 'Office' means the Office of Indian Preference of the Department of the Interior.

"(7) Except for purposes of subsection (a)(4)(B)—

"(A) the term 'contract' includes subcontracts, and

"(B) the term 'grant' includes subgrants.

"(8) The term 'Indian reservation' has the same meaning given to the term 'Reservation' by section 3(d) of the Indian Financing Act of 1974 (25 U.S.C. 1452(d)).

"(c)(1) There is hereby established within the Department of the Interior an office to be known as the 'Office of Indian Preference', which shall be under the supervision of the Director of the Office of Indian Preference.

"(2) The Director of the Office of Indian Preference shall be appointed by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Indian Affairs.

"(3)(A) The Director shall—

"(i) develop and publish a set of criteria for certifying Indian enterprises as eligible for the preferences provided under this section,

"(ii) investigate the financial backgrounds of enterprises which apply for certification as Indian enterprises eligible for the preferences provided under this section, of enterprises that have acquired such certification, and of the owners and officers of such enterprises,

"(iii) review applications from Indian enterprises for such certification,

"(iv) certify as Indian enterprises eligible for the preferences provided under this section those Indian enterprises that satisfy the criteria established under clause (i),

"(v) prescribe such regulations, and establish such policies, monitoring systems, and enforcement systems, in conjunction with the Office of Federal Procurement Policy, as may be necessary to ensure that the provisions of this section are carried out,

"(vi) investigate complaints alleging one or more violations of this section or the regulations prescribed under this section, including (but not limited to) allegations that—

"(I) an enterprise not certified by the Director as an Indian enterprise eligible for the preferences provided under this section was awarded a contract or grant with the assistance of a preference provided under this section,

"(II) an enterprise was wrongly certified by the Director as an Indian enterprise eligible for the preferences provided under this section,

"(III) an enterprise misrepresented its status to the Office, or

"(IV) an enterprise is no longer an Indian enterprise or in compliance with the criteria established under clause (i),

"(vii) investigate complaints alleging that an Indian tribe is improperly administering preferences required under this section in a manner that exhibits a documented pattern of abuse and seriously jeopardizes the rights of Indians or Indian enterprises, and

"(viii) develop and assist Federal agencies in implementing a program to ensure that Federal funds expended for the benefit of Indians also assist, to the maximum extent feasible, in the promotion of Indian economic development.

"(B) The regulations that are to be prescribed under subparagraph (A)(v) shall include—

"(i) a standard application to be used by an enterprise applying for certification as an Indian enterprise eligible for the preferences provided under this section,

"(ii) the procedures under which completed applications for such certification will be acted upon by the Director within a reasonable period of time after receipt by the Office,

"(iii) procedures which guarantee that all decisions rendered by the Director regarding such certification will be communicated to such enterprise in writing,

"(iv) a description of the appeal procedures available to any enterprise which is denied such certification by the Director, and

"(v) a description of the record-keeping management system of the Office.

"(C) The regulations that are to be prescribed under subparagraph (A)(v), and the policies and systems that are to be established under subparagraph (A)(v), shall be prescribed and established in conjunction with the Office of Federal Procurement Policy in a manner that considers the existing procurement practices of Federal agencies, promotes maximum consistency, uniformity, and coordination among Federal agencies, and promotes the maximum participation of Indian tribes.

"(D) Each Federal agency and Indian tribe shall implement, and comply with, the regulations prescribed under subparagraph (A)(v) and the policies and systems established under subparagraph (A)(v).

"(4)(A) The Director shall employ staff for the Office and may use such experts from within and without the Federal Government as may be necessary to assist the Director in carrying out the duties of the Director.

"(B) Neither the Director nor any individual employed by the Office shall participate in any decision which involves an enterprise in which the Director or employee, or a relative of the Director or employee, has a financial interest.

"(5)(A) For the purpose of conducting any investigation authorized under this subsection, the Director may administer oaths and affirmations, subpoena witnesses, compel their attendance, take evidence, and require the production of any books, papers, or documents that are relevant to the inquiry. The attendance of such witnesses and the production of such records may be required from any place in the United States.

"(B) In any case of contumacy by, or refusal to obey a subpoena issued to, any person, the Director may invoke the aid of any court of the United States where such person resides or may be found in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents. The court may issue an order requiring such person to appear before the Director, to produce records, if so ordered, or to give testimony touching the matter under investigation.

"(C) A failure to obey an order of the court issued under this paragraph shall be punishable by the court as a contempt thereof. All process in any such case may be served in the judicial district where such person resides or may be found.

"(D) Witnesses subpoenaed by the Director shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

"(6) All statements submitted by an enterprise to the Office shall be made under oath or affirmation by an officer or owner of the enterprise who is authorized to make the statement on behalf of the enterprise.

"(7) If, as the result of an investigation, the Director determines that any of the conditions described in any subclause of paragraph (3)(A)(vi) exists with respect to any enterprise, the Director shall—

"(A) revoke the certification of such enterprise as an Indian enterprise eligible for the preferences provided under this section, if such certification has been made by the Director, and

"(B) shall transmit all information available to the Director regarding such conditions to the Inspector General of, or the head of, the agency that administers the contract or grant to which such conditions relate.

"(8)(A) Any determination by the Director to deny any enterprise certification as an Indian enterprise eligible for the preferences provided under this section, or to revoke such certification, may be appealed to the Office of Hearings and Appeals of the Department of the Interior.

"(B) The decision of the Office of Hearings and Appeals of the Department of the Interior on an appeal brought under subparagraph (A) shall—

"(i) be considered final agency action by the Department on the petition, and

"(ii) be subject to judicial review under chapter 7 of title 5, United States Code.

"(9) There are authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year $500,000 to carry out the provisions of this subsection.

"(d)(1)(A) The head of each Federal agency shall deduct from each payment made under each contract awarded to an Indian preference enterprise that benefited from a preference provided under this section in the awarding of such contract an amount equal to 1.5 percent of the total amount of the payment otherwise payable to the Indian preference enterprise under such contract.

"(B) The funds deducted under subparagraph (A) shall be deposited into the Indian Enterprise Opportunity Fund.

"(C) No funds shall be deducted under subparagraph (A) during any fiscal year if the total amount of funds in the Indian Enterprise Opportunity Fund at the close of the fiscal year preceding such fiscal year exceeds $100,000,000.

"(2)(A) There is hereby established within the Treasury of the United States a trust fund to be known as the 'Indian Enterprise Opportunity Fund', consisting of such amounts as may be deposited into the Fund under paragraph (1)(B) or credited to the Fund under this paragraph.

"(B) The Secretary of the Interior shall be the trustee of the Indian Enterprise Opportunity Fund, and shall submit an annual report to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives on the financial condition and the results of the operations of the Indian Enterprise Opportunity Fund during the fiscal year preceding the fiscal year in which such report is submitted and on the expected condition and operations of the Fund during the fiscal year in which such report is submitted and the 5 fiscal years succeeding such fiscal year. Such report shall be printed as a House document of the session of the Congress to which the report is made.

"(C)(i) The Secretary of the Treasury shall invest such portion of the Indian Enterprise Opportunity Fund as is not, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, required to meet current withdrawals. Such investments may be made only in interest-bearing obligations of the United States. For such purpose, such obligations may be acquired—

"(I) on original issue at the issue price, or

"(II) by purchase of outstanding obligations at the market price.

"(ii) Any obligation acquired by the Indian Enterprise Opportunity Fund may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury at the market price.

"(iii) The interest on, and the proceeds from the sale or redemption of, any obligations held in the Indian Enterprise Opportunity Fund shall be credited to, and form a part of, the Fund.

"(D) Funds in the Indian Enterprise Opportunity Fund shall only be available for reimbursements made under paragraph (4).

"(3)(A) The Secretary shall guarantee to reimburse the Administrator of the Small Business Administration for any amount paid by the Administrator to a surety on a bond described in section 411(c)(4) of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (15 U.S.C. 694b(c)(4)) that the Administrator guarantees under section 411 of such Act if sufficient funds are available in the Indian Enterprise Opportunity Fund at the time of the execution of such bond to cover the potential liability of the Secretary to make such reimbursement with respect to such bond.

"(B)(i) During the fiscal year in which the Indian Preference Act of 1989 is enacted and the first fiscal year succeeding such fiscal year, the Secretary shall make reimbursement guarantees under subparagraph (A) without regard to the availability of funds in the Indian Enterprise Opportunity Fund.

"(ii) The total amount that—

"(I) is guaranteed to be reimbursed by the Secretary under subparagraph (A), and

"(II) would not be eligible to be guaranteed under subparagraph (A) if clause (i) did not apply, shall not exceed $15,000,000.

"(4) The Secretary is authorized and directed to pay out of the Indian Enterprise Opportunity Fund to the Administrator of the Small Business Administration amounts necessary to make any reimbursements the Secretary has guaranteed to make under paragraph (3).

"(5) The provisions of the Act of August 24, 1935 (49 Stat. 793; 40 U.S.C. 270a, et seq.) shall not apply with respect to a contract awarded to an Indian preference enterprise by a Federal agency if—

"(A) the award price of the contract is anticipated to be $3,000,000 or less;

"(B) the Indian preference enterprise has been determined to be a responsible contractor capable of performing the contract;

"(C) the Federal agency determines that the Indian preference enterprise has been unable to obtain the requisite bonds after making good faith application to at least 2 surety firms determined by the Secretary of the Treasury to issue acceptable bonds pursuant to chapter 93 of title 31, United States Code, even with a guarantee provided pursuant to title IV of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (15 U.S.C. 692, et seq.); and

"(D) the Indian preference enterprise has provided for the protection of persons furnishing materials and labor, in lieu of a payment bond, through a program of direct disbursement from the Federal Government of payments due to such persons by such Indian preference enterprise through—

"(i) an escrow account established and maintained by the Indian preference enterprise at any bank the deposits of which are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, or

"(ii) a Federal Government payment center servicing the procuring agency, if approved by the procuring agency.

"(e)(1) If—

"(A) a contract or grant to which the preferences provided under this section apply is to be performed on a reservation of an Indian tribe,

"(B) the governing body of the Indian tribe has—

"(i) established preferences generally comparable to those provided under this section,

"(ii) established a tribal office to enforce those preferences, and

"(iii) submitted to the Director a written request that this paragraph apply, and

"(C) such tribal office submits to the Director a statement certifying that the tribal office will administer the preferences established by the Indian tribe in accordance with this section, the preference requirements established by the Indian tribe shall be applicable to the contract or grant in lieu of the preferences provided under this section and the tribal office shall have primary responsibility for enforcing the preferences with respect to the contract or grant.

"(2) Paragraph (1) shall not apply if the Director determines that the preferences established by the Indian tribe are not generally comparable to those provided by this section or that the tribal office—

"(A) is incapable of enforcing the preferences, or

"(B) is failing to meet its responsibilities to the extent that the rights of Indians or Indian preference enterprises provided for in this section are being seriously jeopardized.

"(f) In addition to any other penalties provided under Federal or tribal law, whoever misrepresents the status of an individual as an Indian, or of an enterprise as an Indian enterprise or an Indian preference enterprise, in order to obtain a preference under this section for such person or any other person—

"(1) may be punished in a criminal action brought in a tribal court of an Indian tribe affected by the misrepresentation by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both;

"(2) shall be liable to the United States for the amount of any grant, or the amount paid under any contract, that was obtained by reason of the preference;

"(3) shall be subject to suspension and debarment as specified in subpart 9.4 of part 9 of title 48 of the Code of Federal Regulations (or any successor regulation) on the basis that such misrepresentation indicates a lack of business integrity that seriously and directly affects the present responsibility to perform any contract awarded by the Federal Government; and

"(4) shall be ineligible for any preference provided under this section.

"(g)(1) The Secretary of the Interior or the Director may request the Inspector General of the Department of the Interior to conduct an investigation of any contract, grant, subcontract, or subgrant with respect to which preferences are required to be provided under this section.

"(2) By no later than the date that is 30 days after the date on which a request is submitted to the Inspector General of the Department of the Interior under paragraph (1), the Inspector General shall submit to whoever made the request a written response to the request detailing the actions, if any, the Inspector General will take with respect to the request.".

(b) Section 33 of the Act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. 863; 25 U.S.C. 353) is amended by striking out "section thirty-two" and inserting in lieu thereof "sections 23 and 32".

(c) The first paragraph under the subheading "Secretary" that is under the superior heading "I. General Provisions" of the Act of April 30, 1908 (35 Stat. 71; 25 U.S.C. 47) is amended by striking out the last proviso.

CRIMINAL PENALTIES

SEC. 4. (a) Chapter 53 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 1169. Indian preferences

"(a) Any person who, for the purpose of obtaining any preference provided under section 23 of the Act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. 861; 25 U.S.C. 47) for that person or for any other person, makes, passes, uses, utters or publishes—

"(1) any statement, knowing that the statement is false, or

"(2) any instrument, paper, or document, knowing it to have been altered, forged or counterfeited, shall be fined not more than $100,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

"(b) Any person who, in any document, knowingly makes any false statement or representation of fact, or knowingly conceals or fails to disclose any fact, the disclosure of which—

"(1) is required under section 23 of the Act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. 861; 25 U.S.C. 47), or any regulations prescribed under such Act, or

"(2) is necessary to verify or clarify whether an enterprise or individual is eligible for any preference provided under such section, shall be fined not more than $100,000, or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.".

(b) The table of contents for chapter 53 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"1169. Indian preferences.".

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION SURETY BOND GUARANTEE

SEC. 5. (a) Subsection (c) of section 411 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (15 U.S.C. 694b(c)) is amended—

(1) by redesignating paragraph (4) as paragraph (5),

(2) by striking "or" at the end of paragraph (3), and

(3) by inserting after paragraph (3) the following new paragraph:

"(4) not to exceed 95 percent of the loss incurred and paid in the case of a surety requiring the Administration's specific approval for the issuance of a bond, if—

"(A) the bond was issued to an Indian preference enterprise (as defined by section 23(b) of the Act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. 861; 25 U.S.C. 47)),

"(B) the total amount of the contract for which the bond is issued at the time of the execution of the bond is $5,000,000 or less, and

"(C) the Secretary of the Interior guarantees to reimburse the Administrator for any amount the Administrator pays the surety on such loss; or".

(b)(1) Paragraph (1) of section 411(a) of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (15 U.S.C. 694b(a)(1)) is amended to read as follows:

"(1) The Administration may, upon such terms and conditions as the Administration may prescribe, guarantee and enter into commitments to guarantee any surety against loss resulting from a breach of the terms of a bid bond, payment bond, performance bond, or bonds ancillary thereto, by a principal on any contract up to—

"(A) $5,000,000 if the principal is an Indian preference enterprise, or

"(B) $1,250,000 for any other principal.".

(2) Paragraph (2) of section 411(e) of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (15 U.S.C. 694b(e)(2)) is amended to read as follows:

"(2) the total contract amount at the time of execution of the bond exceeds—

"(A) $5,000,000 if the principal is an Indian enterprise, or

"(B) $1,250,000 for any other principal,".

(c) Section 410 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (15 U.S.C. 694a) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(9) The term 'Indian preference enterprise' has the same meaning given to such term by section 23(b) of the Act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. 861; 25 U.S.C. 47).".

(d)(1) Any guarantee made by the Administrator of the Small Business Administration under section 411 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (15 U.S.C. 694b) of a bond described in section 411(c)(4) of such Act—

(A) shall not be subject to, and shall not be taken into account in applying, any limitation imposed under section 20 of the Small Business Act (15 U.S.C. 631), or under any other provision of law, on the total amount that may be guaranteed under section 411, or title IV, of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, and

(B) shall not be subject to the availability of funds in—

(i) the Business Loan and Investment Fund established under section 4(c) of the Small Business Act (15 U.S.C. 633(c)), or

(ii) the revolving fund established under section 412(a) of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (15 U.S.C. 694c(a)).

(2) The provisions of paragraph (1) shall apply notwithstanding any provision of law enacted before or on the date of enactment of this Act and shall apply notwithstanding any provision of law enacted after the date of enactment of this Act unless such subsequently enacted provision of law specifically states that paragraph (1) shall not apply and specifically cites paragraph (1).

OSAGE TRIBE

SEC. 6. Until the Osage Tribe reorganizes and adopts its own criteria for membership, the membership of the Osage Tribe shall consist of all persons of Osage ancestry listed on the roll compiled pursuant to the Act of June 28, 1906, (34 Stat. 539; chapter 3572) and the descendants of such persons. Nothing in this section shall be interpreted as interfering, affecting, or changing, in any manner, the rights of the Osage Tribe in oil, gas, coal or other minerals as provided in the Act of June 28, 1906 (34 Stat. 539; chapter 3572) or in any manner be construed to interfere, affect, or change the vested rights of Osage Indians in the ownership of headright shares in the Osage mineral estate.

MANPOWER AND JOB TRAINING

SEC. 7. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to negotiate and enter into cooperative agreements with Indian tribes to engage in cooperative manpower and job training and development programs including the performance of work on lands owned and controlled by the Department of the Interior. Such cooperative agreements may be entered into with any agency or office within the Department of the Interior. In such cooperative agreements, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to advance or reimburse funds to tribes from any appropriations available for similar kinds of work or by furnishing or sharing materials, supplies, facilities, or equipment without regard to the provisions of section 3324 of title 31, United States Code. Employees hired under such cooperative agreements shall be deemed to be Federal employees.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I rise today to express my strong support for S. 321, the Buy Indian Act Amendments of 1989. This bill will go a long way to ensure that the procurement of goods and services for the benefit of Indians shall be carried out in a manner that achieves the maximum benefit for Indian employment and economic development. As the vice chairman of the Select Committee on Indian Affairs and the cochairman of the Special Committee on Investigations, I heard the testimony of many Indian contractors who have been frustrated in their attempts to compete for the $200 million in Federal contracts let each year for the benefit of Indians. These legitimate Indian businessmen have been edged out of many contract opportunities by sham operations and front businesses which are organized as Indian-owned enterprises but are in fact nothing more than shells formed by otherwise ineligible non-Indian corporations and individuals. These front operations take advantage of Indian preference laws to defraud the Federal Government in the award of millions of dollars of Indian preference contracts. In the hearings of the Special Committee on Investigations, we found that 19 of the largest so-called Indian contractors were in fact controlled by non-Indians who drained the Indian businesses of their profits.

The Buy Indian Act Amendments of 1989 will provide for uniform standards for certification of Indian-owned enterprises which are qualified for Indian preferences. These standards will apply to all Federal and tribal contracting agencies. In this way the Buy Indian Act Amendments will clarify the area of Indian preference by consolidating existing Indian preference laws under one law which applies to all Federal and tribal agencies. The Buy Indian Act Amendments of 1989 provide for the establishment of an Office of Indian Preference within the Department of the Interior which is responsible for certifying eligible Indian-owned enterprises. This office is also responsible for the enforcement of Indian preference laws. The act provides for the creation of the Indian enterpise opportunity fund which will provide bond guarantees to eligible Indian-owned enterprises so that Indian contractors will be able to obtain bonds without having to resort to forming an Indian front operation. Finally, the act creates Federal criminal and civil penalties for violations of Indian preference laws. I feel that this legislation will provide a framework in which Indian contractors and Indian-owned enterprises will be able to compete for Federal contracts on an equal footing with non-Indian enterprises.

I want to commend Senator DECONCINI, Senator COCHRAN, Senator DASCHLE, and Senator CONRAD for their efforts on this bill. I particularly want to extend my thanks and appreciation to Senator INOUYE for his leadership and effort in bringing this measure to the full Senate. I look forward to continuing to work on S. 321 in an effort to secure final passage during this Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill is deemed read the third time and passed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. SPECTER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SPECTER. May I add after being asked by Senator DOLE to act as Republican leader I am glad to have finally a speaking part.

THE STATUS OF THE CLEAN AIR ACT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, for the information of Senators and others who have been following the progress of the Clean Air Act, I would like to provide a brief report on the status of the discussions that are now underway.

As I indicated previously, these discussions have their origin in a conversation I had last year with the administrator of the EPA, Mr. Reilly, who suggested that we get together—the administration and members of the committee, Democrats and Republicans—to discuss possibilities of reconciling the President's proposal with various proposals that have been made by Senators on the same subject.

Those discussions began last fall, and continued throughout the fall. The committee then reported out a bill which accepted about 80 percent of what the President had proposed.

When we returned in January, it was agreed to continue the discussions to attempt to reconcile the remaining differences between what was then the committee-reported bill and the President's bill. Those discussions have continued and have intensified in recent days.

In addition to the administration representatives and members of the committee, a large number of Senators have been invited to participate and have participated in discussions, particularly in areas of special concern to those Senators. These are Members of the Senate who are not members of the committee.

The discussions have made good progress, reaching tentative agreement on two important areas of the bill, those dealing with air toxics and with emissions from stationary sources in nonattainment areas.

Yesterday and today, there was lengthy discussion on the two remaining areas, the principal remaining areas of contention, those being emissions from mobile sources and acid rain. Significant progress was made in both of those areas, although also in both areas significant questions remain unresolved.

On acid rain, the question known colloquially as the class of 1985 problem has apparently been resolved, and that has been important to a large number of Senators concerned about what effect the requirements of the bill would have upon the utility industry in their State. That is a very hopeful and important sign, and I commend all of those who participated in working it out.

Areas of disagreement still remain with respect to both of those provisions, on mobile sources most notably, on the question of an alternative fuels program, and on whether or not there should be a required so-called second round of emissions reductions from automobiles.

Those discussions will continue tomorrow morning. It is my hope that we will be in a position to make a more detailed statement on this subject sometime during the day tomorrow following completion of tomorrow's discussion.

I commend all of those who participated. It has been a good faith effort. Substantial progress has been made in reconciling the differences between the two bills.

I think it is important to understand the context in which this is being discussed. The President proposed a bill that improved and expanded on current law. The committee accepted many of the President's recommendations. It then improved and expanded further on some of the provisions in the President's bill, that is to say, it made them even tighter and more expansive.

So the discussions that are now underway are between the President's bill and the committee bill, both of which are significant improvements in the overall, over and above current law.

I think it is important that everyone understand the context in which it is occurring. Almost every single provision being adopted improves or expands on the coverage of current law and the only question is to what extent that improvement or tightening, if you will, of current law will occur.

I am hopeful and heartened that we will be able to reach further agreements, and I hope to be in a position to proceed on the Senate floor to dispose finally of the bill when we return from recess.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1990

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. AND MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 10 a.m. on Thursday, February 8, and that following the time for the two leaders there be a period for morning business until 10:30 a.m. with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I modify my earlier unanimous-consent request to ask that the Senate, when it completes its business today, stand in recess until 9:30 a.m. tomorrow, Thursday, February 8, and that following the time for the two leaders there be a period for morning business until 10 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, if the distinguished Republican leader has no further business and if no other Senator is seeking recognition, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess under the previous order until 9:30 a.m. tomorrow, Thursday, February 8.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 7:04 p.m., recessed until Thursday, February 8, 1990, at 9:30 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

TRIBUTE TO MS. ATIYA EASTERLING

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to bring to your attention the extraordinary cause of a young girl from New York City and her unique crusade to battle drugs.

Using the slogan "Believe the Hype. Put Down the Pipe," Ms. Atiya Easterling, the young girl from New York City, has implemented a very successful antidrug campaign. With her parents' help she has sold hundreds of T-shirts emblazoned with the slogan and a drawing of a broken pipe of the type that is used in smoking crack and other addictive narcotics.

The inspiration for this campaign, which has received national and international attention, through appearances on TV talk shows, newspapers, and magazine articles, was the sad fact that one of her closest relatives had become a victim of crack. After hearing that here favorite uncle was a drug addict, Atiya asked her parents, Darrell and Barbara Easterling, what she could do to help him. They talked about it and then Atiya sketched out her own antidrug message, which was then transferred onto T-shirts. Moved by her efforts, her uncle kicked his drug habit and has been drug-free for over 80 days.

Using her own money, Atiya kicked off her campaign, distributing around 500 T-shirts free to her school friends and neighbors. Then to her pleasant surprise, the media in this country and abroad began to do reports about her and circulate her impressive story. Consequently, Atiya has attracted enough support to sell her T-shirts and has been contributing the profits to charities.

Undoubtedly, this young girl's concern, and her parents' willingness to help spawned encouragement from many people in New York and has touched the hearts from many more throughout the world. It is because of her inspiration and perseverance that I am proud to express my appreciation of Atiya's crusade.

I am sure that you will agree that Atiya Easterling deserves our support and thanks, since she represents the highest values that our young people possess; qualities that are often overlooked by many of us.

Ms. Atiya Easterling symbolizes a hope in our youth that they can make a difference in our country's war on drugs.

A TRIBUTE TO FORMER CONGRESSMAN HADWEN C. FULLER

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, January 29, one of Parish, New York's leading citizens and a former Member of this body, the Honorable Hadwen C. Fuller passed away at the age of 94. As the dean of the New York congressional delegation and the current representative of the town of Parish, I rise to pay tribute to this distinguished leader.

When I first became the Congressman for Oswego County after the 1982 redistricting, one of the first people I met with was Hadwen Fuller. He was quick to offer his excellent insights into the needs of the county and I was thankful for this. Since that time, we spoke often and became good friends. So today I speak as a personal friend, as a successor, and someone who learned a great deal from this man.

Hadwen Fuller was a self-made man. A high school dropout, he built from the ground up several businesses and more than one town during his lifetime. Over the course of his 94 years, he was a paperboy, a landscaper, a bank cashier and president, a World War I soldier, a Congressman, and an insurance company president. Mr. Fuller served in the 78th, 79th, and 80th Congresses. He also served for a brief period in the New York State Assembly. At the time of his death, Mr. Fuller was the director of Fuller Properties, Inc. Clearly, his life was enriched by a diversity of work experiences.

But Hadwen Fuller was not only interested in expanding his business opportunities, for he was also deeply involved in the building of his hometown of Parish. Former Parish Mayor Lewis DeGarmo described Fuller as "a great statesman. He was interested in civic affairs and the community. He did a lot of things for the village and the town. He gave a lot of employment for the people in the vicinity."

Former Congressman Fuller described his feelings toward the people of Parish in a 1983 interview with the Syracuse Herald-Journal, where he stated "I loved the town. It's part of me because I had some of the most unusual experiences with humanity in the banking business. Any man who resided in the township of Parish could walk in the bank and could borrow $50 from me without a flicker and I never lost a dime."

Hadwen Fuller was a member of several organizations including the Republican Masonic Lodge 325, the Media Shrine Temple in Watertown, NY, and the Lake Ontario Commandry 22 of Fulton. He was a life member of the Scottish Rite, a 32d Degree Mason, and member of the Royal Arch Masons. He was a charter member of the Russell Horning Post 601, American Legion, and was at one point the commander of the Oswego County American Legion.

On behalf of my colleagues from the New York congressional delegation, I would like to extend our condolences to his son Robert Fuller of Parish and his two sisters, Gertrude VanAuken and Frances Pearson, both of Syracuse. My wife Nancy joins me in sending them our thoughts and prayers.

TRIBUTE TO HADWEN C. FULLER

HON. DAVID O'B. MARTIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. MARTIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable sadness that I note the death of former Congressman Hadwen C. Fuller of Parish, NY. Had Fuller died at the age of 94 on January 29.

Congressman Fuller began his service in Washington during the 78th Congress when he was appointed to replace the late Representative Francis D. Culkin. He was reelected twice. The dean of the New York State congressional delegation, Congressman FRANK HORTON, speaking for the New York delegation, has told our colleagues of Had Fuller's distinguished business and public career. When I was elected to Congress in 1980, I was privileged to represent Oswego County and Had Fuller's hometown of Parish. His wisdom and perspectives were always welcomed and appreciated.

Congressman Fuller served with distinction in this great institution long before the cold war or the Berlin Wall, and it was only in his private sector years that he witnessed the birth of the New Frontier and the Great Society and the birth of scores of programs that we debate in this Chamber today. He served in the era long before the proliferation of the committees and subcommittees, the need for congressional staffing or even mass mailings. The Congresses in which Had Fuller's served were unlike the Congresses of the 1980's and 1990's. Members of Congress in those days came to Washington by rail with their work packed in steamer trunks. They performed the business of government for a few months and then repacked the trunks for the trip back home. Surely those days seem less hectic than today. Had Fuller was a wealth of information about the issues faced by the Congress in that post-World War II era. He was known to say that the battles fought in those days over providing roads and water to the still-remote corners of America were every bit as cantankerous as the battles that we fight today.

Had Fuller's retirement from Congress was not a retirement from an active life. His real career was in the business world where he was eminently successful. He enjoyed an enviable reputation in New York State as an entrepreneur and gentleman.

With his family, I mourn his passing, and I am saddened at having lost a good friend.

THE RULE OF LAW: DEMOCRACY AND JUSTICE FOR THE PEOPLE OF CYPRUS

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, the principles of law in which Americans place their faith are being adopted by governments around the world. From Panama to Poland free elections, majority rule, and the sanctity of individual rights have become the cornerstones of government. Unfortunately, these valued principles have been denied the people of Cyprus. Since the July 20, 1974, invasion of Northern Cyprus by Turkish forces, the people of this Mediterranean isle have lived without the rule of law fundamentally accepted by people around the world.

The United States has been both a model and a catalyst for the democratic reforms now sweeping the world. The time has come for this model of democracy to focus its resources on the island of Cyprus. The United States and the United Nations stand as the two forces best equipped to bring a peaceful end to the ethnic and political turmoil crippling Cyprus. We must begin utilizing our substantial leverage with the Turkish Government to bring about constructive negotiations on the issue of Cyprus. The ambivalence often shown by the United States and the international community toward the problem of a divided Cyprus must end.

I laud the efforts by President George Vassiliou of Cyprus and U.N. Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar to bring democracy and justice to the people of Cyprus. Their hard work and the support of the United States Government can assure that the "Green Line" meets the same fate as the Berlin Wall. Mr. Speaker, I ask you and all my colleagues in the United States Congress to support a unified, democratic Cyprus, one that follows the rule of law.

WE CANNOT ABANDON THE POOR TO AN ERRATIC MARKET

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, Congressman CONTE, Congressman SHARP, and many others from the Northern and Midwestern States, have introduced legislation to provide an emergency supplemental appropriation for the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Program [LIHEAP]. I am glad to be a cosponsor of this bill.

While the weather may be warmer now, many low- and middle-class citizens are suffering a chill as they try to pay their heating bills for the past month or two. The extraordinarily cold weather and the sudden increase in fuel oil and propane costs in many cases has led to a tripling and quadrupling of heating costs. The Federal Government has no program to control the weather and there is no agreement on controlling prices. But we do have both an agreement and a program to control the burden of energy costs on families and individuals on fixed incomes.

In recent testimony before Chairman SHARP's Subcommittee on Energy and Power, the Department of Energy agreed. Assistant Secretary Easton stated that, in view of the fact that the Department is committed to free-market pricing that allows for sudden increases in prices, the Department had to support increasing assistance to low-income people who can only allot a portion of their income to staying warm.

Pennsylvania receives $125 million under the present Low-Income Energy Assistance Program. At present prices, Pennsylvania will need to find $300 million more some place to provide the same amount of heat as last year.

We need additional Federal moneys to support this program.

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY TRIBUTE

HON. JOE KOLTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker. I rise to honor and pay tribute to the New Brighton Order of the Sons of Italy Lodge 1883 and Social Club on the proud occasion of the lodge's 50th anniversary.

The Order of the Sons of Italy is a distinguished fraternal organization dedicated to a belief in the fundamental concept that society is based on the principle of law and order, and adhering to the form of government founded upon the belief in God and based on the Constitution of the United States of America.

The Sons of Italy promotes education, religious, and political freedom, Americanism, social and civic duty, and a spiritual attachment to the traditions of the land of our ancestors.

New Brighton Sons of Italy Lodge 1883 and Social Club has especially strived to help local schools, senior citizens and the handicapped, for example, and has organized food banks and raised funds for volunteer firefighters, the March of Dimes, Little League and the disabled.

The New Brighton Lodge was initiated February 4, 1940 at a ceremony at St. Joseph Church hall, and later located at 903 Third Avenue, New Brighton, with 52 charter members.

The first administration of the New Brighton lodge, installed in 1940, was: Frank Morelli, venerable; William Leo, assistant venerable; Rocco Lucci, ex-venerable; Ernest Curcio, orator; Milo Capo, recording secretary; Dominic Pasquale, financial secretary; Louis J. Peluso, treasurer; and Dante Reveland, sergeant-at-arms. Trustees chosen were: Pasquale Pasquale, Louis Reveland, Dominic Muoio, Anthony Capo, and John Geronimo. Masters of ceremonies were John Totera and Dominic Gaudio.

Today, Lodge 1883 is located at 1435 Fifth Avenue, and the officers are: Anthony Sabella, president; Florence Gallagher, vice president; Helen Balser, financial secretary; Mary Ann Pasquale, recording secretary; Rita Farzo, treasurer; Nick Campagna, Orator; Aldo Montrucchio, master of ceremonies; Jack Balser, Sr., guard; and trustees—Joseph Battiste, Sam Farzo, Ron Pangan, Josie Ragula, and Barb Smith.

Mr. Speaker. I especially honor the New Brighton Sons of Italy Lodge 1883 here today before the full U.S. House of Representatives, because the lodge has opened its facilities to the community to help where and when it can. Lodge 1883 has exemplified the virtues of patriotism and humanitarianism and that is why I rise to pay tribute to the lodge on this 50th anniversary milestone.

THE INTRODUCTION OF THE BUDGET TRUST FUND REFORM ACT

HON. BENJAMIN J. CARDIN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, Gramm-Rudman has been a failure. Its focus on the current year deficit has made the design of accounting gimmicks a growth industry, with the Office of Management and Budget leading the way and Congress willingly going along. Most of the deficit reduction accomplished in recent years has come from the growth of the Social Security trust funds, not through congressional or Presidential action. I believe deficit reduction is a matter of will, not process, and what we need to do is to repeal Gramm-Rudman and get on with reducing the deficit. Until that option becomes viable, I have drafted the Budget Trust Fund Reform Act to inject some honesty and discipline into the Gramm-Rudman process.

Since 1986 the Social Security Trust Fund has been accumulating sizable surpluses. Instead of saving these funds to provide for the retirement of the baby boom generation, the surpluses have been used by the Treasury to fund the day-to-day functions of the Government. I applaud Senator MOYNIHAN for spotlighting the fraud that has been perpetrated over the past 4 years. Senator MOYNIHAN has proposed cutting the Social Security payroll taxes to stop this practice.

Although I share the Senator's abhorrence of the funding of Government operations with the regressive payroll tax, I am concerned that his plan would greatly aggravate the savings crisis in our country. We should continue to accumulate the Social Security surpluses and reserve them for their original purpose while also bringing our operating budget deficit under control.

First, my legislation would exclude the surpluses of the Social Security, hospitalization insurance [HI], highway, and airways trust funds from the calculation of maximum deficits. We should not be relying, as part of our deficit reduction strategy, on funds that are designated to meet long-term obligations.

Second, this bill would establish new annual deficit targets based on these corrected deficit calculations. It requires $23 billion in deficit reduction in each of the next 5 years to bring our fiscal year 1995 Federal funds deficit down to 1 percent of gross national product—$76 billion as estimated by the Congressional Budget Office. When the deficit reaches $76 billion the sequestration provisions of Gramm-Rudman would sunset. I believe this is a manageable deficit level. Our deficit is now about 4 percent of GNP.

Perhaps most important, this bill provides that any excess deficit incurred because of legislation passed after the OMB snapshot or inaccurate economic assumptions will trigger an equal reduction in the following year's target. This will greatly reduce both the ability and the incentive for Congress and the administration to pass spending into other fiscal years in order to meet current Gramm-Rudman targets.

If Congress insists on being driven by an automatic deficit reduction law, then we should employ an honest system that tolerates no post-sequestration spending, shifting of pay dates or other budget fun and games. We should also take necessary measures to permit the buildup of Social Security trust funds, as contemplated by the 1982 Social Security Act amendments, to take place. My bill will help to achieve both these worthwhile ends.

OBSERVING THE KIZOMBA FESTIVAL AS PART OF BLACK HISTORY MONTH IN GREATER MIAMI

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to observe the celebration of Black History Month, and the rich history behind the Afro-American culture. The Wolfson Campus of Miami-Dade Community College is joining in this observation of black history through their program known as Kizomba. The Kizomba program coined its name from a Swahili word for "celebration;" the program is one of many extra curricular groups at the Wolfson campus which encourages and promotes a greater understanding and appreciation of the various cultures that make up the Greater Miami area. In observance of Black History Month, Kizomba, in conjunction with Paella, Miami Book Fair International, and Jewish Heritage Week, is sponsoring the program entitled "A Celebration of Black Heritage." The month-long program which involves art exhibits, lectures, ethnic foods, and music, only exhibits a fraction of the rich Afro-American heritage all Americans should be proud of. The beauty behind Kizomba can be seen in the gathering of a diverse, multiethnic population to share and experience the heritage of the Afro-American people. Throughout this month students, families, community leaders, and dignitaries will become immersed in a celebration that applauds the cultural variety that makes Miami unique.

Many people fail to remember that the history of the Afro-Americans goes far beyond the atrocities of slavery and the advocacy of civil rights. In Africa, empires advanced education, science, trade, government, and military strategy independent of and many times earlier than their European counterparts.

The history of the Afro-American in the United States has been stained by slavery, discrimination, and tremendous injustices. In the face of adversity, the Afro-American community developed a rich heritage through their struggle in early America. Many blacks overcame this resistance and limited opportunities to become scientists, teachers, performers, athletes, and politicians. Unfortunately, the struggle which Afro-Americans endured has overshadowed their many success stories, which have helped mold this country into a great nation.

I ask you, my colleagues, and all Americans to join in saluting the many men and women who have contributed throughout history to the quality of life and achievements of this country. We all must recognize that America has always existed as a melting pot for all races, cultures, and creeds. Out of this diversity, is born excellence and out of this excellence, America exists. As Americans, we all need to join in and observe the tremendous contributions the Afro-American culture has made in this fine nation.

NATIONAL RECYCLING MONTH

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, Feburary 7, 1990

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to introduce, with Mr. DREIER, a resolution to designate April 1990 as "National Recycling Month." I urge my colleagues in the House and Senate to lend support to creating a nationwide effort to solve our solid waste crisis.

Most of you are probably familiar with the term "recycle" and many of you may already participate in community programs. However, the statistics on solid waste are still far from encouraging. The Office of Technology Assessment estimates that "Americans are generating more than half a ton of municipal solid waste per person each year." Rather than continuing to dispose of waste materials in economically inefficient ways, recycling can most efficiently conserve the resources we already have.

As I introduce "National Recycling Month I urge all Americans to incorporate conservation as part of daily life. I commend educational projects which prepare our children to recycle waste. With the forthcoming Earth Day on April 22, 1990, recycling can help us realize our ambitions of becoming a prudent, more environmentally efficient nation ready to face the 21st century.

TRIBUTE TO MARY BAKER AND DAN STACK

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Ms. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to join the Disabled American Veterans in honoring two of their dedicated servants, Marion ("Mary") T. Baker and Daniel P. Stack.

Mary, a DAV Auxiliary member for 14 years, and Dan, a life member of DAV for 17 years, certainly deserve recognition for their many years of strong leadership and altruistic service in their communities.

Mary was employed for 10 years by the Los Angeles Unified School Department in California. Presently, she is the senior vice commander of the Emily E. Baker Unit No. 9 in Warwick, RI, where she first became a member in 1974. She is also very active with the Auxiliary Department of Rhode Island where she holds the title of department auxiliary chaplain. Aside from her DAV work, Mary volunteers at the Cranston Senior Citizens Center and belongs to the Cranston Senior Tappers.

Dan served his country with the U.S. Air Force from August 1969 through April 1973. In 1974, he became a national service officer with the Disabled American Veterans and has been stationed in Boston, New York, and Cleveland. Through Dan's leadership in Cleveland, the "Forgotten Warrior" project gained national recognition and contributed to the establishment of a DAV program to address the problems of Vietnam veterans. In 1980, he was promoted to supervisor of the DAV National Service Office in Providence, RI. Currently, Dan also serves as adjutant for the Maurice H. Pion Chapter No. 17 in West Warwick, RI.

Today I am very proud to join the Disabled American Veterans in honoring two great Americans and fellow Rhode Islanders, Mary Baker and Daniel Stack.

TRIBUTE TO ROBERT DONALD SEMPLE

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to take this opportunity to honor and offer my congratulations to one of the most outstanding community leaders in southern Ohio today, Mr. Robert Donald Semple. Bob Semple was recently elected as president of the Adams County Board of Commissioners where he has served for the past 9 years.

Bob Semple was born on the same farm on which he resides today, on August 14, 1949, the second son of Donald and Beulah Semple. He attended the local Winchester High School, and graduated in 1959. After graduation Bob assisted his father in the family-owned meat processing business for several years. Later he was an employee of the State of Ohio and the Ohio Department of Transportation. Bob also spent a number of years in sales for the Kibler Milling Co.

Over the years Bob has provided outstanding, conscientious and faithful service to the community. As a commissioner he has tirelessly worked to represent the viewpoints of Adams County residents, as well as being responsive to their needs. During his tenure with the county government, Adams County has experienced a new vitality.

Through his leadership and efforts, water is now provided to many rural areas throughout Adams County that would have otherwise been neglected. We are all grateful for his persistence in ensuring that Adams County has an accessible and affordable water system. In addition, his efforts in encouraging and strengthening Four-H throughout the county have garnered praise and gratitude from many of his constitutents.

The 1990's is a decade that will bring both challenges and promise to rural communities, and Bob Semple is sure to provide the same dedication, hard work, and commitment he provided throughout the 1980's. I wish him the best, and I look forward to working with him for many years to come.

LEGISLATION TO GRANT FEDERAL CHARTER TO THE RETIRED ENLISTED ASSOCIATION

HON. JOEL HEFLEY

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. HEFLEY. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would grant a Federal charter to the Retired Enlisted Association [TREA].

The members of TREA are brave men and women who answered the call of their country when they were most needed. These men and women served with honor, dedication, and great personal sacrifice. I strongly believe Congress should recognize this organization and acknowledge the service its members gave to our Nation.

TREA is a nonprofit corporation with members made up of retired enlisted personnel from the U.S. Armed Services. It promotes national security objectives, runs a scholarship program and various veterans' assistance programs. It has over 40 chapters nationwide with members from all 50 States, the District of Columbia, Guam, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and overseas.

A Federal charter is important for TREA for several reasons. In order for TREA to participate in the Secretary of Labor's Committee on Veterans' Employment, a Federal charter is needed. Also, a Federal charter is needed in order to serve on the President's National Veterans' Day Committee. It is an injustice that the largest group of American veterans are not allowed to be represented on these committees. As my colleagues can see, a Federal charter does much more than give recognition to TREA, it is truly needed.

I urge my colleagues to join with me today and support this legislation to grant a Federal charter for the Retired Enlisted Association.

MODEL GARMENT BILL

HON. THOMAS E. PETRI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced H.R. 3966, which would enable retail fabric stores to offer model garment programs to their employees. Model garment programs have been very popular with employees of fabric stores. Under these volunteer programs, employees have received free patterns, notions and materials. After the garment had been displayed in the store for a brief period, the employee was allowed to keep it.

Unfortunately, these programs are not allowed at the present time because several years ago the Department of Labor decided that the voluntary sewing at home of model display garments violated the Department of Labor's industrial homework restrictions.

In 1988, the Department of Labor attempted to address through regulations the concerns of those who supported model garment programs. Unfortunately, an ageement could not be reached between the Department and fabric retailers.

As a result, today I am introducing legislation which would amend the Fair Labor Standards Act to allow employees to voluntarily construct model display garments at home. In addition to receiving the garment after a maximum 12-week display period, under the bill the employee must receive payment of the minimum wage for construction time. I believe this provision is a reasonable compromise that should meet the objections of those who are concerned about industrial homework.

Obviously, these programs are beneficial to many employees who enjoy home sewing. My bill simply would allow fabric stores to extend this benefit to their employees by allowing the stores to implement model garment programs without violating industrial homework restrictions. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this bill, and insert the bill in the RECORD at this point:

H.R. 3966

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. CONSTRUCTION OF GARMENT OR CRAFT ITEM.

(a) AMENDMENT OF FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT OF 1938.—Section 11(d) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (29 U.S.C. 211(d)) is amended—

(1) by striking "The" and inserting "(1) Subject to paragraph (2), the"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2)(A) In carrying out paragraph (1), the Secretary shall not make any regulation or order to prohibit an individual from—

"(i) constructing, at any location, any garment or craft item to be used for display purposes at premises that are used for retail sales of fabrics, patterns, notions, or related craft materials; and

"(ii) compensating, in whole or in part, an employee for constructing an item described in clause (i) through an exchange of the value of labor and the value of materials relating to such item as follows:

"(I) The value of labor used in constructing such item shall be determined by multiplying the reasonable amount of time needed to construct such item by the minimum wage rate established in section 6.

"(II) The value of materials used in constructing such item shall be the retail price at which the materials used to construct such item would have been sold to the general public at the premises described in clause (i).".

"(B) Any employer who is subject to this Act, in order to employ any individual to construct any display garment or craft item, shall—

"(i) compensate such individual according to the minimum wage rate established in section 6;

"(ii) ensure that such construction work is performed on a voluntary basis;

"(iii) allow such individual to retain the right of control over all aspects of the construction;

"(iv) allow such individual to retain ownership of the garment or craft item;

"(v) display the garment or craft item for not longer than a 12-week period; and

"(vi) ensure that such individual will be given the garment or craft item in good condition, reasonable wear and tear expected, promptly after the expiration of the display period.".

(b) REGULATIONS OR ORDERS.—On the date of enactment of this Act, any regulation or order of the Secretary of Labor made under section 11 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (29 U.S.C. 210) promulgated prior to such date, that is not authorized by such section as amended by this Act, shall be of no force or effect.

THE DEDICATION OF THE CHESTER F. CARLSON CENTER FOR IMAGING SCIENCE

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, shortly before Congress adjourned the first session of the 101st Congress last November, I had the distinct honor of attending the dedication ceremony of the Chester F. Carlson Center for Imaging Science at the Rochester Institute of Technology. The center represents a partnership between the Government, business, and academia in an effort which will undoubtedly expand our horizons in the realm of imaging science. I was pleased to have played a role in securing the Federal funding for the center and look forward to it's future accomplishments.

During the ceremony, Catherine Carlson, daughter of Chester F. Carlson, talked a little about her father. Mr. Carlson, of course, was world famous as the inventor of Xerography, but his talents and contributions reached far beyond this. The following is a copy of the speech given by Catherine Carlson and it offers us some unique insights into this truly great man:

DEDICATION OF CHESTER F. CARLSON CENTER FOR IMAGING SCIENCE, ROCHESTER INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY, OCTOBER 28, 1989

(Speech by Catherine Carlson)

Good morning members and friends of the Rochester Institute of Technology community. Mother (Mrs. Chester F. Carlson) is very disappointed that poor health prevents her from being here with us this morning. But she does want you to know how very proud she is that RIT has chosen to name its Center for Imaging Science for Chester Carlson.

He was a man practically unknown. This was his own choice.

One of Chester Carlson's strongest interests all his life was education. It seems appropriate for a talk in this place of learning to tell you of his extraordinary struggle to gain an education and his natural bent in science.

By the time he was two years of age his father had contracted tuberculosis and a painful arthritic condition and was unable to earn a living for his family.

They settled in southern California. By the time Chester was twelve he contributed a large part to the support of this small family. Rising at five in the morning, he worked at many kinds of jobs such as washing windows, sweeping floors and sidewalks, and doing various odd jobs until school time. Then after school he would do the same thing.

Chester's mother was a brave and wonderful woman and Chester adored her. He said she tried to make their hardships into adventures. His mother died during his last year of high school. He said this was one of the worst blows in his life. She had been such a sustaining support to his father and himself.

His Uncle Oscar was a principal of a high school in Minnesota and in a letter to Uncle Oscar's widow in 1964, Chester wrote:

"I had finished high school and at the time I think I had a temporary job on a farm and was not very clear about my future. We were living in rather primitive quarters, just one room with a cement floor. My father slept inside and I slept in a homemade sleeping bag which I laid out between the house and a nearby board fence.

"A visit and the talks with Uncle Oscar probably changed my life. I recall I told him that I wanted to go to college, but could not afford it, so intended to work for a few years until I could save some money. Uncle Oscar made the very important suggestion that I try by whatever means to continue my education as soon as possible. It was then I remembered that junior college in nearby Riverside had a "Co-op" program. I had not seriously considered it because I had my father to support. However, Oscar thought I should investigate anyway. If I hadn't it is quite possible I would never have completed a college education—nor have invented Xerography."

On the school co-op plan Chester worked in a research laboratory of a cement plant one month, and attended school alternate months. He still had to work evenings and weekends sometimes 16 hours or more a day to support himself and his father.

He believed that the best scientific education could come through Caltech which he entered in his junior year. After two years he received his B.S. degree in physics, just at the time when the Depression was getting well under way in 1930. He traveled east looking for work.

His extraordinary invention, of xerography, which did revolutionalize our way of life through the ability to communicate, came out of a very small home made laboratory in 1938, with inexpensive equipment, some of it made by Chester himself. The search that led to the invention of xerography began in earnest in 1935. He had worked for four years studying in the library nights and working in his laboratory weekends researching and experimenting over and over.

Chet's cousin, Dr. Roy Carlson, who was 5 years older than Chester, said it was quite apparent that Chet has an entirely unique way of viewing the world around him. This was demonstrated by a little story Roy told. He said one day to Chet, "Oh Chet, look there is a blackbird." Chet said, "How do you know it is a blackbird?" Roy said, "Because I see it is black." Chet said, "On this side it is black, but how do you know what color it is on the other side?"

Chester kept notebooks from an early age. It was surprising to find the great number of inventions in his early notebooks which have since been developed by others, such as the ball point pen, disposable facial tissue, filtered cigarettes, and many others. None of these were big enough to hold Chester's interest, but it showed his fertile, inventive mind at work. He had this strong interest in the graphic arts and particularly in printing and duplication. He said, "While in high school I worked for a printer in my spare time and he sold me an old printing press which he had discarded. I paid for it by working for him. Then I started out to set my own type and print this little chemistry paper. I don't think I printed more than two issues, and they weren't much. However, this experience impressed me with the difficulty of getting words into hard copy and in turn, started me thinking about duplicating processes."

One of the keys to the creative mind is motivation. Chester Carlson had ample reason to be motivated—the extreme poverty of his early life was one driving factor. But the need to make a great invention seemed to have been born in him. His cousin, Roy, remembered distinctly that when Chester was 12 years of age he heard him say, quite seriously, "Someday I will make a big invention." About the invention Chester wrote in a letter, "Because of my impoverished and lonely life as a child and a youth, I developed my own habits of thinking and working. This led me down some channels of thought which had been neglected by others." He became one of those bold thinkers who dared to explore outside the confines of traditional science.

Philo Farnsworth, one of the early pioneers in television research, once said, "We must not lose track of the fact that inventions as such, important inventions, are made by individuals and almost invariably by individuals with very limited means."

Dr. Clark, who was manager of physics at Haloid, pointed out how unique the invention of xerography was by saying, "Chet put together a rather odd lot of phenomena, each of which was obscure in itself and none of which had previously been related in anyone's thinking. The result was the biggest thing in imaging since photography itself. Further, he did it entirely without the help of a favorable scientific climate. As you know there are dozens of instances of simultaneous discoveries down through scientific history but no one came anywhere near being simultaneous with Chet."

Joseph C. Wilson, who was the president of Haloid, later the president and chairman of Xerox Corporation was the only man among twenty company executives who saw the possibility and shared Chester's vision in this unknown process.

Today fifty companies, giving employment to over a million people, use the basic Carlson patents and process. Many of those companies have contributed to this Center which honors Chester F. Carlson.

The struggles and difficulties of his life not only did not embitter him but they seem to have caused certain sparks of creativity in him and made him much more compassionate. He was naturally a compassionate person but this added to his great compassion for others. He understood people's inner feelings and sufferings and he wanted very, very much to do something about it.

In disposing of a rather large fortune, he said several times, I do not know whether I am doing right or wrong. I am simply doing the best I can.

I hope that I am able to convey in this talk that Chester Carlson was a gentle, caring man, caring for all humanity and using his wealth to help as many as possible. Although he earned several hundred million dollars from his invention he spent the last twelve or thirteen years of his life disposing of his fortune in humanitarian pursuits because he considered the money to be a trust. His largest gifts were in the areas of world peace (this was a consuming interest of his), the Civil Rights Movement, and higher educational institutions, and as the people at RIT know, he had a special affection for this Institution. These and all other gifts were given anonymously.

Chester Carlson was the 1966 recipient of the Horatio Alger Award, recipient of the Inventor of The Year Award in 1964 and was inducted into the National Inventors Hall of Fame in Washington, D.C. in 1981. Among his honors were the Longstreth Medal, the Holley Medal, the French Medal of Honor, and many more too numerous to mention.

At the accessioning of the Carlson papers by the N.Y. Public Library, the president of the library said, "It is abundantly clear that the invention of xerography ranks in a trio of the significant developments relating to the printed word. The first, of course, was Guttenberg's invention of the printing press, the second was Mergenthaler's invention of linotype and third Carlson's invention of xerography."

U Thant, Secretary-General of the United Nations at the time of Chester's death said: "To know Chester Carlson was to like him, to love him and to respect him. He was generally known as the inventor of xerography, and although it was an extraordinary achievement in the technological and scientific field, I respected him more as a man of exceptional moral stature and as a humanist. He belonged to that rare breed of leaders who generate in our hearts faith in man and hope for the future."

Although Chester Carlson prized his anonymity it seems right to honor a man who has contributed so much to the well being of so many people and to the technological advancement of the 20th century.

Chester F. Carlson would be proud of the leading comprehensive university RIT has become. RIT has indeed honored this great man by naming this Center for Imaging Science for him.

THE PROJECT STEPS PROGRAM

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of our colleagues an outstanding project conducted by Camp Jawonio in Rockland County, NY.

The project is entitled "Success Through Employment Programs"—Project STEPs for short—and it has altered the lives of many deserving men and women in Rockland County.

Mr. Speaker, this project was called to my attention by my constituent, Mr. Edward Branca, Jr., who has long been a regular correspondent with my congressional offices. I have found his enthusiasm for Project STEPs to be contageous, and I salute the men and women who have worked to bring Mr. Branca and many like him into the mainstream of employment.

Mr. Speaker, I request that an article regarding this project which appeared in the Rockland County Journal News on September 4, 1988, and which summarizes the fine accomplishments of "Project STEPs" be inserted at this point in the RECORD:

A DREAM OF BEING SIMPLY "ORDINARY"

(By Len Maniace)

For the past 10 months, Edward Branca, Jr. has been living a dream.

Five days a week, the 37-year-old Branca leaves his aunt's home in Nanuet and heads for his job at a Valley Cottage medical laboratory where he mails out bills.

That might seem routine, except for the fact that this is Branca's first job.

For much of his life, Branca has been lost in a shadowy world of mental illness. Finally after a long struggle, he emerged from that world last October when he went to work in a supervised work program.

"It's an entry level job, but I love my work. Going to work means I'm part of the mainstream. It makes me an average citizen. It's something I fantasized about," Branca said.

Achieving that dream was a victory over nightmares that haunted Branca for years: that he could never be independent and was doomed to be left homeless upon the death of his aunt.

"I would be a bum, living on the street. There was a time that I thought the only way I could keep this from coming true was suicide," Branca said.

Branca's nightmare began early. He was expelled from school at age 4 because teachers considered him disruptive.

When he was not quite 9, Branca's bewildered parents placed their only son in what was then the Rockland State Hospital in Orangeburg.

Branca was eventually diagnosed as manic-depressive, a condition marked by extreme mood swings.

He left the mental hospital in 1968, but his condition had not changed. Branca lived an isolated life with his father until the elder Branca's death in 1977, and then with an aunt. His mother had died in 1966.

Nevertheless Branca was a keen observer. He followed politics the way others followed sports. He sometimes accompanied his father to Rockland Democratic conventions.

"I wasn't very interested in sports. I guess because I never played them," Branca said.

Still, Branca sometimes dreamed about redeeming his family name in one dramatic baseball confrontation.

Branca is the nephew of Brooklyn Dodger Ralph Branca, who, despite a fine pitching career, is most remembered for giving up a home run to Bobby Thompson that allowed the New York Giants to win a National League playoff series in 1951.

"I fantasized that I was in a World Series pitching to the nephew of Bobby Thompson and that I struck him out on three pitches."

Branca speaks articulately about his ailment, sometimes summing up periods of life in a single phrase. "I led a pretty isolated life and was totally dependent. I was at home all week, except for going out to McDonald's."

"Nothing really happened during the 70s. I call them my sleepy years."

Despite the urging of his family, Branca refused to seek psychiatric help after his release from the state mental hospital. He feared that the doctor would force him to find a job—a prospect that filled him with terror.

"I was afraid of working. I just thought that I could not do it," Branca said.

Finally, the outside world intruded. As Branca recalls it, "On Sept. 24, 1980, something happened that changed my life."

An avid reader, Branca spotted a newspaper article about the chance reunion of three 19-year-olds who had been adopted and raised separately from birth.

The story moved Branca, starting him on an five-year crusade to change laws that sealed adoption records, laws he said that make it difficult for siblings to be reunited even after they had become adults.

Branca became a political activist, lobbying Rockland's state legislators, and trying to convince them to introduce a bill to permit sealed adoption records to be opened under limited circumstances.

He testified at public hearings in Albany, New York City and before Congress on a similar federal law. His phone bills ran $300 a month.

Branca say he is not sure what attracted him to the triplets' story, but speculates that his years of loneliness may have been a factor. "As an only child, I often wanted to have a sibling."

Although the bill was eventually defeated, Branca said his effort changed his life.

"On trips to New York City, I would watch people walking to work and I would begin to think of myself as going to work. I saw workers in their offices and I began to think that work could be pleasant."

However, Branca still was afraid to seek psychiatric help.

Despite medical advances that had revolutionized treatment for his disorder, Branca continued to take outdated medications obtained from a pharmacist who agreed to refill a 1968 prescription.

Then early last year, when his aunt became ill, Branca was confronted with the possibility that his nightmare might finally come true—that he might be left homeless.

Branca called for help. He spent two weeks in a hospital and then began outpatient treatment at the Rockland County Community Mental Health Center in Pomona. He received new medication and began therapy.

Last year, Branca entered a vocational rehabilitation program for the mentally ill. Operated by the Rockland Center for the Physically Disabled—often known as Jawanio—the program found Branca working at Rockland Medilabs.

Through the program, a coach visits Branca at his job to help him with any problems.

"I was frightened and needed a lot of reassurance," said Branca of his early days on the job.

Now working on a high school equivalency diploma, Branca hopes to go to college.

And Branca has other dreams.

"I have a fantasy that I've got a job in Washington as a lobbyist. I've met a girl and we've gotten married. It's a beautiful Sunday morning—we wake up and go for a walk."

"God willing, it will come true."

COACHES HELP ON JOB

A year-old program is helping Rockland's mentally ill young adults cope with work stresses and keep their jobs.

Sponsored by the Rockland Center for the Physically Disabled—Jawanio—the program provides "coaches" who regularly visit emotionally troubled workers on the job.

Some 25 people have been placed at jobs in Rockland and northern New Jersey through Project STEPs, Success Through Employment Programs.

"Mostly, we are there to offer support and to act as a liaison between the company and the worker," said Alice Grossman, a job coach with the program.

"We try to solve the little problems before they become bigger problems that might lead to the loss of the job."

The program is aimed at patients suffering from ailments such as manic-depression and schizophrenia, conditions that can often be controlled by drugs.

To date, companies participating in Project STEPs are pleased with the program, officials said.

"We feel that it has worked out really well," said Bette Drucker, manager of human resources at Rockland Medilabs in Valley Cottage, which employs two Project STEPs workers.

One of those workers is 37-year-old Nanuet resident Edward Branca, Jr., who sends out bills for diagnostic tests.

While Rockland Medilabs joined the program because it was a way of contributing to the community, officials are learning that Project STEPs is good for business, Drucker said.

"Ed is really conscientious about his work and we're really pleased with him," Drucker said.

Companies also receive a tax-credit to help support an employee's salary for his or her first year on the job, Jawanio officials said.

The program's first-year operation was funded by a $113,000 state grant and officials plan to expand the program this year.

ALAN CRANDALL, DIRECTOR OF THE BATTLE CREEK HOUSING COMMISSION

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute to a very special constituent of mine, Mr. Alan L. Crandall, the executive director of the Battle Creek Housing Commission. On February 9, Alan will be honored by his friends and colleagues as he retires after 16 years of dedicated service with the commission.

Alan began his career serving as the accountant of the Battle Creek Housing Commission and was later appointed to the position of executive director. During his tenure as director, Alan was instrumental in developing several federally subsidized projects which increased the number of housing units available to low-income families in Battle Creek. He has been credited with many important initiatives such as securing 79 section 8 certificates and 65 section 8 vouchers which rewrite rent subsidies to families in privately owned units; developing Kellogg Manor, a residential complex serving 70 elderly and disabled families; creating the Battle Creek Housing Development Corporation; and founding the Michigan Housing Directors Association.

In addition Alan has committed both time and energy to a vast array of community and professional organizations: the National Association of Housing and Redevelopment Officials [NAHRD], the Michigan State Chapter of NAHRD, the Battle Creek Exchange Club, and the Birchwood United Methodist Church.

Mr. Speaker, over the years Alan Crandall has distinguished himself as a dedicated public servant and exemplary citizen. The care and concern that have always been present in his approach to local housing problems have endeared him to his community. The integrity with which he has conducted his duties as the executive director for the Battle Creek Housing Commission have earned him the respect and admiration of all who have been privileged to work with him.

I am delighted to have Alan as a constituent. I want to congratulate him on his retirement and wish him and his family all possible happiness in the years ahead.

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington report for Wednesday, February 7, 1990, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

In his budget for 1991, the President carries out the promise of continuity he made during the 1988 presidential campaign, largely embracing the status quo in government and holding to the path of high defense spending and relatively low taxes. Even with his immense popularity he chooses not to submit a bold budget.

The President calls for spending of $1.23 trillion—a 3% increase. That is larger than the entire economies of every other country except the Soviet Union and Japan. He projects a 1.9% increase in Defense Department outlays and a 3.4% increase in the rest of the budget. Revenues are projected to climb 9% to $1.17 trillion, leaving a projected deficit of $63 billion. The budget is more straightforward and open than those of recent years, and the Congress should respond in kind and carry on an open and constructive dialogue with the President.

DEFENSE

The President offers no peace dividend. He increases defense spending to $303 billion—2% less than inflation but more dollars than this year. The Congress will almost certainly demand faster and deeper Pentagon cuts.

The President recommends cuts in troop levels, but seeks major increases for the Strategic Defense Initiative and several strategic weapons systems, including the B2 bomber and the Midgetman and MX missiles. I am disappointed that he did not cut deeper into defense spending in response to the political changes in Eastern Europe, which in my view have greatly reduced the military threat from the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact. Instead the President wants to increase spending for nuclear arms, without a fundamental review of where defense policies and programs should be headed.

DOMESTIC PROGRAMS

The President puts forward a modest domestic agenda. While his State of the Union address certainly hit the major concerns of Americans, like drug abuse, education, and the environment, his budget does not provide the resources for any large-scale attack on the problems.

The President calls for significant increases in the popular Head Start program and several other programs for the poor. He believes that more money should be channeled into space exploration and biotechnology and less into farm subsidies and health care for the elderly. He proposes cutting low-income heating and weatherization programs, grants to public libraries, and federal investment in railroads, bridges, and wastewater treatment. Some of his proposals, such as not adjusting federal pensions for inflation, have been rejected often by the Congress and stand little chance of passage. The President is to be commended for pointing out in his budget that the U.S faces trillions of dollars of potential liabilities from underfunded health and retirement programs, environmental cleanup, and losses in federal credit and insurance.

REVENUES

Although the President proposes no general tax increase, his budget calls for about $13.9 billion of new revenue, due mainly to increased IRS enforcement and several tax increases, including expanded user fees for government services and higher airline ticket taxes.

The President seeks to lower capital gains taxes, which he estimates would raise nearly $5 billion in the first year. While economists generally agree that revenues would increase initially as investors sold investments to take advantage of the lower rates, they also calculate that long-term losses to the Treasury could be substantial.

In lamenting the nation's dismal savings performance, the President in effect acknowledges that the tax cuts of the 1980s did not yield the promised burst of new savings. He offers several proposals to boost personal and business savings, including a family savings account which would allow families to invest up to $5000 a year in special accounts whose interest could accumulate tax free. However, increased private savings from such tax breaks might well be outweighted by decreased tax revenues. This would prevent any increase in national savings—the combined savings of households, businesses, and government. Reducing the budget deficit remains the most promising way of increasing national savings.

ECONOMIC ASSUMPTIONS

The President's budget is based on optimistic assessments that strong U.S. economic growth will continue later this year while inflation stays steady and interest rates decline. That will be a good performance if we can pull it off. Falling short could make a huge difference to the federal deficit. For example, economic growth next year at 1.9 percent rather than the 2.6 percent the President predicts, would increase the deficit by $15 billion.

DEFICIT

My biggest problem with the President's budget is that it again fails to come to grips with our most serious economic problem: the large federal deficit. Annual deficits still hover in the $150 billion range. We continue to go into debt at an alarming rate—reducing savings, forcing up interest rates, stunting economic growth, and increasing our dependence on foreign lenders.

The President reaches his projected deficit for 1991 with the help of optimistic assumptions about the size of the deficit-reduction task and budgeting gimmicks such as counting $900 million in revenue from speeded up collection of employer payrol taxes—a technique he criticized last year. I get the impression from this budget that the administration intends less to reduce the deficit than to hope that the economy will grow enough so that the current deficit does not matter.

Overall, my impression is that the President's budget is a call for tinkering with existing federal spending rather than reorientation. A wide gap separates his budget rhetoric from his proposals. Although the President raises a number of important issues about U.S. saving and investment rates, inadequate education, and huge hidden costs for the government in the future, he does not provide many answers. The budget does not make a major assault on the federal deficit despite its language suggesting that the nation's economic future depends on getting it under control.

This budget will face some difficulty in the Congress. The biggest clash will likely be over the President's defense requests. The budget debate may be long and divisive, but it is a good place to begin the discussion of national priorities.

IN RECOGNITION OF A LEARNING TRADITION

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask my colleagues to join me in recognition of a new Pennsylvanian who faces an exciting challenge and the opportunity to help mold young minds.

Dr. James E. Douthat has been appointed the 14th president of Lycoming College, a small, academically excellent liberal arts college located in Williamsport, PA. I am proud to represent this fine institution in Congress, and I know the community is proud that Dr. Douthat will now represent Lycoming College.

Dr. Douthat is committed to teaching students more than just career skills; instead, he emphasizes life-long intellectual curiosity and love of knowledge. This approach to academia is necessary in an age that stresses salary and power, an attitude which is expected to lead to a shortage of professors in the humanities.

Given that America can ill afford to lose the values and insight gained through a study of philosophy, art, and the social sciences, academic leaders like Dr. Douthat are rare and valuable.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate Dr. Douthat on his appointment and wish him the best.

A TRIBUTE TO MRS. DOROTHY M. TYLER

HON. JOE KOLTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today before the House of Representatives to recognize and pay tribute to a dedicated, Christian lady in my Fourth Congressional District of Pennsylvania who has contributed countless hours of dedication and labor in the Aliquippa area establishing community services. Mrs. Dorothy M. Tyler of Aliquippa is a good decent woman who has accomplished a great deal in her endeavors to help people and communities in need.

After 30 years in the ministry, a labor of love in Christ, Mrs. Tyler founded the Tyler Youth Group, Inc., a nonprofit organizaion established in 1983 to develop and train young people in Aliquippa. The group involves itself in recreational, educational, and leisure time activities.

The TYG is the ultimate manifestation of Mrs. Tyler's vision of human service. The group is interested in recreation as a vital force which influences the life of our young people and the value recreation has in developing and maintaining wholesome personality traits and socialization skills, while enhancing one's physiological growth.

Mrs. Tyler heard from many quarters in the city of Aliquippa, "Our children have no place to go and nothing to do." After serious reflection this determined lady decided to develop a community based recreation youth center to offer opportunities for advancement and expand horizons for the dissatisfied, frustrated youngsters. The project is now underway and is being developed in three phases.

This splendid lady was born in Pittsburgh in 1922, the 13th of 14 children in her family. Later moving to Aliquippa she quickly established herself as a dedicated young woman who cared deeply about her community.

Married in 1947 to Elias Ialomon Tyler, she is the mother of a son, the late Elias Jr. and a daughter, Darselle.

A born-again Christain, Dorothy began her serious church work in 1952 and is now a member of the Church In The Round, Church of God in Aliquippa. She has also been associated with the Christian Lighthouse Church, Kadesh Church of Immanuel and was influential in organizing the Miracle Church of God In Christ II, Aliquippa. She is a Sunday school superintendent and a graduate of the Harty Bible School.

During her lifetime of service she also organized an Adult Night School Program, the first junior church of the Church In the Round and is the chairman of the committee for the Aliquippa Jr. High School PTA. She is also a member of the Allegheny County Children and Youth Services and Catholic Diocese.

In addition to being the founder and president of the Tyler Youth Group, Inc., she is also a dedicated missionary helper who, during World War II, served our Nation with distinction as a private in the U.S. Army Women's Corp.

I am proud, Mr. Speaker, to take this opportunity to recognize and compliment Mrs. Dorothy M. Tyler for her praiseworthy service and life of Christian commitment.

TRIBUTE TO BABE RUTH

HON. BENJAMIN L. CARDIN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to invite my colleagues to join me in recognizing the birthday of one of baseball's greatest stars: Baltimore's own Babe Ruth.

George Herman Ruth was born 95 years ago at 216 Emory Street in Baltimore's waterfront community. The boy's natural athletic talent emerged at an early age as he learned to play America's favorite sport at St. Mary's Industrial School. By 1914, Ruth was considered a child prodigy as he played for Baltimore's minor league Orioles. Because he was remarkable talented at such a young age, Ruth became known as Babe.

The Babe's reputation earned him a position on the Boston Red Sox, where he played for over five seasons and became one of the American League's premier pitchers. His World Series pitching record—29⅔ consecutive scoreless innings and his home-run fame took Babe to the New York Yankees. He continued to set records and wow fans with his unprecedented feats.

Although many of Babe Ruth's long-standing records were eventually broken, he retains the title of Home Run King and his image is associated with the great legends of baseball. Mr. Speaker, I hope that my colleagues will join me in celebrating the 95th birthday of Baltimore's Babe Ruth.

THE KID FROM CAMDEN STREET

Baltimore's newest tour attraction is the rowhouse at 216 Emory Street where Babe Ruth was born. In 1970, thanks to two mayors, selfless committeemen, a no-fee architect and thousands of medallion-buyers, the building was reconstructed and dedicated.

There, at the home of her father, an upholsterer named Pius Schamberger, Katie Ruth gave birth, February 6, 1895, to the oldest of her eight children. The babe was named for his father, George Herman Ruth.

The two families were West Baltimore Germans. For years the Ruths operated a grocery and saloon on Frederick avenue, and George Sr. was still a counterman, living at home, when he became a father. Soon after, he joined a brother in the manufacture of lighting rods; but by 1901 had opened a saloon of his own at 426 West Camden Street. His family lived upstairs. Until torn down to make way for Inner Harbor West, the boyhood home of baseball's most famous player was still a saloon.

It was indeed a setting to make kids tough. At 7, George Jr. swore, chewed tobacco and simply ignored school. He was not vicious; but alley mischief beckoned. His father was busy tending bar; his mother, with the younger children. One day, after a tavern uproar, neighbors called in the authorities. George's parents agreed for him to be sent to St. Mary's Industrial School, at Caton and Wilkens avenues. He was released a month later, then sent back; this happened five times, over the years. The school trained him as a shirtmaker—and ballplayer. Among its 800 boys there were 43 uniformed nines.

The day he entered, in June 1902, young George awkwardly threw his first baseball; he threw and batted almost daily in the dozen years he spent at St. Mary's. He started as a lefthanded catcher (with a right-handed mitt) but played every position before settling down as a pitcher. Coached and encouraged by Brothers Paul, Matthias, Gilbert, Herman and Alban, Ruth as a teenager was the school varsity's star.

Toward his nineteenth birthday (everybody thought he was 20) Jack Dunn, on a tip, came out for a look. He straightway hired a triple-threat pitcher—good fast ball, good curve, even good control. The Orioles never did find much to teach George Ruth about baseball.

Going south, and in training camp at Fayetteville, N.C., the newest Oriole was a joke-ster's joy. He overate, played reprisal jokes, ran the hotel elevator and nearly killed himself sticking his head out, and pitched amazing ball.

His first professional run was scored on an intersquad double by Rodger Pippen, sports writer for the old Baltimore Star, a fill-in in centerfield. His first home run followed soon—a huge wallop. In practice games, he faced, and beat, Brooklyn, the Phils and the world-champion A's. "Who's that?" a sports writer asked, in awe. "That?" spoke up coach Henry Steinman. "That's Jack's new baby." (As a formality, Dunn had replaced St. Mary's as parole custodian.) And Babe Ruth it was, forevermore.

The season began at home, against Buffalo. Dunn let Ruth start the second game; he turned in a 6-0 shutout. Joe McCarthy, later on Yankee manager, was Buffalo's second baseman. He went hitless, but Ruth got two singles.

Dunn, a former pitcher himself, was astounded by this rookie who wore rings on three fingers of his pitching hand, and who won ten games in a row. Ruth's pay rose from $100 a month to $250. He spent some of it on a motorcycle and buzzed the neighborhood—the Ruths by then were living above a bar at 522 West Conway Street—and gave rides to Mamie, the only one of his brothers and sisters who lived to maturity. (His mother had died in 1910). The Babe—6 feet 2 and weighing 180 pounds—was Little George to his family; his father, whom he much resembled, being Big George.

Ruth's good times, however, paralleled bad times for the club. Oriole turnstiles were idle, while the Federal League's, across 29th Street, spun merrily. American and National owners, raided, sought to buy minor leaguers; early in July, Dunn, forbidden to move the franchise in mid-season, gave in. Outfielder Birdie Cree, top hitter (.356) and top earner ($400), went first. Ruth (13-6 in won-lost) was in the third shipment, with fellow-rookie Ernie Shore and their battery mate, Captain Ben Egan. Verbally, Dunn had ticketed Ruth for John McGraw's Giants, but the sale was to the Red Sox, whose owner had lent heavily to the sore-pressed International League. McGraw got mad at Dunn. Ruth's price was about $8,500, low because three-league-war losses left the owers short of capital.

Though he was still in his teens, Ruth's value was no secret from the majors or from

Oriole fans. C. Starr Matthews wrote in The Sun, on a black Friday in July, 1914:

He is a wonder and his performances have been followed by fans all over the country. During the past four months, his shoots have made the whole baseball world sit up and pay attention.

Babe Ruth did not hit a home run while an Oriole. He did, however, first play the outfield in Baltimore, during that awful week when the team shrank to a mere dozen men. In September—a sad postscript—the Babe reappeared in enemy uniform having been sent down to Providence for seasoning. The Clamdiggers won the pennant, Babe Ruth pitched and won against the Orioles, Babe Ruth did hit a home run.

He went on to change the basic emphasis in baseball, to post hitting records that no one has approached, to pack stands and hoist salaries and spellbind whole generations of kids. Biographies, and a plaque in Memorial Stadium's lobby, describe it.

Baltimore does not claim these feats. The Babe came back, at first; he lent his father money toward one more tavern, at Eutaw and Lombard, and one winter he worked behind the Bar. The sudden death in 1918 of G. H. Ruth, Sr., occurred just off the premises. That bar is still there. And in October, 1914, in Ellicott City, the Babe was married to a 17-year-old Boston waitress. In 1916, they went to live in Boston.

On occasion, particularly for exhibition games against the Orioles, he came briefly back to Baltimore. Playing for the Red Sox, at Oriole Park, Friday, April 18, 1919, Ruth hit four homers in one game. His last visit was in July, 1948, for an Interfaith Game that was then rained out. A month later, wasted with cancer, he was dead—"the most colorful figure ever to appear on the American sports scene".

His sister, Mrs. Wilbur Moberly, lives in Williamsport, Maryland. Nieces are his only other kin. His wives have died, and his stepdaughters live elsewhere. Many of his trophies are in the National Baseball Hall of Fame and Museum, at Cooperstown, New York. But Baltimore made him what he was, and he was the greatest of them all.

CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE VIGIL FOR 1990

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I was recently given an appeal petition on behalf of Lev Milman, a Jewish refusnik who resides in Moscow. Although Mr. Milman has applied to leave the Soviet Union so that he may live with his daughter Maria, who lives in Massachusetts, he has been refused clearance status because of his alleged possession of state secrets. Donna Bloustein, an attorney in Miami, affirms that Mr. Milman was never employed in a confidential relationship and never possessed state secrets. Since his date of last employment was in 1975, any knowledge which he might have possessed would be long obsolete.

Lev Milman served as a major in the Soviet Army between the years 1941 and 1945, and was much decorated for his combat activities. After he left the army, he was employed in the ministry of ship building until his retirement in 1979. At present, Mr. Milman suffers from glaucoma and has lost his vision in his left eye and has only partial vision in his right eye. As well, he suffers from a hearing condition, and is generally in impoverished health.

Lev Milman's daughter, wife and son have been given clearance to leave the Soviet Union while Mr. Milman has been refused the right to emigrate. By this plea, I appeal to the Soviet Government to grant an immediate exit visa to Lev Milman and to allow his wife Lia and his son Alexander, out of the Soviet Union so that they can experience what life is all about.

A SUCCESSFUL DRUG BUST IN WOONSOCKET, RI

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Ms. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend the local and Federal law enforcement officers who took part in yesterday's drug raid in Woonsocket, RI. Drugs and drug related crime are pervasivie problems, which threaten to cripple our country. I am very glad to see that we are making a difference in Rhode Island.

The raid netted a pound of cocaine, approximately $30,000, at least nine firearms and five arrests. The operation also involved approximately 100 officers, including 10 officers from the Drug Enforcement Administration, 60 agents of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, agents of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, and officers from the Attorney General's Statewide Narcotics Task Force.

I understand that Woonsocket Detective Omer Frappier was also very instrumental in setting up the successful raids, which was accomplished without injury. Detective Frappier posed as a rent collector in order to gain firsthand knowledge of the local drug trade.

This raid effectively terminated a drug ring that had earned approximately $120,000 a week in cocaine sales. I congratulate the officers who participated in yesterday's successful drug raid in Woonsocket. It is visible and effective operations like this one that will help us take back the streets from drug criminals.

IN PRAISE OF WHEELERSBURG, OHIO'S GARY CLINGER

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, those people who make the effort to learn various lifesaving techniques—the Heimlich maneuver, CPR and similar measures—are truly special people. These individuals are decidedly unindividualistic and unselfish. They go to the trouble of mastering a skill which admittedly, and hopefully, they will never need to use.

Periodically, though, the awful occasion of emergency arrives, when a person in danger needs immediate assistance. That is when we can all be thankful for the people who have cared enough for their families, friends, and fellow citizens to learn critical lifesaving techniques.

Accidents rarely occur at opportune moments or in convenient places. Trouble knows no schedule or boundary, and medical and emergency professionals cannot be everywhere at once. In their absence, who can step in to help rescue or stabilize a victim in peril? The answer is: Anyone, thanks to CPR. This and other lifesaving methods empower ordinary nonmedical people to do some very extraordinary things when a life is on the line.

The following newsstory appeared on page 1 of the December 27, 1989 edition of the Portsmouth Community Common. It tells the story of Wheelersburg, Ohio's Gary Clinger, who recently stepped into an emergency situation and gave the most precious of all gifts—the gift of life. From Gary, we recognize that, through training, we can all meet a potential danger head on and overcome it.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully ask you to join me in urging our colleagues to note the importance of lifesaving training, and pay special heed to thier recent use by Gary Clinger, who was ready when the prospect of disaster suddenly loomed.

Here is the story from the Community Common:

LOCAL MAIL CARRIER HELPS SAVE LIFE OF SMALL CHILD DURING MAIL DELIVERY

(By Karen L. Hill)

Gary Clinger, a mail carrier and five-year employee for the Portsmouth Post Office, was recently honored for his life-saving techniques that he used in reviving a small child while delivering news on his route Tuesday, Nov. 14.

Clinger was in the 1700 block of Robinson Avenue delivering mail at a residence when a teenage girl came running out of the door past him. The mother of the small child came running out behind her with the child in her arms, giving the child to Clinger, saying, "Do something—it's not breathing!"

At first, Clinger just stood there in disbelief. "I turned the child over and hit it on the back with no results, then I tried the Heimlich Maneuver with no luck. I laid the child down on the porch and checked to see if there was an obstruction in its mouth, not finding anything. I noticed that the baby was congested and running a fever. I blew air into its mouth, not covering its nose and the congestion came out. The child still wasn't breathing, so I covered its nose, and blew more air into its lungs. This time it worked," Clinger said.

He continued, "I took the child into the house and kept its mouth close to my ear to make sure that the child continued to breath, while we waited for the ambulance to arrive (the teenager had gone to call for help)."

Gary learned CPR techniques while he was in the Army in the late 60's. "I just thought about what I could do to make the child breath and did what I could," he said. "You remember the steps that you're taught during CPR training, and I just kept trying til one of them worked."

He is the father of two, a 16-year-old daughter, Traci, who resides with him in Wheelersburg, and a 10-yar-old son, Gary, who resides in Portsmouth.

"Everybody is making such a big deal out of this—I was just glad I could do something for the child—if anything like that ever happened to my kids I'd want someone to be around to help them, too," he said.

NASA ASTRONAUT FROM COLORADO

HON. JOEL HEFLEY

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. HEFLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is my great pleasure today to recognize an outstanding graduate from my home State of Colorado. Marsha S. Ivins received her bachelor of science degree in aerospace engineering from the University of Colorado in 1973.

Since 1974, Ivins has been employed at the Lyndon B. Johnson Space Center, logging over 4,500 hours in civilian and NASA aircraft. Until 1980, Marsha was assigned as an engineer in the crew station design branch, to work on orbiter displays, controls and man machine engineering. She participated in the development of the orbitor head-up display [HUD].

In 1980, she became a flight simulation engineer on the shuttle training aircraft and was selected by NASA in May 1984. She became an astronaut in June 1985, qualified for assignment as a mission specialist on future space shuttle flight crews.

Committed to excellence, Marsha holds several licenses, including a single engine airplane, land, sea, commercial licenses and multiengine and glider flight instructor ratings.

Former assignments include astraunaut support for orbitor test and checkout at the cape, crew support for orbitor launches, landings and capsule communicator [CapCOM] in mission control.

Ivins has just returned from an incredible mission on the crew of STS-32. Launched on January 9, they returned on January 20, 1990 after successfully deploying the SynCOM IV-5 satellite and retrieving the long duration exposure facility.

It is truly an honor for Colorado, as well as the entire United States to have such wonderful, intelligent astronauts as Marsha Ivins, to voyage into space and return, educating our universe.

AUTOMOBILE INFORMATION DISCLOSURE ACT

HON. THOMAS E. PETRI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing a bill which I first introduced last Congress to include light trucks in the labeling requirements of the Automobile Information Disclosure Act.

In March 1988, I received a letter from Mr. and Mrs. Toshner of Fond du Lac, WI. They wrote about their experiences buying a pickup truck the year previously. Only after they had purchased the truck did they discover that they had been misled about optional versus standard equipment, costing them a quite a bit of money. They found out that manufacturers, are not required to provide the same information as they do on cars. So they wrote to ask me to introduce a bill that would require the same window display stickers to be placed on light trucks as cars.

When Congress passed the Automobile Information Disclosure Act in the late 1950's, light trucks were not nearly as popular as they are today. By 1987, however, they accounted for one-third of all passenger vehicles sold. It's time we required the same disclosures for these vehicles as we do for cars.

My bill simply adds light trucks to the existing Automobile Information Disclosure Act. I urge my colleagues to support this measure.

A TRIBUTE TO HON. FRANK YOUNG, M.D.

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, recently, members of the food and drug industry joined the Nation's health leaders to honor former Commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, Dr. Frank E. Young. The tribute dinner was much deserved. I have served nearly 28 years in the Congress. I can state unequivocally that Dr. Young stands alone in his exemplary execution of our food and drug laws, and in the leadership he provided—in many ways pioneered—in important areas of food and drug related issues affecting public health and safety.

Of course, when Dr. Young first arrived in his new post in July of 1984, I had no doubts as to the great ability and determination he would bring with him to the Food and Drug Administration. You see, I know Dr. Young personally. I have known him for more than 25 years. He is from the Upstate New York congressional district that I represent. People in Rochester take particular pride in Dr. Young and his work, both as Commissioner of the FDA, as well as in his previous association with the University of Rochester where he worked so ably as the Dean of the University's medical school. Truly, Frank Young is a "favorite son" of Rochester, NY.

Putting my personal friendship with Dr. Young aside, it was a great privilege for me to work with him so closely on issue of public health and safety. As ranking minority member of the House Government Operations Committee, I and my colleagues on both sides of the aisle depended on him for counsel and input on issues ranging from drug tampering and food contamination to substantive policy discussions on how to deal with the deadly disease AIDS. In all instances Frank Young proved the consummate professional—knowledgeable, effective in his communication, willing to listen to others, and able to forge positive results from sometimes conflicting viewpoints.

Dr. Young was the right man at the right time for a very tough job. His appointment came at a crucial state in the FDA's history—a time marked by rising consumer demands, dramatic technological breakthroughs, an ever-widening AIDS epidemic, and determined legislators seeking to expand FDA's mandate at every turn—all in the face of dwindling resources. Many people would have shied away from such an awesome task. But Dr. Young's passion for personal challenge and belief in public service made the opportunity to lead one of the finest consumer protection organizations throughout the world irresistible.

In his over 5 years as Commissioner, Dr. Young's bold leadership and commitment to the long-term welfare of the FDA became his trademark. Almost from the beginning of his tenure, it was apparent that Dr. Young would not settle for the status quo. His energetic, aggressive style helped to reduce wasteful government practices and unleash the genius of the American enterprise system from the burdens of unnecessary regulation. Dr. Young also led the fight to conserve scarce Federal resources, enabling FDA to respond to the most serious health problems facing the country.

A prime example was FDA's effective response to two events which dominated the Nation's headlines and held American consumers captive: the 1986 tampering incidents involving Tylenol and the discovery in 1989 of cyanide-laced fruit. Thanks to Dr. Young and the professionals at FDA, the risk to American consumers was negligible in both instances and user confidence in the affected products was quickly restored.

As a progressive public health administrator, Dr. Young realized the value of sound forward planning to insure that the agency's specific risk assessment and management and enforcement capabilities keep pace with the weighty challenges of the next century. Accordingly, Dr. Young established a process of action planning aimed at revitalizing the agency, bringing its priorities into sharp focus and increasing the efficiency of internal produce review procedures to meet the needs of the high tech age in which we live.

As a clinician and scientist, Dr. Young realized the importance of expediting the development and availability of new drugs for the desperately ill. To this end, he revamped FDA regulations to get promising new drugs into the hands of clinicians to treat patients with life-threatening diseases and no alternative therapies. He also spearheaded the development of a plan to significantly reduce the time required for clinical testing of innovative drugs for diseases that placed people's lives in jeopardy or adversely affected their quality of life.

In the area of AIDS, Dr. Young demonstrated courage and compassion. He created a "fast track" mechanism for approving pioneer drugs in order to relieve the human suffering associated with this terrible disease. These included AZT, gancyclovir, and aerotherapies under certain use conditions. He approved four drugs and biological products for wide scale commercial use, and granted market clearance for 12 tests to detect the presence of the HIV virus in human blood.

Dr. Young's accomplishments span an additional number of important areas such as biotechnology, food safety, information labeling on food products, medical device safety, and a host of others. And although Dr. Young embraced the goal of more sensible and well-targeted regulation, he demontrated equal resolve in carrying out his agency's health protection responsibilities.

For example, during Dr. Young's tenure, the FDA responded to a record high number of reports of contaminated food, while conducting an all-time high number of inspections of imported foods and drugs. He also strengthened FDA's inspection program for the Nation's blood banks to ensure the safety of the blood supply, and upgraded the quality control of certain blood barrier products to protect consumers and health professionals from contracting HIV.

All in all, it's a truly impressive record. So, as Dr. Young assumes his new role in the HHS office of the Assistant Secretary for Health, it is fitting that all Americans salute his record of excellence as FDA Commissioner. We can all rest assured that his mark on the agency will have a lasting and profoundly positive affect on the future work of this most valued institution. My hat goes off to you, Frank, for a job well done. I look forward to working with you in your new assignment and I offer you my very best wishes for the future.

HONORING DR. RUSSELL B. SCOBIE

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, the month of February is the month that many Americans think of our rich cultural heritage. The birthdays of the two greatest Americans—George Washington and Abraham Lincoln—afford us with the opportunity to reflect on the services that many others perform for the good of their community and the good of the Nation.

Annually, the Historic Newburgh Organization in Orange County, NY, uses the occasion of Washington's Birthday to pay homage to individuals who had a genuine impact upon our mid-Hudson region.

This year, their honoree is a gentleman whose accomplishments are beyond question.

Dr. Russell B. Scobie was one of the pioneers of the efforts to flouridate our water supplies. In 1944, he was the instigator of the famous flouridation study in Orange County, NY, upon which our scientific knowledge of the benefits of flouridation became known. Since that pioneer effort nearly a half a century ago, Dr. Scobie has presented papers and lectures throughout the world to promote the idea of flouridation. These trips which were made throughout the past four decades were made by Dr. Scobie at his personal expense. He received no remuneration—not even for travel expenses.

Largely through his efforts, the tragedy of tooth decay has been reduced or virtually eliminated in many regions on our Earth, including the underdeveloped nations of the Third World. Many years ago, Dr. Vladamir Rudko, director of the World Health Organization [WHO] presented Dr. Scobie with that organization's report on flouridation in Geneva, Switzerland. Dr. Rudko had autographed the book-length report: "To Dr. Russell Scobie—you contributed the most to water flouridation—we are trying to continue it!"

Dr. Scobie is a graduate of Yale University and the Yale School of Medicine. He has practiced pediatrics in Orange County, NY, since 1936, and although he is now 86 years young, he still continues his active practice.

Dr. Scobie founded the Yale Alumni Club of the mid-Hudson Valley, and has remained active in many community endeavors, including Rotary International. He has received many honors throughout the years; however, his accomplishments in initiating the flouridation of water have greatly gone unheralded.

Accordingly, the selection of Dr. Russell B. Scobie as the 1990 honoree of the Historic Newburgh Organization is extremely appropriate, for here is a man who truly "made a difference." Historic societies from throughout Orange County and the mid-Hudson region will join with the many friends, loved ones, and admirers of Dr. Scobie on February 22 as they honor this truly great man.

Mr. Speaker, I invite all of our colleagues to join in congratulating Dr. Russell B. Scobie, his wife Katherine, and their twin children Robert and Barbara, for a job well done.

LINDA COMER, PRINCIPAL OF LINCOLN ELEMENTARY

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to a constituent and very special friend, Linda Comer, the principal of Lincoln Elementary School in Kalamazoo, MI. The Kalamazoo Gazette recently extended well-deserved editorial recognition to Linda for the special contribution she has made to her community through her commitment to children and their eduction.

Linda, a teacher and reading specialist before becoming an administrator 13 years ago, brings great vitality to her job. A great many students as well as their parents and teachers, declare confidently that "Lincoln is the best school in the Kalamazoo public school system." They credit Linda's positive attitude with changing the perception of Lincoln as just another aging school into Lincoln as a very special and dynamic place.

Linda's creativity shines through her school's innovative programs. The school science fair, a performing arts department, a mentor program involving local college students, and a spell-a-thon fundraising for school projects—these are a few of the immensely successful projects that she has encouraged. She can also frequently be found participating in activities during school recess and bringing students to dinner or sporting events in recognition of their good behavior and performance.

Linda Comer's concern for students and teachers does not end with the end of the school day. She has a hand in a wide variety of community activities including the metropolitan Kalamazoo NAACP's annual freedom fund dinner, and a tutorial program at Mount Zion Missionary Baptist Church.

I feel privileged to have known Linda Comer these past several years. Her constant enthusiasm, her innovative ideas, her sense of fairness, and her dediction of public education have earned her the respect of students, parents, and teachers.

CELEBRATION OF LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. PETER J. VISCLOSKY

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. VISCLOSKY. Mr. Speaker, every year at this time, I address my House colleagues to bring their attention to the plight of the Lithuanian people who have suffered under the operative regime of the Soviet Union.

On February 16, 1990, the world will observe the 72d anniversary of the establishment of the Lithuanian Republic. On this day, Lithuanians in all parts of the globe will commemorate their struggle for independence. Clearly, the recent events in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe make all of us who sympathize with our Lithuanian brethren optimistic that perhaps this is the year that they will live in real freedom.

As we look to the future, we cannot forget the past.

On February 16, 1918, the Lithuanian National Council declared the independence of Lithuania. In so doing, the Republic of Lithuania was established. The restoration of Lithuania's sovereignty was recognized around the world—even by the Soviet Union just 2 years later. Lithuania joined the League of Nations in 1921, and for the next two decades Lithuanians enjoyed liberty and self-determination under a government that fostered political and religious freedom for all citizens.

Then, in June 1940, 1 year after the signing of the Molotov-Robbentrop Pact, the Soviet Union invaded and illegally occupied Lithuania as well as the other Baltic States. The United States unequivocally condemned this violation. We have never recognized the forcible incorporation of Lithuania into the Soviet Union, and we never will.

I am proud to note that the First District of Indiana, which I represent, has a large Lithuanian population. From this association, I know that they are a strong and justifiably proud group who have enriched our community. On February 18, the annual Lithuanian freedom dinner will be held at the St. Casimir Parish in Gary, IN. It is my fervent hope that next year's dinner will be held to honor the newly established independence of Lithuania.

THE INTERNATIONAL ENVIRONMENT

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Foreign Affairs Newsletter for January 1990 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE INTERNATIONAL ENVIRONMENT

Protection of the environment is emerging as a central international issue of the 1990s. It is a key concern in Eastern as well as Western Europe, and in foreign assistance programs for the developing world. Now on the agenda of most international meetings, environmental protection will require growing attention from policymakers in the coming years.

Pollution and development are damaging the world's resource base—the atmosphere, the oceans, the tropical rain forests, Antarctica, and the earth's rich diversity of plant and animal life. Population growth will create even more pressure on the planet's limited resources. In 1989 alone, world population increased 90 million to 5.2 billion. The United Nations projects 8.5 billion by 2025.

A review of some of the key environmental problems we face is sobering:

Global warming. Many scientists believe the earth's temperature is rising more rapidly than at any other time in history. Gases produced by the burning of fossil fuels trap the sun's returning rays like the glass of a greenhouse. Temperatures could rise by 3-4 degrees by the middle of the next century. This would change climate patterns and raise the level of the world's oceans. Many coastal cities, as well as countries such as the Netherlands and Bangladesh, could be inundated.

Acid precipitation: Caused primarily by polluting emissions from coal-fired power plants and factories, acid rain and snow destroy forests, poison lakes and rivers, and damage buildings. Effects are often felt beyond the borders of the countries where the emissions originate.

Ozone depletion: The release of man-made chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs), used as chemical solvents and cooling agents, is destroying ozone in the upper atmosphere. Ozone depletion permits larger amounts of ultraviolet radiation to reach the earth, threatening human health and damaging major food crops, and aquatic vegetation.

Tropical deforestation: 54 acres of tropical forest are lost per minute. This alarming rate of destruction poses three major problems. First, tropical forests are home to 50-80% of the world's plant and animal species. Deforestation threatens the existence of thousands of these precious species, many of which have untapped potential for agriculture, medicine, and industry. Second, deforestation may contribute up to 25% of the annual increase in carbon dioxide levels, contributing to possible global warming. Third, economic development at the cost of the rain forests depletes the vital local resource base.

To address these issues, a change in our definition of economic growth is in order. We need to embrace the concept of "sustainable development" in which economic growth does not deplete the resource base upon which future generations depend. This will require unprecedented cooperation between developing and developed countries. The U.S., which consumes a disporportionate share of the world's resources, should provide the leadership.

International negotiations have had some success, but are only opening skirmishes in the battle to save the planet. A 1987 agreement to protect the ozone layer by calling on industrialized countries to cut the use of CFCs in half by 1999 provides a useful model for international action. But such efforts will only be successful with the cooperation of all major nations.

Global warming negotiations have been more difficult. In November, the U.S. blocked an international agreement to freeze carbon dioxide emissions at curent levels by the year 2000. The Bush Administration claimed scientific data was not conclusive and that action should not be taken until a UN-sponsored panel publishes its report in June, 1990.

International organizations can play a key role in promoting environmental responsibility. The 1989 meeting of the UN General Assembly laid the groundwork for an accord between rich and poor countries on stabilizing the earth's climate. Pressure from Congress has encouraged the World Bank and other multilateral banks to pay increased attention to the environmental impact of their loan proposals.

Many less developed countries resent attempts by developed countries to restrict their economic growth. The U.S. should take the lead in setting up a technology transfer program to help poor countries achieve sustainable economic growth and avoid the mistakes of past industrialization. We should offer economic incentives in the form of debt-for-nature swaps, in which a country's debt burden is reduced in return for preservation of natural resources. We should support international family planning programs which seek to control the population explosion.

Many countries have already begun to tackle their environmental problems. Brazil recently reduced several subsidies that encouraged rain forest destruction. Nongovernmental organizations have arranged debt-for-nature swaps in Bolivia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, and the Philippines. West Germany has committed to cutting CFC production by 95% by 1995.

As well as acting on the international level, we need to put our own house in order. We need to reorder our foreign assistance program to integrate environmental concerns, balancing the needs of growth and sustainability of the resource base. Proposed Clean Air Act legislation seeks to further reduce major air pollutants, establish an acid rain program, and introduce innovative pollution control approaches. We need to improve our energy efficiency, speed transition to energy sources that use less carbon dioxide, and reduce subsidized logging on public lands. The U.S. cannot solve the problem of environmental degradation by itself. But its size and importance assure that it can have a major impact on the world environment.

The world's ecological systems are in trouble. We need to redefine our national security priorities to preserve the earth. The immediate costs are considerable and some scientific uncertainty remains, but my sense is that we have delayed long enough and the costs will be far greater in the future. The health of the planet in the next century, even its survival, could depend significantly upon what we do now.

AN ASSET TO THE COMMUNITY RETIRES

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join with me in recognizing a woman who has served her community in my district for three and a half decades.

Vivian Mader, of Grantville, PA, will retire after 35 years from the U.S. Postal Service at the end of February. For the last 17 of those years, she has served in the capacity of Postmaster at the Grantville Post Office. To have such a position of responsibility in what is the greatest postal service in the world is no small task. And Vivian Mader has made no small contribution to Pennsylvania.

Vivian has been awarded numerous commendations and held positions reflecting exemplary service: 1983 Postmaster of the Year, State legislative chairman of the National League of Postmasters, director of the Dauphin County Branch of National Association of Postmaster Association.

She has worked with scores of civic and community organizations, including the Cancer Society, Brownie and Girl Scouts, the Manada Hill United Methodist Church, Cub Scouts, the Volunteer Fire Company Auxiliary, and the PTA, to name just a few.

I express my gratitude and my congratulations to Vivian Mader and know that all my colleagues and constituents join me in thanking her for a job well done.

THE VA EMPLOYEE RETIREMENT EQUITY ACT

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to place part-time employees of the Department of Veterans Affairs' [VA] Health Services and Research Administration [HSRA], formerly the Department of Medicine and Surgery, on an equal footing with all other part-time Federal employees. Part-time doctors and nurses of the VA hospital system—so-called title 38 employees—now receive less in retirement pension benefits than all other part-time Federal employees. That is simply unfair, and, if not corrected, will lead to poorer quality medical care for veterans who rely on our commitment to care for them through the VA system.

Discrimination against part-time doctors and nurses in the VA system is the result of a 9-year tug-of-war over efforts to reduce the pension benefits of the Reagan years. The appendix below lists the various laws passed and then changed by Congress affecting the retirement pensions of these title 38 employees over the last several years.

THE BILL

The bill I am introducing today would address the inequity in the treatment of part-time medical personnel of the VA by simply striking the section of law which treats part-time title 38 employees differently, for the purposes of pension computation, from all other Federal workers. The result of this change would be to apply the same retirement pension formula to part-time title 38 employees as is currently applied to other part-time Federal employees. Under my bill, title 38 employees would receive credit for their full-time equivalent salary and have part-time service prorated just as they do today. However, my bill would apply the same formula to title 38 employees as currently applies to all other part-time Federal workers by grandfathering part-time service performed before April 7, 1986.

There is no good basis for treating part-time employees of the VA differently than part-time workers in other Federal agencies. The 27,000 part-time doctors and nurses of our veterans' health system deserve a retirement formula as generous as that offered to all other Federal employees. Swift passage of the VA Employee Retirement Equity Act would send a strong message to the part-time workers of the HSRA that their service to this country's veterans has been appreciated. I encourage my colleagues to join me in support of this important measure.

APPENDIX

P.L. 96-330 (Sec. 114, Veterans' Administration Health-Care Amendments of 1980): Amended Title 38, Sec. 4109, to use the full-time equivalent of high-3 pay, with the pension prorated for the portion of time actually worked during all years employed. Proration of service would be applied to service retrospectively and prospectively.

P.L. 96-385 (Sec. 508, Veterans' Disability Compensation and Housing Benefits Act of 1980): In response to criticism of applying the new formula to service before enactment of P.L. 96-330 (retrospectively), this law included a "technical amendment" to 96-330 that was intended to make it prospective only. However, this amendment "made the possibility of a part-time Department of Medicine and Surgery employee receiving a disproportionate annuity a certainty."

P.L. 97-72 (Sec. 402, Veterans' Health Care, Training, and Small Business Loan Act of 1981): Repealed the technical amendment included in P.L. 96-385 and restored section 4109 of Title 38 to the way it was as amended by P.L. 96-330.

P.L. 99-272 (Sec. 15204, Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985): Changed the retirement formula for all part-time Federal workers to include full-time equivalent high-3 pay, but prorated the pension for the portion of time actually worked. The law "grandfathered" part-time service before enactment (April 6, 1986), allowing such service to be credited as full time. Repealed section 4109(b) of Title 38, which provided separate treatment of Title 38 part-time employees. Resulted in some employees (those who would not have switched to full-time employment in the last 3 years before retirement) receiving a "windfall" for part-time work before April 6, 1986, since full-time work credit would be given for that service.

P.L. 99-509 (Sec. 7003, 1986 Omnibus Budget Reconciliation): Removed Title 38 employees from P.L. 99-272, thereby leaving them under P.L. 96-330; applies proration of service both retrospectively and prospectively for part-time work in the Department of Medicine and Surgery of the Veterans' Administration, thus treating retirement credit for these part-time Veterans' Administration employees differently from other part-time Federal employees.

A TRIBUTE TO TWO GOOD AND DECENT AMERICAN CITIZENS

HON. JOE KOLTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today before the full U.S. House of Representatives to bring to your attention and to honor, as I have done on occasion, two good and decent American citizens of my 4th Congressional District in Pennsylvania.

Many of the citizens of this Nation work hard all of their lives supporting their families and performing valuable functions in the community but are never publicly recognized because they do not have the resources to become active in public endeavors.

Today I honor two such individuals, Eugene and Ida DePaul of Ellwood City, who are celebrating their 60th wedding anniversary. Eugene, born in 1909, and Ida (Motta), born in 1911, were married January 9, 1930.

Eugene, a retired supervisor at Matthews Conveyor Co., Ellwood City, together with Ida, have also provided a caring home for Elsie Motta, Ida's 75-year-old sight-impaired sister.

Such exceptional citizens as the DePauls' are the rule rather than the exception in western Pennsylvania. Yet the DePauls' are to be commended for solid citizenship, solid work, patience, and spirit, and for contributing to the great moral fiber and strength of this Nation. Mr. Speaker, that is why I rise to honor this couple before the full House today.

THE IMPORTANCE OF BLACK HISTORY MONTH

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, in the conclusion of Martin Luther King's "I Have a Dream" speech, he envisioned the United States as a place where all of God's children, black men and white men, Jews and gentiles, Protestants and Catholics, will be able to join hands in unity and celebrate their freedom. Clearly, Dr. King grasped the essence of our Constitution, professing that it is the source of unity and freedom for all men, no matter what their race, creed, or culture. As we stand at the dawn of this new decade, being witness to dramatic calls for freedom across the globe, we should recognize how fortunate we are in this fine country to possess our freedom. We are also responsible to nourish this freedom and avoid any selfishness that would prove detrimental to its cause. We should also reflect upon Dr. King's movement, and realize the importance to pursue this dream and tear down the walls of racism that still exist. In celebration of Black History Month, we are called to remember the rich history of black America, and the tremendous contributions such as those made by Dr. King. It is important for all Americans to make the effort and learn about this aspect of American history; for through this knowledge, we are able to understand the many struggles which had to occur to strengthen the fabric of this great Nation.

Black history in the United States, is full of struggle and triumph; figures such as George Washington Carver, Booker T. Washington, Frederick Douglass, and Jackie Robinson are just a few of the many leaders who have contributed to this tremendous history. However, the history goes beyond these relatively recent years; even before 1619 when the Africans first set foot on American soil, African history provided an equally as rich culture and tradition and it is this history which has enhanced the already rich history of black Americans.

Through our unity as Americans, we should all recognize that through the knowledge of black history, the struggles endured and the triumphs achieved, will inspire future generations to avoid obstacles that may be encountered on the road to freedom. And as we stand at the dawn of this decade, we must recognize all calls for freedom; having this awareness and through remembering all past struggles for freedom, we will all arrive in the promised land as Dr. King envisioned.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1990

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, today I am joining with over 150 of my colleagues from both parties and from both Houses of Congress in introducing the Civil Rights Act of 1990.

This legislation is necessary to prevent this Nation from beginning a retreat from the goal of equal justice and equal opportunity for all of our people, regardless of race, color, sex, religion, or national origin.

I have served in the Congress since 1963, and, for more than a quarter century, Congress, the courts, and a consensus of the American people have marched together toward that goal of fulfilling the American promise of liberty and justice for all.

But last year, the Nation's highest court broke ranks with that consensus and broke faith with that national commitment, and, in a series of decisions, denied millions of Americans the protection of civil rights laws dating back to the 1960's and even to the 1860's.

Let me briefly summarize the most untenable and unconscionable of these decisions.

First. One of the Nation's oldest civil rights laws, known as section 1981 of the Federal Code, constitutes the only legal recourse against discrimination available to millions of employees not protected by title VII.

Last summer, in its decision in Patterson versus McLean Credit Union, the court rewrote this historic civil rights law to deny workers protection against racial harassment, racial discrimination, and racially motivated firings. The court narrowed the protections of this law to defend workers against discrimination only during the hiring process itself but not after they are on the job.

Second. Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 is the other major bulwark against discrimination in employment. In Wards Cove Packing Co., Inc., versus Antonio, the court overturned a unanimous Supreme Court decision written by former Chief Justice Warren Burger by watering down the business necessity defense so that employers can successfully defend discriminatory practices even if they are not essential to its business. The court also weakened title VII and undid 18 years of precedent by placing the burden of proof on the victims to show that an employer has no business necessity for employment practices with discriminatory effects. The burden of proof belongs on those who practice discrimination, not on those who suffer from it.

Third. Voluntary settlements of cases involving employment discrimination have served the interests of employers, employees, and the general public by avoiding years of costly and time-consuming litigation. But, in its decision in Martin versus Wilks, the court may actually have discouraged the settlement process by allowing challenges to these settlements years later by individuals who had notice at the time the settlements were agreed to.

In the 6 months that have passed since these decisions, the impact is clear: millions of Americans no longer can count on the courts to protect them against some of the most blatant forms of discrimination.

As the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund has reported, during the months since the decisions, the courts have dismissed 22 claims of racial harassment, 31 claims of racially motivated firings, and 16 claims of refusals to grant promotions or transfers because of race.

There are those who say these decisions are merely technical adjustments. There are those who say let us wait and see what the impact of these decisions will be. There are those who caution Congress not to act with unseemly haste.

But racial and sexual harassment are not technicalities; they are abominations. The dismissal of over one hundred cases involving discriminatory employment practices is not a technicality.

Americans who are denied a job can't afford to wait and see.

Americans who are denied the promotions they deserve or even fired maliciously and capriciously from their jobs can't afford to wait-and-see.

And the young people, from our inner cities to our rural communities, can't afford to wait-and-see whether America really will deliver on the promise of equal opportunity. Those who study hard and work hard, who live within the law and play by the rules, who say no to drugs and say yes to education, and who respect their parents and their teachers and their ministers, should have memories of a Supreme Court that opened the doors of opportunity, instead of slamming them shut.

These euphemisms for indifference and inaction were rejected by the great leaders of our times and by the great majority of Americans during successful struggles to pass the great civil rights legislation of the past three decades.

America is a better country because we as a people decided not to wait and see but to move forward toward the goal of eradicating discrimination in our factories and offices, in our schools, in our polling places, and in every sector of our national life.

It is important that we move forward, not backward; that we act decisively, not wait and see; and that we send the clear message to everyone, and especially to our young people, that hard work will be rewarded. Nowhere is this more important than in the workplace.

Over the past quarter century, we have begun to overcome centuries of systematic discrimination. Business and labor; local, State, and Federal Governments; the executive branch, Congress, and the courts—all have worked together. And the result has been that, of almost any sector of American life, the progress toward equality has been greatest in the workplace.

All this has been threatened by the recent Supreme Court decisions. And that is why the Civil Rights Act of 1990 restores the legal protections that made this progress possible:

First. We must—and, once again, we will—protect every American against discrimination and harassment on the job.

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 makes clear that an employee's rights to fair treatment on the job do not end once he or she has been hired. It amends section 1981 to reaffirm that the right "to make and enforce contracts" includes the making, performance, modification, and termination of contract, including the enjoyment of all benefits, terms, and conditions of the contractual relationship. Now is the time to protect every American against being harassed, fired, or otherwise discriminated against in their employment or other contracts because of their race.

Second. We must—and, once again, we will—require that discriminatory employment practices be necessary to the business, and we will place the burden of proof of business necessity on the shoulders of those who practice discrimination, not those who suffer from it.

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 provides that, once an individual proves that a practice has a discriminatory effect, the employer must then justify the practice by showing that it is necessary. Common sense dictates that employers, not employees, have ready access to information about their business practices; common decency dictates that the burden of providing business necessity belongs on the shoulders of the perpetrators, not the victims, of discrimination.

Third. We must—and, once again, we will make clear that job bias is always wrong and always illegal.

It is always immoral to make employment decisions for discriminatory reasons, such as racial stereotypes, and the Civil Rights Act of 1990 makes clear that such behavior is always illegal even if such decisions are based on nondiscriminatory reasons as well. And because the purpose of this legislation is to promote fairness, the Civil Rights Act of 1990 also makes clear that, in considering the appropriate relief for such discrimination, a court shall not order the promotion or hiring of a person not qualified for the position.

Fourth. We must—and, once again, we will—guarantee every American the right to challenge employment discrimination.

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 amends title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to provide everyone who has been a victim of intentional discrimination with the right to recover damages, including punitive damages against employers who act with malice or with reckless indifference to their employees' civil rights. By adding provisions for the recovery of damages, this section makes the remedies available under title VII for all forms of illegal discrimination—including discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex, or national origin—consistent with the remedies now available under other Federal laws covering only racial and ethnic discrimination.

More than a quarter century ago, I had the honor of serving as a freshman Member of Congress at the time when Congress was considering the Civil Rights Act of 1964. It was a time when the Congress—and the American people—searched their national soul, set aside the timid admonitions to wait and see, and set about the course of moving America forward to the fulfillment of its ideals.

Now, once again, it is time to search our national soul; it is time to set aside the timid admonitions to wait and see; it is time to set about the course of moving forward, not backward, to meet the challenges of a new era by upholding our oldest and most precious ideals.

Set forth below is a summary of the major provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1990:

SUMMARY OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1990

The following is a brief summary of the Civil Rights Act of 1990:

Protecting Americans Against Race Discrimination on the Job and in Private Contracts

Last year, in Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, the Supreme Court held that an 1866 statute barring intentional race discrimination in contracts (42 U.S.C. sec. 1981) does not prohibit racial harassment on the job and other forms of discrimination in the application of contracts. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 amends sec. 1981 to reaffirm that the right "to make and enforce contracts" includes the enjoyment of all benefits, privileges, terms and conditions of the contractual relationship. By reaffirming the broad scope of sec. 1981, Congress will ensure that Americans may not be harassed, fired or otherwise discriminated against in contracts because of their race. Because sec. 1981 is the only federal statute barring race discrimination that is applicable to the 3.7 million employers with fewer than fifteen employees, it is vitally important to restore its broad ban on racism in contractual dealings.

Restoring the Burden of Proof in Disparate Impact Cases

For eighteen years following Chief Justice Warren Burger's unanimous opinion for the Supreme Court in the landmark case of Griggs v. Duke Power Co., Title VII had placed on employers the burden of showing that employment practices with a "disparate impact," (i.e., that operate to exclude women and minorities disproportionately) are required by business necessity. Last year, in Wards Cove Packing Co. v. Atonio, the Court effectively overruled this Griggs rule and held that, no matter how strong the proof of discriminatory effect, the employer need no longer prove that its practices are required by business necessity. Instead, victims of discrimination must bear the heavy burden of proving that the employer has no legal justification for its exclusionary practices. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 restores the Griggs rule by providing that, once a person proves that an employment practice has a disparate impact, the employer must justify the practice by showing that it is based on business necessity.

Facilitating Prompt and Orderly Challenges to Consent Decrees and Court Orders

In Martin v. Wilks, a case involving a court-approved plan by the City of Birmingham to remedy past racial discrimination in its fire department, the Supreme Court held last year that whites who sat on the sidelines while the plan was being approved by the district court could later challenge it in a new lawsuit. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 guarantees notice to persons who might be adversely affected by a proposed court order, and a reasonable opportunity to challenge the order. But subsequent lawsuits challenging the court order will be barred except under certain unusual circumstances.

Making Clear that Job Bias Is Always Illegal

In Price Waterhouse v. Hopkins, the Supreme Court suggested that employment decisions motivated at least in part by prejudice do not violate the law if the employer can show after the fact that the same decision would have been made if it had not engaged in intentional discrimination. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 provides that any reliance on prejudice in making employment decisions is illegal, while making clear that, in considering the appropriate relief for such discrimination, a court shall not order the hiring or promotion of a person not qualified for the position.

Granting Women and Religious and Ethnic Minorities the Right to Recover Damages for Intentional Employment Discrimination Now Available to Racial Minorities

Under present federal law, victims of sexual, religious, or ethnic harassment who remain on the job have no effective remedy. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 closes this loophole by amending Title VII to grant any victim of intentional discrimination the right to recover compensatory damages, and, in egregious cases, punitive damages as well. The Act makes the remedies available for sex, religion and ethnic discrimination claims under Title VII the same as the remedies now available under sec. 1981 for racial discrimination.

Correcting Statutes of Limitation

In Lorance v. AT&T Technologies, the Supreme Court held that the statute of limitations for challenging discriminatory seniority plans begins to run when the plan is adopted, rather than when the plan is applied to an individual. As a result, persons who were laid off pursuant to discriminatory seniority plans may be barred from bringing suit before they even knew they would be dismissed. The Act overrules Lorance and permits persons to challenge discriminatory seniority plans when those plans actually harm them, rather than only when they are adopted. At the same time, the Act confirms that proof of discrimination in the adoption of the seniority plan that actually required the lay-off is required.

Restoring Fair and Effective Civil Rights Enforcement

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 also includes additional, technical provisions to ensure fair and effective civil rights enforcement and to address other Supreme Court decisions hampering initiation of antidiscrimination cases and recovery of attorneys' fees. These provisions extend the statute of limitations under Title VII and ensure that job bias victims will be able to obtain adequate legal assistance.

Reaffirming Generous Rules of Construction in Civil Rights Cases

The Act adopts rules of construction reaffirming the intention of Congress that civil rights laws must be construed generously, in order to provide effective remedies to eliminate discrimination.

The Bill Does Not Address The Scope of Race-Conscious Remedies

The Act specifically makes clear that it does not affect or change the law governing affirmative action and other race-conscious remedies. The Act does not mandate quotas in any fashion.

TRIBUTE TO VINNY PAZIENZA

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Ms. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, when Vinny Pazienza works with chronically ill children for "The Impossible Dream," he speaks to them about hope, courage, and determination. It is these same qualities that made Vinny a winner to his legion of Rhode Island fans last Saturday when he squared off against Hector Camacho.

In a sense, that's been the story of Vinny's career—Rhode Island's living example that with a little hard work, dreams can come true. When, after years of training, he won the world championship a few years back, it was as if all of Rhode Island had won, too. We could all identify with Vinny Paz—the local kid who had to scrap and scratch his way to the top, fighting the odds as well as opponents. And perhaps best of all, when he reached the top, he didn't forget his roots. He was always just Vinny Paz—the kid from Cranston we've come to call our own.

So, no matter that Vinny lost a tough decision to a three-time world champion. To those of us in Rhode Island who have followed Vinny in his wonderful career; to everyone who watched him pour his heart out in Atlantic City last week; and to his family and friends back home, he's still a champion. Our champion.

CHILD CARE

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, last week during his State of the Union Address, President Bush identified child care as a top priority for the 1990's. I would like to commend him for his leadership on this issue, and for his wisdom in leading Congress and the Nation in the right direction to properly address America's child care needs.

As President Bush indicated, our goal is not to institute a new Federal bureaucracy where Washington decides exactly what type of child care is best for a mother and child in Ohio. Our goal is not to discourage parents from sending their children to religious-based child care centers where they might be taught the traditional values that are important to many parents, such as myself. Our goal is not to encourage the breakup of the family by making it far more attractive for mothers to work rather than care for their children.

Rather, our goal is to treat equally the mother who works and the mother that stays at home. Our goal is to give the assistance directly to the family so that those who know best—the parents—can decide what kind of care their child should have. Our goal is to help children, mothers, and families, in that order.

I look forward to working with my colleagues to develop an acceptable package, and I hope those who share my views and the views of the President will be strong in pursuing our goals in helping America's families.

A SALUTE TO HERVE FILION

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of our colleagues the outstanding achievements of Herve Filion, one of the great harness racing drivers in all history.

Herve finished 1989 with his 800th driving win—an all-time record in the history of this great racing sport. As if this outstanding record were not enough, Herve Filion finished the 1989 season with a cumulative 12,000 career wins. Even the great Bill Shoemaker retired with less than 9,000 career wins.

Herve Filion has achieved these incredible records by working double-headers. Herve habitually reports for work in the early afternoon at Freehold Raceway in New Jersey, and then travels up the turnpike to work nights at Yonkers Raceway in New York.

Although he will become 50 years young this year, Herve has kept up this grueling pace since 1974, and shows no signs of wanting a rest. "If my health stays good, I'll keep driving until I'm 65—or maybe 70," Herve recently told the New York Times.

The same New York Times article went on to attest that Herve Filion is to harness racing "what Wayne Gretzky is to hockey, Kareem Abdul-Jabbar to basketball, and Walter Payton to football."

Mr. Speaker, I urge our colleagues to join in saluting a super athlete who has set the standards which those who follow will have to emulate.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit at this point in the RECORD an article which appeared in the December 15, 1989 issue of Harness Racing magazine which outlines the amazing career of an amazing athlete:

HERVE FILION—WHAT WILL THE 1990'S BRING?

To say that harness driver Herve Filion is like fine wine would be a huge understatement. And trying to figure out when he'll reach his prime is an even bigger mystery.

At age 49, when most athletes can only reflect on their careers, Herve Filion continues to rewrite harness racing's chronicles; giving new meaning to the term "getting better with age."

The Angers, Quebec native crossed the border in 1961, landing at Vernon Downs with just over 800 wins behind him and a bright future ahead of him. What he's accomplished nearly three decades later, and what he continues to build upon each day, is nothing short of the most untouchable record in sports history.

Filion enjoyed moderate success during the early part of the sixties at Vernon Downs. Eventually, he migrated to the Delaware Valley circuit, where he rewrote the record books at Brandywine and Liberty Bell Park while establishing himself as a fixture atop the driver standings at Freehold Raceway.

The seventies were to be Herve's decade. He would give new meaning to the term fulltime driving, spending his afternoons at Freehold and evenings at either Yonkers or Roosevelt. A look back at the seventies immediately after their conclusion would cause one to think that Filion had peaked during that decade. He started out registering his most successful season to date in both the dash wins and money category, driving 486 winners and banking over $1.6 million in 1979. He raised the single season win standard to 543 in 1971, 605 in '72, and 637 in '74. He ranked as the country's leading dash winning driver during eight of the decade's 10 years and his accomplishments hardly went unnoticed. Filion became the only harness driver to be honored with the Hickok Professional Athlete of the Month Award (1971), received the Lou Marsh trophy as Canada's top athlete and the Canadian Medal of Honor, both presented by Canadian Prime Minister Trudeau, and in 1975 was the youngest inductee ever into Harness Racing's Hall of Fame.

Filion slowed down in 1979, finishing the decade ranking third in the nation with 374 dash wins. However, he began the 1989's just as he had started off the decade prior. He drove 474 winners, 12 shy of his mark in 1970, and reclaimed the North American Dash Wins title. Filion won the title again in 1981 (404) and '82 (495) and in 1988, embarked upon a mission that would result in a mind-boggling season. He incessantly, chased down the single season world record of 770 wins and finished the campaign with a staggering 798 wins. 1989 has provided the ultimate exclamation point to yet another decade in which Filion appeared to reach his peak. As early as tonight, Filion could reach the 800 win mark for the season and before the year's out, it's likely he'll eclipse the 12,000 win milestone. His nearest competitor is over 5,000 wins shy and the leading thoroughbred jockey, Bill Shoemaker, has over 3,000 wins fewer.

What could Herve Filion possibly do for an encore in the 1990's? Well, if he reaches his prime, the results could be endless.

IN REGOGNITION OF RONNIE ROBINSON

HON. PETER J. VISCLOSKY

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. VISCLOSKY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a constituent from the First District of Indiana who is a paragon of courage and who deserves this body's recognition and respect. His name is Ronnie Robinson.

Ronnie is 10 years old and a fourth-grade student at the Orchard Drive Elementary School in Hammond, IN. He is a honor student who enjoys reading, science, and history, as well as such recreational activities as camping, swimming, music, and Nintendo. Ronnie sounds like many other youngsters who strive to do their best. However, he is notable because he excels even though he suffers from duchenne muscular dystrophy. This life-threatening disease is one of physical pain and emotional fatigue. The simple things in life that we all take for granted are a daily challenge to Ronnie. He has not been alone in his efforts—he has the love of his family, the support of his many friends, and the admiration of his whole community.

For the past several years, Ronnie has been the local poster child for northeast Indiana chapter of the Muscular Dystrophy Association. In this role, he has been an effective spokesperson and an influential fundraiser. Remarkably, Ronnie also serves as a honorary recruiter for the U.S. Air Force Squadron No. 3551 Flight "C." His dedication and desire have brought him the highest distinguished award that the USAF Recruiting Service can give to a civilian.

In this time when America's youth are too often depicted as uneducated, unmotivated, and uninvolved, Ronnie serves as a reminder that those characterizations are untrue. His spirit and determination serves as an inspiration to us all. I am honored to bring him to the attention of my colleagues in the House of Representatives.

STOPPING THE TRADE OF FOOD STAMPS FOR DRUGS AND CONTRABAND

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, it seems incredible, but the Food Stamp Program is now losing millions of dollars each year because food stamps are illegally traded for drugs, guns, stolen cars, and illegal contraband.

This growing underground economy promotes drug dealing and other illegal activity and cheats this program that is so essential to the needy.

To stop this wrongdoing I am today introducing with bipartisan support, the Food Stamp Trafficking Prevention and Penalty Act of 1990, to eliminate the loss of millions of dollars due to the trafficking of food stamps.

Currently, the penalties are so small, a maximum 5 years or $10,000 fine, that there is little to deter a corrupt individual from engaging in this illegal operation.

Food Stamps Act as a currency of the underground economy. Corrupt grocers are the ones contributing to this economy because they are the only ones who are able to redeem food stamps for cash. If they are stopped, the link to the underground economy will be broken and the purchases of drugs, guns, and stolen cars for food stamps will end.

The bill which I am proposing has three main objectives:

First, it would give food stamp traffickers the same penalties we give money launderers—A $500,000 fine and a 20-year prison sentence.

Second, it would set up a system to cross-check grocers to ensure that crooked ones do not get back into the program after they have been kicked out. Grocers would have to supply their employer identification number or Social Security number to USDA so this cross-checking can work.

Third, individuals convicted of this crime would be subject to Federal asset seizure and forfeiture so the Government could come in and seize the property attained from the illegal activity.

The proceeds from these fines and forfeited assets would reimburse the cost of the investigations and prosecutions to the State and Federal agencies. The remainder of the money would be directed back to the Food Stamp Program to feed more hungry people.

The problem of food stamp trafficking is a problem that is facing the entire country. In my own State of Oregon, police are busting drug houses and finding thousands of dollars in unredeemed food stamps, which are obviously being used as cash to buy drugs. Oregon gives out $12 million in food stamps per month. According to some USDA reports, up to 10 percent of these stamps are cashed fraudulently.

In Los Angeles, the Los Angeles Times reported that the owners of a grocery store were convicted of illegally trafficking in 1.6 million dollars' worth of food stamps. It was also reported that a grocery storeowner had been arrested for allegedly buying food stamps at cut rates and then turned the stamps over to the Federal Government for cash.

In Albuquerque, NM, police uncovered a black market food stamp operation when trying to catch car thieves. The investigators found that the customers of their sting operation wanted to purchase the stolen cars with food stamps.

In Kansas City, MO, a women pleaded guilty after an undercover police officer paid her $10,000 in food stamps for 32 ounces of PCP.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture reported that undercover agents in Charlotte, NC, exchanged over $125,000 in food stamps for large quantities of narcotics, stolen property, firearms, and about $23,000 in cash. Sixty-eight persons, including 16 owners or employees of retail stores authorized to be participants in the Food Stamp Program were charged with food stamp trafficking and drug-related charges.

Food stamp trafficking is on the rise. The office of the inspector general in Texas has reported that there has been an increase from 19 traffickers in the fiscal year 1987 to 86 traffickers in the fiscal year 1989.

I hope my colleagues will join me in cosponsoring the Food Stamp Trafficking and Penalty Act of 1990. This is our opportunity to put a stop to illegal food stamp trafficking before it reaches epidemic proportions.

A TRIBUTE TO MRS. JANET CAMPBELL

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to recognize Mrs. Janet Campbell, a resident of Missouri's Fourth Congressional District who was recently elected to serve as president of the Southern Medical Administration Auxiliary.

Mrs. Campbell, the wife of physician Dr. A.J. Campbell, lives in the city of Sedalia, MO. In November she came to Washington, DC to be installed as president of the Southern Medical Association Auxiliary. Ceremonies took place in the Caucus Room of the Cannon House Office Building. She will serve a 1-year term.

The Southern Medical Association Auxiliary is the second-largest multispecialty medical auxiliary in the Nation, with a membership which exceeds 46,000. Representing 17 States and the District of Columbia, the auxiliary promotes continuing education for physicians and encourages fellowship within the profession. The auxiliary also sponsors service projects in honor of Doctor's Day and works to preserve the history of the medical profession.

As president, Mrs. Campbell brings years of experience to the Southern Medical Association Auxiliary. She has been actively involved as a member and as an officer of several medical auxiliaries. Mrs. Campbell is past president of both the Missouri State Medical Association Auxiliary and the Pettis County Medical Society Auxiliary. We congratulate Mrs. Campbell on this latest honor and we wish her the best of luck during her term as president of the Southern Medical Association Auxiliary.

TRIBUTE TO JAY MATRICCIANI

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct pleasure to honor the outgoing president of the National Utility Contractors Association, Jay Matricciani. As chairman of the Public Works and Transportation Committee, I can attest to Mr. Matricciani's active representation on behalf of the interests of the underground utility construction industry before Congress and the administration. He testified before us on water and sewer funding issues, and substantially helped our efforts to raise the level of appropriations. These programs provide important benefits for the economic, environmental and employment needs of the Nation.

The third generation utility contractor from Baltimore, MD, has devoted much of his time and talent to an organization that is celebrating its 25th anniversary. During his tenure, Mr. Matricciani was certainly an able custodian who continued to enhance NUCA's history of pride and tradition.

Jay and I had the opportunity to talk about our days as former motorcycle racers. They were exciting times, but no more than the opportunity to actively participate in the workings of our democratic government. It's a pleasure to recognize the voluntary spirit of such individuals.

THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE, A LEADER IN NEWSPRINT RECYCLING

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I want to praise the leadership of the Chicago Tribune for their efforts to promote recycling of newsprint. Already, over 40 percent of the Tribune's annual newsprint comes from recycled newspapers.

Sixteen billion pounds of newsprint are thrown away each year. Our Nation's landfills are filled with old newspapers that have not decomposed. They are still legible and virtually undisturbed. It is clear that with landfill space disappearing, old news is not good news.

Meanwhile, the Japanese are recycling 95 percent of their newspapers. Does the United States need anymore indicators? I think not.

Farsighted companies such as the Chicago Tribune have met this challenge with ingenuity and conviction. They have shown a sense of corporate responsibility which is increasingly pervading the business community, responsibility which represents an investment in the future.

THE 15TH ANNIVERSARY OF MINUTEMAN PRESS

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, on February 26, Minuteman Press International, Inc., will celebrate its 15th anniversary. I take pride in noting that the corporation opened its first shops in the towns of Farmingdale and Plainview, in my Fourth Congressional District on Long Island.

Minuteman Press is a shining success story, an outstanding example of the entrepreneurial spirit that has made America great. After extensive research into the printing industry, the company's founder, Roy W. Titus, found a void in the printing industry between the capabilities of the large industrial printers and the black-and-white copy shop. Mr. Titus, in consultation with his staff and personnel from 3M and AM International, developed the Minuteman Press franchise package.

Minuteman Press offers through the sale of the franchise, an opportunity for businessmen to own and operate their own printing business. To date, the corporation has over 900 independently owned franchises across the United States and in three Canadian Provinces.

Minuteman Press and other businesses like it are the pride of Long Island and our Nation. I'd like to take this opportunity to congratulate the company and its many employees on this important occasion and offer my sincere thanks for its significant contributions to the betterment of Long Island's economy and local communities. Finally, I offer my best wishes for many more years of continued prosperity and success.

SPARE THE INSTITUTION

HON. GEORGE E. SANGMEISTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. SANGMEISTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend to my colleagues the writing of a highly respected constituent, a retired judge in my district. In these times of Congress-bashing, Judge Henry X. Dietch published an article entitled "A Congressman or So May Deserve Jibes—But Spare the Institution." It appeared in the Park Forest Star on January 7, 1990.

I ask that it be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that my colleagues may benefit from the judicious words of Judge Dietch.

REMARKES OF JUDGE HENRY X. DIETCH

In a democratic nation, the legislative body is a reflection of the will of the people—or at least it should be in theory—and in the long run it is.

In the very nature of any deliberative body, whether it be the P.T.A., a civic organization, a church board, or a union or trade association, it is often exasperating to reach a consensus. The pulling and hauling in every direction, the argumentative process itself and the presentation of diverse views is often a messy, frustrating, and exhausting process. Like a lasting, good and fruitful marriage, the eventual success is a product of compromise. Neither the husband nor the wife as individuals are victorious in their positions, but together they can reach viable solutions.

Thus when it becomes fashionable to mindlessly castigate Congress on its inaction on "our point of view" or our political agenda or our particular piece of legislation, we do a disservice to ourselves. I am not referring to constructive criticism, or the presentation of opposing views, but I do strenuously object to the vehemence as well as the ignorance of some of the destructive attacks on the Congress. Congressmen, like all human beings, have feet of clay with their foibles, their political necessities and their sectional allegiances.

The individual congressman, however, is not the institution as such, and when we confuse the two we are damaging both. The individual is dispensable but the institution is a necessity in a democratic government. Intemperance against the institution can eventually breed contempt and possible extinction of representative government.

The long view is a necessity in examining the worth of any institution. Democracy is a messy, earthy and practical process that has provided the best answer to governmental requirements in the history of mankind. It has had its ebbs and flows, its victories and its defeats, its noble as well as ignoble moments. It has, however been the only answer to the yearnings and aspirations of people throughout the ages. It is especially pertinent to the present events happening in all parts of the globe. Other peoples are in various stages of securing their "inalienable rights" through legislative bodies elected by and responsible to them. For our times, our civilization, our needs, there is obviously no other solution.

Denigrating our institutions, unless we have reached the point where we seek another form of government, is a pointless and unfulfilling exercise in self-hatred. Congress is now the focal point of the venomous attacks that are popular at this moment in the history of the American Republic. At other times, the presidency or the Supreme Court have been the field of battle. Congressmen, presidents and judges come and go. We must not confuse the actions of the individual with that of the office or the institution. To do otherwise imperils our form of government and puts all of us at risk in respect to our lives, our fortunes, our very existence as a nation.

Let us, then, act as intelligent creatures, voice our opinions in a proper manner, vote our conscience, but not tear down the very structure which gives us the basic building blocks of our way of life.

DR. DAVID A SANCHEZ, AN IMPRESSIVE LEADER FOR THE NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION'S MATHEMATICS AND PHYSICAL SCIENCES DIRECTORATE

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, the National Science Foundation is a major player on America's basic science and engineering research team. Other nations may be competing with us in terms of turning basic research into marketable products, but we are still unrivaled in basic research. That leadership is in large part due to NSF's track record of success and commitment.

Each year, the NSF's Mathematics and Physical Sciences Directorate funds over $500 million in projects that form the cornerstone of America's basic research efforts in high-technology, "cutting edge" fields such as high temperature superconductivity. Thus, it is with great pleasure that I congratulate Dr. David A. Sanchez, the vice president and provost at Lehigh University, who has recently been named to head the directorate.

Dr. Sanchez has been the chief academic officer at Lehigh University since 1986. He says that working at Lehigh, with its strong programs in science and engineering and high interaction with industrial technology, has been "an excellent preparation for the key position in the National Science Foundation which I will assume on June 1, 1990." Lehigh is moving forward in science and engineering education, which fits well with the national initiatives of the 1990's. Some of Dr. Sanchez's accomplishments in his tenure at Lehigh are a major improvement in the tenure and promotion system, and a project aimed at increasing the awareness of the important role that Lehigh Univerisity has in the community with respect to science education in the local schools.

Dr. Sanchez is a popular and successful administrator, who has a good relationship with students, faculty, and staff alike. He is an accomplished professor of mathematics, who has written numerous articles and books. Dr. Sanchez is prepared to make an immediate contribution to the foundation, since he has served on the NSF's advisory committee for mathematics and science for the last 3 years, and understands the programs which he will administer. I am particularly proud of Dr. Sanchez's unselfish attitude toward public service. According to him, becoming the head of the directorate is a "service to the scientific community" the he is "honored to perform." I wish Dr. Sanchez all the best in that endeavor.

EARTH DAY AND RECYCLING

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, the first Earth Day was celebrated in 1970 and led to an environmental grassroots movement which spread across this country. Millions of people gathered together to discuss the environmental problems of their cities, towns and States. Their support led to the creation of the Environmental Protection Agency and passage of the Clean Air Act and Clean Water Act in the early 1970's, as well as other landmark environmental legislation.

On April 22, 1990, we celebrate the 20th anniversary of Earth Day. It is estimated that more than 100 million people around the world will make a personal affirmation of their environmental commitment. We can once again expect a grassroots movement to come forth from Earth Day. Only this time it will be an even larger movement with an even larger agenda.

One of the issues that is sure to be a priority is that of municipal solid waste [MSW]. MSW is simply the waste that the people in this country create in our every day lives. Last year alone, there was an estimated 160 million tons of MSW generated. By the year 2000, it is estimated that this figure will increase to 190 million tons.

Currently, about 70 percent of NSW is disposed of in landfill sites. The problem is that these sites are reaching their capacity and have to be closed. The Environmental Protection Agency [EPA] has estimated that 80 percent of existing landfills will close within 20 years. New landfill sites are difficult to find, if for no other reason than public opposition.

One of several suggested solutions to this problem is to increase recycling efforts. In fact, there are a multitude of recycling programs in the pilot stage right now. For instance, Phoenix, AZ has undertaken an ambitious program to recapture useable materials.

The city of Phoenix estimates that over 50 percent of their MSW is recycable. Last year, as officials confronted landfills rapidly reaching capacity, and the proposition of a new landfill that is some 50 miles away from the city, they decided to pursue recycling as an option to address their waste disposal problems.

In March 1989, one area in each of the eight city council districts in Phoenix was targeted for recycling; 4,000 homes are currently participating in this pilot program.

The program is extremely simple. The city has provided each home with an additional garbage can. To differentiate the two kinds of trash, one can is blue and one green. In the "blue bucket," the participants of this program discard five recyclable commodities: paper, cardboard, glass, metal, and plastic. The green can gets everything else. It's that simple.

The city has always picked up trash twice a week. The only diffrence for the participants now is that on one day they put out their nonrecyclable trash in one bucket, and on the second collection day they put out their "blue bucket" containing recyclables.

The city then drops off the recyclable MSW at one of the churches in the city that has agreed to sort and sell the recyclables. It is my understanding that the church employs several people to manage this project and, while no one is getting rich, they are breaking even.

The city surveyed the participants after 9 months to see how they liked the program. Virtually all the participants think the program is a smashing success. Not only are 94 percent of them satisfied with the program, but over 95 percent of them believe the program is easy. I think just as important is the fact that 97 percent actually feel good about participating.

The city is soon to expand their program to 11,000 households.

Mr. Speaker, Earth Day will once again be a catalyst for environmental change. One of those changes must be the way in which we deal with this country's trash. It is high time that we put an end to the "throw away society."

TRIBUTE TO MERLE H. HILDEBRAND

HON. JOE KOLTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today before the full U.S. House of Representatives to recognize and pay special tribute to Merle H. Hildebrand of New Castle, PA, who is also the recent recipient of a special proclamation by the New Castle Sanitation Authority for his many years of outstanding service to the community of Lawrence County.

As an active citizen of New Castle, Mr. Hildebrand promotes the best interest of all who serve and have served in the authority. Ever since the sanitation authority was established in 1964, he has played a very active role. Mr. Hildebrand was secretary of the board as well as an original board member.

Mr. Hildebrand is an honorably discharged veteran of World War II. He has been an attorney in western Pennsylvania for 50 years and has provided great service as a distinguished and respected member of the Lawrence County Bar Association and Pennsylvania Bar Association. Following in a long line of political figures, Mr. Hildebrand was elected district magistrate of New Castle from 1970 to 1976.

I am proud, Mr. Speaker, to take this opportunity before the U.S. House to recognize and compliment Mr. Merle H. Hildebrand for his achievements as a distinguished and dedicated public servant.

SCHOOL-BUSINESS PARTNERSHIPS OF LONG ISLAND

HON. ROBERT J. MRAZEK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to acknowledge the tremendous success of the School-Business Partnerships of Long Island [SBPLI], a not-for-profit corporation which assists in linking major Long Island businesses with local school districts in mutually reciprocal programs.

Mr. Speaker, SBPLI was founded by Mr. Fred Breithut of Melville in 1984 and has already partnered over 40 schools with local businesses in Nassau and Suffolk Counties. Students, schools, businesses, and other community institutions are eligible to join regardless of race, religion, or political beliefs.

SBPLI assists high school students in establishing contacts with the business world before graduation. This partnership benefits the school district as the business interacts with the students and staff, while the school provides students who are eager to become involved in the business world.

Further, this program encourages graduates to remain on Long Island for practical training that will undoubtedly enhance the economic vitality of Long Island.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to illustrate just one example of the kinds of benefits that SBPLI provides to Long Island. This partnership involves a hospital and a school district. The hospital has started a program to encourage students to explore careers in the health field. Interns work in the hospital's dietary, physical therapy, radiology, and nursing units.

High school teachers of these students have noticed a definite increase in pupil attendance and an increased awareness of the relevance of school work to their future careers, as well as improved grades. Most importantly, the partnership has sparked an interest in the health profession that students might not otherwise have had.

Mr. Speaker, Long Island is fortunate to have an individual such as Mr. Breithut, a visionary committed to the ideal that schools and businesses must work together. Initiatives such as his are instrumental if the United States is to retain its position as the No. 1 economic power in the world.

On behalf of all Long Islanders, I want to thank Mr. Breithut for his selfless service to the community and wish him well in his future partnerships.

NEED FOR SENATE LEADERSHIP ON CLEAN AIR

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Ms. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, I find it unconscionable that leaders of the U.S. Senate would consider gutting key provisions of the clean air legislation now pending in that Chamber, which provide major protection from global climate change.

I am referring to current discussions going on to ease the NO_x vehicle emissions standards to less than those now pending in the House version. I also refer to the elimination of a CO_x standard that would lead to the multiple benefits of also reducing imported oil, and additional reductions in urban smog and acid rain.

Such actions come at the very moment that hundreds of scientists and international policymakers are meeting here in the Nation's Capital as part of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, to find solutions to global warming.

As the scientific community has repeatedly testified before Congress, the United States is the world's major contributor of global greenhouse gases, and vehicles are a prime contributor.

The current provisions in the Senate bill are forward thinking and should be retained. These measures are strongly supported by the American voters as reflected in recent polls, they are cost effective for consumers in reducing the bills at the gas pump, and they are among the least-cost ways of reducing environmental pollutants.

Congress can and must exercise their leadership on this issue. I call on my colleagues in the other body to hang tough and do not weaken this important legislation.

H.R. 3971, THE NATIONAL GUARD ENLISTMENT OF CERTAIN ALIENS

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing H.R. 3971, legislation granting lawful residence status to certain aliens who enlist in National Guard units which are severely under strength. This legislation is intended to alleviate the critical manpower shortage faced by several National Guard and Reserve units in our Northeast States.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation represents a major revision to a previous measure which I introduced last year. This earlier measure, H.R. 1306, was the subject of hearings before the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Refugees, and International Law on September 21, 1989.

In response to comments from the Department of Defense, the Department of State, and the Immigration and Naturalization Service, we have revised the original legislation to narrow its focus and make it more responsive to the bill's original intent. The revised legislation will not provide for any new immigration into the United States. Rather, it will apply only to existing aliens currently residing here without legal status, provided they can show U.S. residency prior to the date of the bill's enactment. Many of these aliens live and work in conditions of servitude, as part of an underground economy that benefits no one.

It makes sense for us to help resolve the problems with undocumented aliens while at the same time alleviating the manpower shortage facing National Guard units in the Northeast. Historically, U.S. immigrants have earned a distinguished record of service in defense of our Nation; in fact, 143,000 such aliens were naturalized under similar provisions enacted during World War II.

This measure provides new authority to enlist a non-U.S. citizen in any army or Air National Guard unit where that unit's strength is below 90 percent of the authorized strength level. Under this proposal, the attorney general can provide temporary residence status to any alien accepted for enlistment in the National Guard provided that alien has no criminal record and was present in the United States prior to the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, this is an innovative and responsible way to address the important problem with manpower shortages in the Northeast. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to join me and the 13 original cosponsors of H.R. 3971 in supporting this vital legislation.

H.R. 3971

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. AUTHORITY TO ACCEPT ENLISTMENTS IN THE NATIONAL GUARD FROM CERTAIN ALIENS.

Section 302 of title 32, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(d)(1) Under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary concerned, an original enlistment in the Army National Guard or Air National Guard of a State or Territory, or of Puerto Rico or the District of Columbia, may be accepted from a person who is not a citizen of the United States and who is otherwise described in paragraph (2) if the actual personnel strength of the Army National Guard or the Air National Guard, as the case may be, of that State or Territory, or Puerto Rico or the District of Columbia, at the time of such enlistment is less than 90 percent of the authorized strength of that National Guard prescribed by Federal law or regulation for the last day of the preceding fiscal year.

"(2) A person referred to in paragraph (1) is a person who is otherwise qualified for an original enlistment in the National Guard and who as of the date of the enactment of this subsection—

"(A) is not admitted to the United States for permanent residence; and

"(B) is present (whether or not lawfully) in the United States (including any commonwealth, territory, or possession of the United States).

"(3)(A) A person may not be enlisted under this subsection unless the person, in addition to taking the oath prescribed under section 304 of this title, declares an intention to become a citizen of the United States.

"(B) The enlistment of a person under this subsection shall be void if—

"(i) the person does not apply for adjustment of status under section 245B of the Immigration and Nationality Act within 90 days after the date of such enlistment, or

"(ii) the Attorney General determines that the person, having applied for such adjustment of status, is not eligible for such adjustment of status.

"(4) The number of persons enlisted under this subsection in the National Guard of any State or Territory, or of Puerto Rico or the District of Columbia, may not exceed 3,000 during any fiscal year. The Governor (or, in the case of the District of Columbia, the commanding general) shall determine the apportionment of enlistments under this subsection between the Army National Guard and the Air National Guard, except that at least two-thirds of such enlistments shall be in the Army National Guard.

"(5) The term of an enlistment under this subsection may not be less than six years.

"(6) If, within 60 days after the beginning of war or of a national emergency declared by Congress, the number specified in paragraph (4) is not increased by law, the President may increase such number as the President considers appropriate. Any such increase may remain in effect for the duration of the war or national emergency.

"(7) In the case of an alien enlisted under this subsection who is released or discharged from service under any condition other than honorable, the adjutant general for the National Guard from which the alien was released or discharged shall notify the Attorney General of such release or discharge within 90 days after the date of the release or discharge.".

SEC. 2. ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS OF ALIEN ENLISTED MEMBERS AND THEIR FAMILIES.

(a) PROVIDING FOR LEGALIZATION.—Chapter 5 of title II of the Immigration and Nationality Act is amended by inserting after section 245A (8 U.S.C. 1255a) the following new section:

ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS OF CERTAIN ALIENS ENLISTED IN THE NATIONAL GUARD

"SEC. 245B. (a) TEMPORARY RESIDENT STATUS.—

"(1) PRINCIPAL ALIEN.—The Attorney General, in consultation with the Secretary concerned (as defined in section 101(8) of title 10, United States Code) or the appropriate chief executive officer of the pertinent State, territory, or possession, shall adjust the status of an alien to an alien lawfully admitted for temporary residence if the alien applies to the Attorney General for such adjustment of status and, in the application, establishes the following:

"(A) The alien is accepted for enlistment and is enlisted in the Army National Guard or Air National Guard pursuant to section 302(d) of title 32, United States Code.

"(B) The alien is admissible to the United States as an immigrant, except as provided under subsection (c)(2).

"(C) The alien has not been convicted of any felony or 3 or more misdemeanors committed in the United States.

"(D) The alien has not assisted in the persecution of any person or persons on account of race, religion, nationality, or membership in a particular social group.

"(E) The alien was in the United States as of the date of the enactment of this section and has resided continuously in the United States since such date.

"(2) SPOUSE AND MINOR CHILDREN.—The Attorney General shall adjust the status of an alien to an alien lawfully admitted for temporary residence, if the alien applies to the Attorney General for such status and establishes, in the application, the following:

"(A) The alien is the spouse or child of an alien lawfully admitted for temporary residence under paragraph (1).

"(B) The alien is admissible to the United States as an immigrant, except as provided under subsection (c)(2).

"(C) The alien has not been convicted of any felony or 3 or more misdemeanors committed in the United States.

"(D) The alien has not assisted in the persecution of any person or persons on account of race, religion, nationality, or membership in a particular social group.

"(E) The alien was in the United States as of the date of the application of the principal alien under paragraph (1) and has resided in the United States continuously since such date.

"(3) TERMINATION OF STATUS.—The Attorney General shall provide for termination of temporary resident status granted to an alien under this subsection if—

"(A) it appears to the Attorney General that the alien was in fact not eligible for such status,

"(B) the alien commits an act that (i) makes the alien inadmissible to the United States as an immigrant, except as provided under subsection (c)(2), or (ii) is convicted of any felony or 3 or more misdemeanors committed in the United States, or

"(C) the alien described in paragraph (1)(A) was released or discharged from service described in such paragraph under any condition other than honorable.

"(4) AUTHORIZED TRAVEL AND EMPLOYMENT DURING TEMPORARY RESIDENCE.—The provisions of section 245A(b)(3) shall apply to an alien granted lawful temporary resident status under this subsection in the same manner as such provisions apply to an alien granted lawful temporary resident status under section 245A(a).

"(5) CONFIDENTIALITY.—The provisions of paragraphs (5), (6), and (7) of section 245A(b) shall apply to applications under this subsection in the same manner as they apply to applications under section 245A.

(b) ADJUSTMENT TO PERMANENT RESIDENCE.—

"(1) CERTIFICATION OF SERVICE.—An alien described in subsection (a)(1) may apply to the Secretary concerned or to the chief executive officer referred to subsection (a)(1)(A) for a certification that the alien (A) has at least 6 years of honorable service in the Army National Guard or Air National Guard and (B) was not released or discharged from such service under any condition other than honorable. if such an application is granted, the Secretary or officer shall issue such certification.

"(2) ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS OF PRINCIPAL ALIEN.—The Attorney General shall adjust the status of any alien provided lawful temporary status under subsection (a)(1) to that of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence if the alien applies to the Attorney General for such adjustment and establishes, in the application, the following:

"(A) Subject to paragraph (4), there has been a certification made with respect to the alien under paragraph (1).

"(B) The alien is admissible as an immigrant, except as provided under subsection (c)(2).

"(3) ADJUSTMENT OF STATUS OF SPOUSE AND CHILDREN.—The attorney General shall adjust the status of any alien provide lawful temporary status under subsection (a)(2) to that of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence if the alien applies to the Attorney General for such adjustment and establishes, in the application, the following:

"(A) Subject to paragraph (4), there has been a certification made with respect to the alien's spouse or parent under paragraph (1).

"(B) The alien is admissable as an immigrant, except as provided under subsection (c)(2).

"(4) WAIVER OF SERVICE REQUIREMENT.—Upon the petition of the Secretary concerned or the chief executive officer, the Attorney General shall waive the certification requirement of—

"(A) paragraphs (2)(A) and (3)(A) for any alien if the alien was wounded in action or held in captive status (as defined under section 559 of title 37, United States Code), or

"(B) paragraph (3)(A), if the alien's spouse or parent was killed in action or otherwise died while in the line of duty.

"(c) WAIVER OF NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS AND CERTAIN GROUNDS FOR EXCLUSION.—

"(1) WAIVER OF NUMERICAL LIMITATIONS.—The numerical limitations of sections 201 and 202 shall not apply wtih respect to aliens covered under this section.

"(2) ADMISSIBILITY DETERMINATIONS.—The provisions of section 245A(d)(2) shall apply to determinations of admissibility under this section in the same manner as they apply to determinations of admissibility under section 245A.

"(d) TEMPORARY DISQUALIFICATION FROM CERTAIN PUBLIC WELFARE ASSISTANCE.—The provisions of section 245A(h) shall apply to aliens granted lawful temporary resident status under this section in the same manner as such provisions apply to aliens granted lawful temporary resident status under section 245A(a), except that any reference to a 'five-year period' shall be considered to be a reference to a 'two-year period'.

"(e) EXPEDITED NATURALIZATION.—In the case of an alien who is granted lawful permanent residence under subsection (b) and who reenlists in the Army National Guard or the Air National Guard for an additional term of 6 years, there shall be counted toward the period of physical presence and residence required for naturalization under section 316(a), the period of physical presence and residence while the alien was in lawful temporary resident status under subsection (a).".

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of contents of the Immigration and Nationality Act is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 245A the following new item:

"Sec. 245B. Adjustment of status of certain aliens enlisted in the National Guard.".

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by this Act shall apply to fiscal years beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act.

NATIONAL ADOPTION WEEK—1990

HON. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, today I, along with over 75 of my colleagues, am introducing legislation which designates Thanksgiving week of 1990, as National Adoption Week. Last year, for the 12th consecutive year, Congress passed a resolution—House Joint Resolution 278—proclaiming Thanksgiving week 1989 as National Adoption Week.

Mr. Speaker, it is often said, and rightly so, that there is no resource more precious than our children. Unfortunately, not every child has the benefit of a loving and supportive family. As Members of Congress, we must do all that we can to make it easier for every child without a family to find a family.

Today, there are about 36,000 children in the foster care system with special needs who are waiting for a family. These special children—whether they are older, part of sibling groups, members of minority groups or have physical, mental and emotional handicaps—deserve our support. With about 2 million couples and individuals looking to adopt a child, there are homes available for many of these special children. By celebrating National Adoption Week each year, we can bring much needed publicity to their situations.

Mr. Speaker, last December I had the privilege of presenting the U.S. position supporting the U.N. convention on the Rights of the Child at the United Nations in New York. The convention recognizes the positive role adoption plays in providing children with families. It calls on people from all lands to consider the benefits of adoption, and likewise I think we must focus on the benefits of adoption here at home, as well.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me say that adoption is one option for unintended pregnancies that we can all support. It benefits pregnant women who are not able to take care of a child; it benefits couples and individuals who are unable to have their own children; and—most importantly—it benefits the child by providing a loving and supportive family.

I would urge all of my colleagues to demonstrate their support for adoption by cosponsoring the National Adoption Week resolution for 1990.

UKRAINIAN CATHOLICS STILL LONGING FOR TRUE LIBERALIZATION FROM GORBACHEV

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, in recent hours the world has witnessed increasingly remarkable events in the Soviet Union. Each day it seems that revolutionary, democratic change may be the result of demonstrations in Red Square. As we focus on Moscow, I would again like to call the Nation's attention to the Ukraine, where Ukrainian Catholics have emotionally struggled and demonstrated for religious freedom since 1946 when Stalin banned the Ukrainian Catholic Church.

Over the past year, it has often seemed that Ukrainian Catholics have been on the threshold of success. In October and November, over 170 Members of Congress joined me in urging Mikhail Gorbachev to legalize the Ukrainian Catholic Church. Ukrainian Catholics in the United States and abroad eagerly anticipated Gorbachev's meeting with Pope John Paul II in December. I joined them in their hope that Ukrainian Catholics would finally be allowed to practice their faith in accordance with their conscience.

Despite the greatly appreciated efforts of the U.S. Congress, Ukrainian Catholics were largely disappointed with Gorbachev's meeting with Pope John Paul II. While Gorbachev has called for the legal registration of Ukrainian Catholics and the Catholic Church, the synod of 1946 has not been declared illegal, and property has not been returned to the Church. I rise today to remind Members that the United States can only be satisfied when the Soviet Union declares the dissolution of the Ukrainian Catholic Church illegal, legalizes the Church, and returns the Church's property. We must remember that Gorbachev's conciliatory words must be matched by real action.

I would like to submit for the record a recent article from the Wall Street Journal which provides an excellent update on the struggle of Ukrainian Catholics—whether things have really changed, and what remains to be done.

IN UKRAINE, FAITH IN GOD—NOT IN GORBACHEV

(By Edward McFadden)

When the Soviet Council for Religious Affairs announced on Dec. 1 that Ukrainian Catholics would be allowed to register and "enjoy all the rights established by law for religious communities in the Ukrainian SSR," members of the long-banned church were justifiably unenthusiastic. Last week leaders of the Ukrainian Catholic Church gathered in the Church of the Transfiguration in Lvov, declared the church's dissolution in 1946 null and void, and announced that the church would from that moment on function as a fully legal entity within the Soviet Union.

The Ukrainian Catholics' faith in God and lack of same in the Soviet system has led to a quiet revolution.

The Ukrainian Catholic Church's history began in 1596 through an agreement between the Ukrainian Church of the Byzantine Rite and the Church of Rome in which the Ukrainian Catholics, also known as Uniates, pledged allegiance to the papacy but kept their Byzantine liturgy, language and church hierarchy. Josef Stalin banned the church in 1946 through the socalled Synod of Lvov, which forcibly "self-dissolved" the church and merged it with the Communist-backed Russian Orthodox Church. Uniate clergy who refused to surrender their allegiance to Rome and become Russian Orthodox priests were sent to Siberia. All Uniate property was confiscated, most of it going to the Orthodox Church.

Since then, many Ukrainian Catholics have practiced their faith in fields, forests or late in the evening in private homes. Today there are an estimated 3.5 million practicing Ukrainian Catholics in the Soviet Union, the majority of whom reside in Western Ukraine and are counted in official Soviet documents as Russian Orthodox. The Ukrainian Church is overseen by Cardinal Myroslav Lubachivsky from Rome along with 10 bishops in Ukraine, seven of whom only recently came out of hiding (where the other three remain).

Because the Uniates make up the largest Catholic group in the Soviet Union, Pope John Paul II has long placed the relegalization of the Ukrainian Church high on his list of concerns in his limited dealings with the Soviet Union. During the historic two-day meeting between Mikhail Gorbachev and the Pontiff in Rome in late November, the Ukrainian Church was discussed often.

Vatican officials, whose policy it is to comment only under the condition of anonymity, say that the Pope was willing to make a major concession, promising that should Mr. Gorbachev allow the full legalization of the Uniate Church the Pontiff would not press for the return of all church property, the major stumbling block to the Russian Orthodox Church supporting legalization of the Ukrainian Catholic Church.

Despite the talks, however, the Ukrainian Church gained little from the Soviets that it already didn't have. Ivan Hel, head of the Lvov-based Committee for the Defense of the Ukrainian Catholic Church, told reporters that the new policy giving Ukrainian Catholics the right to register as Uniates "does not provide a real legal basis for the church. It does not recognize the 1946 [self-dissolution of the Church] as illegal and does not guarantee the return of property." In fact, there is no guarantee that congregations that apply for registration will even be accepted by the government.

According to officials of the Ukrainian Church in Rome, more than 700 congregations have applied for registration with Soviet officals but only 20 have been approved. More important, the church still does not have legal standing.

Over the past two years, Mr. Gorbachev has used his still-unenacted "Freedom of Conscience" bill, which purportedly would give all religions the same legal standing and property privileges as the official Russian Orthodox Church, to placate religious groups and their leaders—first with Lithuanian Catholics in mid-1988, and then in early 1989 when unrest among Moslems began to grow. When the Pope pressed for Ukraning Church legalization, Mr. Gorbachev once again promised a law early in 1990.

Vatican officials say they have not been consulted by Soviet officials about the law, and Ukrainian Church officials have not seen any of the three draft versions that are said to exist. The issue of church ownership of property might not even be considered in the law, since a Vatican source familiar with the continuing negotiations between Rome and Moscow says that Mr. Gorbachev feels that return of Ukrainian Church property is an issue to be resolved between the Russian Orthodox Church and Ukrainian Catholics.

Such inter-church negotiations began two weeks ago in Moscow, but the Russian Orthodox Church is hesitant to surrender any of the property it holds in Ukraine and the numbers bear out why: The Orthodox Church claims to have more than 10,000 parishes in the Soviet Union. More than 5,700 of the total are in Ukraine—3,000 of these in Western Ukraine. All told, about 60% of the Orthodox Church's holdings are in the republic. A mass re-conversion of members and property to the Ukrainian Catholic Church could be crippling to the Russian Orthodox Church.

In October, before the registration rule was enacted, Ukrainian Catholics were already growing weary of the lipservice from Mr. Gorbachev and the Russian Orthodox hierarchy. Beginning with the annexation of Lvov's Church of the Transfiguration, believers have peaceably seized more than 600 churches formerly held by the Russian Orthodox Church. More than 350 Russian Orthodox priests have asked to be accepted as priests for the Ukrainian Church—all have been accepted. While the buildings technically belong to the Russian Orthodox Church, there is little the Orthodox Church can do when an entire parish led by the parish clergy—returns to the fold of the Ukrainian Chruch.

In some areas of Western Ukraine, such as the town of Ivano-Frankivsk, where 100,000 of the 250,000 residents have been known to hold Sunday prayer services in the town square, there are no longer any functioning Russian Orthodox churches. Reports from Ukraine confirm that the taking of these churches has been peaceful, yet the Russian Orthodox Church has attempted to distort the story.

In a confidential cable sent Dec. 23 to Russian Orthodox Church leaders outside the Soviet Union, Archbishop Kirill, chairman of external church relations of the Moscow Patriarchate, reported that the Resurrection Cathedral in Ivano-Frankivsk had been taken "by force . . . . [And] many Orthodox churches in Lvov, Ternopol and other cities and villages have been seized. . . . I ask you to exert influence on the Christian and social circles of the country in which you are residing in favor of a most swift and peaceful resolution of the problem." This is the same man who has called publicly for brotherly negotiations between the two churches.

The Russian Orthodox Church, in the hope of coming away with something for its 44-year domination of the region's religious life, is requesting inter-church dialogue based on the Christian love and understanding to resolve the current impasses without the aid of the Soviet Government. But the Uniates note that only the state can give back what the state has taken away: the rights of religious freedoms and the ownership of property.

FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE MURDER OF ENRIQUE CAMARENA

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, 5 years ago today drug enforcement agent Enrique (Kiki) Camarena was brutally tortured and murdered in Mexico. Kiki Camarena is one of the true heroes in our country's fight against illegal drugs, and I believe it is our duty to see that those responsible for his death are brought to justice.

Just last week, a Federal grand jury in Los Angeles indicted 18 Mexican nationals in connection with the murder, including two former top Mexican law enforcement authorities. Mr. Speaker, I call on the Mexican Government to respect these indictments and reopen its investigation of the Camarena murder, and in particular to investigate possible involvement by high level law enforcement officials.

In my recent discussions with President Salinas and others, I have become convinced that the Salinas government is dedicated to rooting out corruption and strengthening its antinarcotics operations. I believe President Salinas is sincere in that commitment. But a reopening and full investigation of the Camarena murder case is needed if we are to regain fully the trust previous Mexican administrations have shaken.

Finally, I would like to once again extend my condolences to the Camarena family and my thanks to the law enforcement officers, domestic and international, who risk their lives everyday in the fight against illegal drugs. I want to assure them that there are people in Congress who remember and appreciate their efforts and sacrifices.

A SPECIAL TRIBUTE FOR A DEDICATED PUBLIC SERVANT

HON. JOE KOLTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today before the full U.S. House of Representatives to pay special tribute to a man who has dedicated his adult life to promoting and protecting public safety in my Fourth Congressional District of Pennsylvania.

Okey T. Cline of Chippewa Township, Beaver County, who has faithfully served as township fire chief for 21 years, is retiring as chief this month, January 1990, after a lifetime of dedicated public service to the township fire department, to his full-time job, to his Nation, and to his family.

Born in Sherman, WV, on April 21, 1926, Okey Cline was married to Juanita (Hardman) Cline on July 20, 1944. The couple have two children: Ronald E. Cline, 43, and Kathy T. Helsing, 38; and six grandchildren: Erik Helsing, Dane Helsing, Heidi Helsing, Kristin Helsing, Amanda Lynne Cline, and Douglas T. Cline.

Okey Cline served honorably in the U.S. Navy from 1944 to 1946 and volunteered for the township fire department in 1953. Promoted to fire chief in 1968, Mr. Cline saw the fire department grow and prosper over the years, now overseeing 38 active volunteers.

While serving steadfastly as fireman and fire chief, Okey Cline was also employed for 40 years at Babcock & Wilcox Co. without ever missing a day's work due to absence. Not many employees can claim this great and rare achievement.

A member of the New Brighton American Legion and the Eagles, Okey Cline will remain with the volunteer force to assist the new chief, Richard Lamey.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor and pay special tribute to Okey Cline before the House because Okey is one of the most dedicated firefighters and fire chiefs in this State and this Nation. Okey Cline will spend much more time with his grandchildren now, but his leadership, and dedicated and expert guidance will continue to aid his fire department and his community in the years to come.

INTRODUCING THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER WATER QUALITY STUDY

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, today I'm introducing legislation to require a comprehensive water quality study for the Mississippi River. This bill will authorize the U.S. Geological Survey to conduct a 2-year study, in conjunction with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, the FPA, the Army Corps of Engineers, State agencies, and local support groups.

The great Mississippi is a national treasure. More than that, it is used by millions of Americans every year for recreation, swimming, boating, fishing, and hunting. The upper river alone has over 200 boat harbors, 445 recreation sites, and thousands of acres of protected wildlife refuge. The total recreation value of the upper river alone is over $700 million each year.

The river empties an average of more than 530,000 cubic feet of water into the Gulf of Mexico every second—that's one and a half times the discharge of the Saint Lawrence, eight times the discharge of the Rhine, and 30 times the discharge of the Thames. The flow emanates from water in 31 States. Seventy cities draw their water supplies from the Mississippi. Twenty-three percent of the public surface water supplies for the United States comes from the river. Unfortunately, we know too little about the quality of the water in the river.

We already have underway a comprehensive, cutting edge project to assess the environmental and recreational aspects of the Upper Mississippi River. That project, the Environmental Management Program, is the model for interagency cooperative efforts to study effects of river use on environmental and recreation balances. It is my hope that this legislation will use the EMP model to expand the excellent work conducted under the program to wider study efforts.

The bill will incorporate much of the work already underway on the upper river with new data to be found on water quality on the rest of the river. By measuring the level of contaminants which flow down the river, dissolve in the water, and attach to sediment particles, or incorporate in the tissue of plants and animals, we'll have the capacity to identify where our society is failing to meet the challenge of environmental management.

I'm pleased that Senator DURENBERGER has introduced companion legislation in the Senate and look forward to working with him on this effort. And I am especially pleased that he, along with my colleagues who have joined as cosponsors of this legislation, have looked to the Upper Mississippi River Environmental Management Plan as a model for this study. If we can spread the model to cover the river from its headwaters at Lake Itasca, MN, to the Gulf of Mexico, the river, and those who live in the region, will gain tremendously.

In the interim, the water quality study I have proposed will expand our knowledge of the entire river. This knowledge will be critical to establishing sound practices for use of the river and its resources into the next century.

THE INVASION OF PANAMA

HON. JIM MOODY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, today, I voted with deep reservations in support of House Concurrent Resolution 262, a resolution expressing the sense of Congress concerning recent developments in Panama.

My vote reflected my support for the portion of the resolution stating: "That the Congress—(1) expresses its sadness over the loss of 23 United States soldiers' lives in Panama, and conveys deep condolences to the families of those who died in Panama; (2) commends the President for his efforts to provide for the early return to the United States of the remaining United States troops engaged in Operation Just Cause; and (3) urges the President to continue his efforts to foster democratic ideals in Panama and the establishment of a democratic government so long sought by the people of Panama."

I deeply regret the loss of American and Panamanian lives that resulted from the American invasion. It is a tremendous tragedy that so many young and innocent lives have been irretrievably lost. I support the speedy withdrawal of American forces to ensure that the United States does not become an occupying force in that country. Finally, I will work with congressional leaders and the President to help the people of Panama realize their hopes for democracy.

That vote notwithstanding, I strongly object to the section of the resolution stating that President Bush "appropriately" ordered the invasion of Panama. I want the record to be very clear on this point.

I welcome the end of the corrupt and illegitimate Noriega government. However, the invasion of Panama was a unilateral United States action that constituted a clear violation of Panama's sovereignty and of international law.

There are many corrupt regimes in the world, several countries that have provided a haven for drug traffickers, several countries where American citizens have been mistreated or killed. But President Bush has not responded by launching a large-scale unilateral invasion. It appears to me that our country more easily turns its tremendous military might against countries that are small and countries that are close at hand.

Unfortunately, I believe that a byproduct of the U.S. intervention will be the rekindling of suspicion and resentment toward the United States by Latin American countries, caused by years of United States domination which frequently relied on military force, and usually affronted Latin American sovereignty and dignity. The time has long since come when we need to deal with our Latin neighbors on the basis of respect and cooperation. This is our interest. And theirs.

Ironically, Noriega himself was a creature of traditional U.S. policies and patterns. For years, he built up his wealth as an agent of the CIA. He used those funds and contacts to build up both a political machine and a drug dealing empire. The security wing of the United States Government knew this but turned a blind eye to his actions for one primary reason: He supported United States policies on the Nicaraguan Contras.

Thus, in a wider sense, the recent invasion of Panama was caused by the failure of policies that we have pursued for many years. Diplomatic and political steps short of invasion would have eliminated the need for military action—and for American and Panamanian deaths.

We North Americans need to remember that while the Panamanian people dislike Noriega, direct military action to dislodge him can create, over the long term, even stronger resentment on their part to interference in their internal affairs. This will be particularly true if we don't leave swiftly. At the same time, we have a moral obligation to help build destroyed homes and buildings—possibly assists the many businesses which lost millions of dollars in merchandise in the looting spree which the U.S. Army had failed to foresee when local police were routed by the invasion. For that reason, I supported the assistance package for Panama that was approved earlier today.

A TRIBUTE TO THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FIRST COLLEGE FOOTBALL ALL-AMERICAN TEAM SELECTED BY WALTER CAMP, THE FATHER OF AMERICAN FOOTBALL

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, usually when I come to the floor of the House, it is to discuss the affairs of the country. But today I want to talk about football—Walter Camp Football. On February 17, I will have the distinct privilege of addressing the Walter Camp Football Foundation's National Awards Dinner, in New Haven, CT. I want to share with my colleagues today why it is that this opportunity means so much to me.

Many of you may wonder what Walter Camp Football is and what it is that the Walter Camp Football Foundation does. But if you know and love college football, then you already know that for more than a century Walter Camp and college football have been synonymous.

Walter Camp dedicated his life to preserving and promoting those qualities of college football that give it claim to the title of the great American sport. And for 23 years, the Walter Camp Football Foundation has been synonymous with all that is great about college football.

Walter Camp was the father of American football. More than anybody else, he is responsible for the sport's existence and popularity today. He transformed the nineteenth century English sport of rugby into the fast, modern game of football familiar to all of us. Many aspects of the game he is credited with introducing are now taken for granted: the 11-man team, the line of scrimmage, the T-formation, and, most importantly, the forward pass. These innovations have become so much a part of the game that sometimes we fail to appreciate that somebody had to think of them. It's tough to imagine what football would have been like without Walter Camp.

But Walter Camp gave football much more than its rules. He also provided it with a unique spirit that the brutish rugby matches lacked. His strategy, set plays, and sequences resulted in a blend of speed, power, and drama that drew in the crowds. As the sport's popular appeal extended across the Nation, it was only natural for long lasting collegiate rivalries to develop. As a lifelong member of the rules committee for the game, a body now known as the NCAA, Walter Camp worked to ensure that his new sport had the organization and official recognition it needed to grow.

Walter Camp's interest in the game began when he was an undergraduate student at Yale, where he was a member of every varsity team at the time—track, swimming, tennis and rowing—and was captain of the footall and baseball teams. Later, as Yale University's first football coach, he led the team to national prominence. In addition, he edited the official Handbook of Football for over 14 years. He also proved his capabilities outside of athletics, rising to the presidency of a very successful company.

The spirit and legacy Walter Camp left to college football is carried on today by the Walter Camp Football Foundation. This charitable, all-volunteer group, motivated soley out of their love of the game is dedicated to perpetuating the name and spirit of Walter Camp.

One hundred years ago, Walter Camp selected his first All-American team of college football players. This tradition has been carried on by the Foundation. No other college football All-American team has the mystique and legend of the Walter Camp team. Each year the Foundation brings these athletes to Camp's hometown of New Haven, CT, for presentation to the community and the world. That weekend, the eyes of football fans everywhere focus on this city as it plays host for the finest college football players in the country. To even the casual follower of college football there is no more important off-field event.

It is a special honor that I have been asked to speak at this year's awards dinner, because this is the 100th year an All-American college football team has been selected. Professional football may have more glamor and more money, but college football has the spirit. We owe much thanks to the Walter Camp Football Foundation for keeping that spirit, begun over 100 years ago by its namesake, alive.

I would ask my colleagues that the next time they go to a football game, they remember the father of American football, Walter Camp, and reflect on the values of hard work, ingenuity, selflessness, and excellence that he embodied. Let us also well remember the role of the Foundation that bears Camps name in keeping his ideals alive.

NATIONAL AEROSPACE PLANE

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, on January 23, 1990, this Nation's aerospace industry made history. They did not make history in their usual way by some ingenious device to make travel or space exploration easier. This event is history making because it signals a new era in the way America thinks about our future competitiveness.

On this date, five entities, representing four aerospace companies, announced a consortium to build the national aerospace plane. This national aerospace plane [NASP] is a vehicle which will take off from a conventional runway, fly into orbit at hypersonic speed of as much as 17,000 miles an hour, and then land again.

The corporations are Pratt & Whitney, the North American and Rocketdyne divisions of Rockwell International, McDonnell Douglas, and General Dynamics. This consortium will be headed by Mr. Barry Waldman of Rockwell International.

Mr. Speaker, these companies have contributed nearly half of the $1.5 billion that has been spent on development of the national aerospace plane. This, along with the serious commitments foreign governments are giving this technology, proves that the world is recognizing the important breakthroughs that will result from this project.

As many who are familiar with the national aerospace plane will attest, this program is absolutely vital to retaining the United States' lead in aerospace technology. The aerospace industry has the largest trade surplus of any industry, due to the research and development that was undertaken in the past. Our current research will determine whether we will continue to lead in this area.

I congratulate these corporations for their foresight and commitment to the national aerospace plane, and I wish them well. I only hope that this Congress shows that same foresight.

SEPARATION PAY AN URGENT NEED FOR AMERICAN SERVICE MEMBERS

HON. JIM SLATTERY

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, over the next 5 years, reductions-in-force [RIF] imposed upon the Department of Defense and all branches of the U.S. Armed Forces are expected to result in the release of thousands of uniformed service members stationed in the United States and at bases around the world.

According to Defense Department figures, 91,000 service members will be released by the end of fiscal year 1991. Unfortunately, the future for these involuntarily discharged service men and women is not very bright. Unlike officers in the Armed Forces, who receive up to $30,000 in separation pay regular enlisted service members and noncommissioned officers are not entitled to any separation benefits when they are released from military service.

The legislation I am introducing today would provide separation pay to regular enlisted members of the Armed Forces who are the victims of budget cuts and RIF's. The legislation I am offering would provide some financial security to the service members who have honorably served their country for at least 5 years, but have been denied reenlistment or involuntarily discharged in an effort to meet budgetary constraints.

Congress has a responsibility to ensure that the current military spend-down does not result in a wholesale discharge of thousands of military service members and we have a duty to provide some assistance to these dedicated citizens as they reenter the civilian work force.

Many men and women join the service expecting to spend their entire career serving their country. I believe it is unfair and unjust for the U.S. Government to release them without some kind of compensation. I urge my colleagues in Congress to make separation pay a priority item in 1990 and I look forward to speedy enactment of this important legislation.

ECONOMIC STABILIZATION, ADJUSTMENT, AND INDUSTRY CONVERSION ACT OF 1990

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, the rapid democratization of eastern Europe and the new, dramatic restructuring of the Soviet Communist party requires a thorough reassessment of national security needs and the defense budget. The defense reductions are now politically feasible only because of these pro-democracy developments in eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. Without this opening, fear, and suspicion of the "evil empire" would legitimately dictate at best stable real military spending or at worst a vicious new spiral of competing defense budgets. Instead, a virtuous cycle is now possible. Mr. Speaker, swift, mutual, arms reduction would not only free up this Nation's savings for housing and capital spending needs, but would also give the Warsaw Pact nations the opportunity to redirect their skilled labor pool and natural resources toward consumer and, eventually export-oriented goods production.

Mr. Speaker, the opportunity to scale back defense expenditures further from the peak of the Reagan build-up years have never been more appetizing. In the past few weeks, all the arguments have been made on the rationale for the desired cutback. In addition, the so-called peace dividend which will accompany such cuts, have already been spent many times over on priority programs. While the actual budget reductions recently submitted to the Hill are small, I anticipate the Congress will address the composition of further desired cuts.

As many realize in Washington and abroad, the issue for Congress concerning defense reduction may be the consequences of such cuts for the microeconomy—for the industries, work force and communities where defense production takes place.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I will introduce legislation which attempts to address the pressures of defense reductions while assisting workers, businesses, and communities that must adjust to base closings, elimination or cutbacks of weapons production, stretchouts, layoffs, and other consequences of reduced defense budgets. This legislation was developed after 3 years of hearings and many meetings with the administration, affected communities, business leaders and labor organizations. I honestly believe that those communities which supplied and produced the goods and services in facilitating this defense buildup over the past decade, deserve an orderly mechanism of managing economic adjustment to prevent potential economic dislocation.

Mr. Speaker, if substantial resources are shifted from military to civilian uses over the next decade, the Congress must act now to implement the adequate planning necessary to adhere to this change. If we are smart and act now, we can make it easier to recycle the highly skilled workers who have helped us win the cold war, the desirable facilities, the management abilities and research of our advanced business. These assets, properly coordinated, can make the country more competitive, more prosperous, more secure, and more stable. If we continue to drift along, as we are now, America will lose jobs, lose income, lose prestige and greet the year with a visibly lower standard of living, and a sense of squandered opportunity.

A part of any adjustment strategy must be the American business sector itself. The free enterprise system has recently proved its worth, once again, as a better instrument of adapting to changing world economics than centrally controlled state model.

The American version of free enterprise has done a brilliant job since World War II in providing jobs for a rapidly expanding workforce and an improved standard of living for our expanding population. We must therefore utilize the many strengths of that system to meet the new challenges of responding to what may be substantial and rapid reductions in the U.S. defense budget and ever intensifying global competition. Here again, my bill would accomplish this by revitalizing proven programs that have helped business in the past by providing technical and financial assistance where it is most needed to adapt to greater emphasis on the civilian agenda.

In general, my proposed legislation would provide the following:

The vehicle for coordination would be the President's economic stabilization and adjustment council. This council, which presently exists under an executive order, but remains inactive, would identify defense related impact problems of States and communities that require assistance. In addition, the council shall notify areas that are eligible for community economic assistance planning and economic adjustment assistance. With this notification, the council shall encourage the preparation of concrete plans for civilian related, private enterprise and public projects which addresses vital areas of national concern such as housing, education, and health care. The council will also act as a clearinghouse for all information regarding federally funded projects, agency programs and funding possibilities, loans, and loan guarantees pertaining to economic disruption and adjustment. After countless interviews with small business and community groups, a consensus was formed concerning the need for a national clearinghouse that provides coordination among existing agencies responding to sudden sectoral economic dislocation.

Second, the legislation calls for displaced workers, subsistence, retraining, education, and a job assistance package that is currently provided under the Trade Adjustment Act of 1988. This income assistance package would help in facilitating the transition of those dislocated wokers involved in the production of outdated defense hardware to the retraining of more civilian-oriented manufacturing.

Third, for communities, early notification of planned defense cutbacks, and assistance in planning and financing a response to these cutbacks through regional and State economic development programs of increased size and vitality will be enhanced. Planning assistance, so affected communities may adhere and adapt to potential economic downturns, will be emphasized. The day the President submits his budget to the Congress, the Council shall inform those communities of potential economic dislocation due to defense program reductions. All parties will agree that proper planning can only be accomplished through early, timely notification.

Fourth, the Economic Development Administration shall provide to those qualified communities suffering economic dislocation due to defense reductions, economic assistance through its title IX programs. These programs have a well-documented history of implementing efficient economic development programs. Also, the Loan Guarantee Program will be enhanced to provide needed capital to those businesses which must adapt to a changing marketplace. Mr. Speaker, the Economic Development Administration is an existing entity that is well-suited in dealing with regional economic dislocation. Programs such as title IX and business loan guarantees are in place to respond to economic events such as these.

Fifth, my bill would provide technical assistance to defense impacted industries for establishment of industrywide programs of new product or process development or export development, similar to provisions of the 1988 Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act for trade-impacted businesses.

In addition, this legislation would call upon the President to design and submit to Congress a program for doubling within 5 years the amount of long-term debt and equity financial assistance provided by the Small Business Investment Company Program that has existed since 1958.

Also, I would request the President to develop and submit to the Congress for assistance to inventors and innovators by doubling the Small Business Innovation Research Program that has been creating success stories since 1977. In addition, I would ask the President to formulate and submit to the Congress a plan for increasing financing for community-based businesses by 50 percent over the next 5 years, under the existing certified development company 10-year-old program.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, while defense spending has been falling since the mid-1980's, many of us expect the rate of decline to steepen into the 1990's. With this decline of anticipated cuts, the local impacts is manageable if communities are on notice and advance, adequate planning is enhanced and maintained.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is not an anti-defense bill but a bill that responds to a record defense buildup of the previous administration! The local impact of defense cuts is likely to vary, depending on which systems are eliminated. While no one really knows the true ramifications of the declining defense dollar, now is the time to plan for and deal with the local impacts of such cuts as they occur into the 1990's. This bill is the first step within the planning process. While most Members are reluctant to support program cuts within their home districts, the capacity in dealing with such cuts is manageable through this legislation. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

It is my intention to hold comprehensive hearings on this most important matter very shortly.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH AND CHANGES IN SOUTH AFRICA

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, February has been celebrated as Black History Month since 1976, but the origins of this event date back to 1926, when Dr. Carter G. Woodson set aside a special period of time in February to recognize the heritage, achievements, and contributions of black Americans. Although it is coincidence that major changes were announced in South Africa earlier in this same month in 1990, I believe there are some lessons that should be drawn from these two events.

All Americans owe a debt of gratitude to House majority whip WILLIAM GRAY and the rest of the Congressional Black Caucus for staying the course on sanctions and on keeping up the pressure on the racist government that rules South Africa like a police state. Sanctions do work. But courage can be a lonely companion, and without the resolve of the caucus, I doubt we would have seen any changes.

In addition to exerting economic pressure, United States sanctions also sent a message of hope to the oppressed people of South Africa that the world's most powerful democracy was on the side of their hopes and aspirations. Hope is a powerful ally, and amidst all the turmoil in that troubled nation, U.S. sanctions proclaimed loud and clear that the struggle for freedom would not be in vain.

Another lesson we have learned, and this one is from the civil rights movement here in this country, is that we should never settle for anything less than what justice and equality demand. While we are pleased with the legalization of opposition political parties in South Africa, and by the promise to release Nelson Mandela, a long, long road lies ahead for South Africa and its people. We must redouble our efforts until a true and full democracy is established in South Africa and until each and every person has the right to participate in that democracy. We must not be content with this month's developments when the obscenity known as apartheid remains in place. We must not sit still while human beings are still graded like cattle depending on the color of their skin. And we must not applaud the actions of the South African Government, because it has only demonstrated the barest glimmer of the true proportion of what it still owes its own people and what it still owes humanity for its racial policies of the last century.

Here at home, we must resist any attempt by the Bush administration to abolish or weaken U.S. sanctions. We must maintain the pressure on the South African Government, and we must not send them misleading signals that anything less than the total destruction of apartheid is acceptable to the United States of America.

Mr. Speaker, let us hope that when Black History Month is celebrated 100 years from now, the events of February 1990 were seen as the beginning of the end for apartheid. Let us also hope and pray that history showed that the United States had the courage to remain steadfast in its opposition to racist police states and to anything less than full and complete democracy in South Africa.

TRIBUTE TO THE LEAGUE OF UNITED LATIN AMERICAN CITIZENS

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an organization that has made great contributions over the years to the Nation's Hispanic community. I am speaking of the League of United Latin American Citizens [LULAC]. LULAC is celebrating its 61st anniversary next week.

Through their many activities LULAC has become an important part of the lives of countless Americans. As a civil rights organization it has been instrumental in the formation of our Nation's civil rights laws and their enforcement. As an educational organization it has promoted Hispanic culture and history. As a service organization it has provided scholarships to deserving students. Over its 61 years of service LULAC has become a respected and influential group.

The effectiveness of LULAC and its genuine concern for people were clearly evident during the Loma Prieta earthquake that hit the central coast of California in October of last year. Immediately following the earthquake LULAC representatives brought to my attention some of the unique problems faced by the Hispanic community after the earthquake. Because of their early intervention we were able to facilitate the availability of Federal disaster assistance information in Spanish and bring quickly much needed relief to the victims.

I have enjoyed working with LULAC over the years and look forward to many more productive years. I wish LULAC and all of its members well on the occasion of its 61st anniversary.

HONORING THE MISSOURI NATIONAL GUARD UNITS IN OPERATION JUST CAUSE

HON. MEL HANCOCK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, as we debate today the aid our Nation will provide the recovering people of Panama, I congratulate the young men and women of the Missouri National Guard units who served in Operation Just Cause. All Missourians are rightfully proud.

I commend the brave actions and exemplary service of the 1138th Military Police Company from West Plains and Doniphan; the 1137th Military Policy Company from Kennet and Caruthersville; and the 139th Tactical Airlift Group from St. Joseph. All of these units, exposed to actual combat situations, conducted themselves honorably and with distinction.

When Operation Just Cause began, it immediately became necessary to construct prisoner of war camps to detain the captured Dignity Battalions of the ousted Noriega. At the time the invasion began, these Missouri National Guard personnel were the only units on hand in the country with specific training in the handling of prisoners. At dawn, the day after the invasion began, our Missouri National Guard began construction of the first POW camp despite shelling by mortars and constant sniper fire.

The 16 members of the 139th Tactical Airlift Group were actually called upon to fly tactical transport missions in their C-130 in direct support of actual combat missions at still-contested airfields.

Our boys were under fire and an integral part of the action—and they performed brillantly.

When one considers that these troops had only 3 hours notice of the invasion before they were called upon to lend their assistance, their performance is all the more amazing.

Of course, this isn't the first time the Missouri National Guard has come to the aid of the Panamanian people. In 1985, approximately 2,500 Missouri National Guard personnel participated in a peacetime mission to build a road which opened up an isolated rural area in western Panama. These guardsmen came from all across the State of Missouri, including units from cities in the 7th Congressional District like Webb City, Neosho, Joplin, Carthage, and others.

Yes, Missouri has a proud tradition of serving their country and their fellow man. As we discuss plans for the United States to help our Panamanian friends cope with the disaster left behind by their ousted drug-dealing dictator Noriega, it is good to reflect upon the historical commitment we have had toward Panama, as evidenced, in part, by the heroic and dedicated service of those Missourians who have fought and served there.

EQUAL TREATMENT FOR COLA'S

HON. ROBERT A. BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express concern that Federal retirees are again being unfairly singled out for cuts in the Federal budget.

In his budget proposal, President Bush recommended elimination of Federal retirees' 1991 cost-of-living adjustment [COLA]. He also wants to limit future COLA's to an amount less than the rise in the Consumer Price Index [CPI]. In contrast, no similar reduction was proposed for Social Security COLA's.

In 1986, Congress passed legislation to ensure Federal retirees' COLA's would be given the same protection from sequestration as COLA's for Social Security beneficiaries. The commitment to treat all retirees' COLA's in the same manner was renewed during the bipartisan budget summit in 1987. Now, the Bush administration proposes to abandon this pledge to retired Federal workers.

I believe these proposals place an unfair burden for deficit reduction on those who have committed their working lives to public service, particularly in light of the substantial cuts borne by these individuals in recent years. The Federal retirement benefits have been cut by almost $24.3 billion.

Federal retirees face the same cost increases that burden their private-sector counterparts. As such, they should be afforded the same inflation protection as Social Security recipients.

I am contacting President Bush to urge him to support full COLA's for Federal retirees in 1990. In addition, I have cosponsored legislation—H.R. 3914—which would guarantee that Federal retirees' COLA's be treated the same as Social Security COLA's.

I urge my colleagues to join this effort to provide equal treatment for all retirees.

THE 42D ANNIVERSARY OF SRI LANKA INDEPENDENCE

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the people of Sri Lanka on the 42d anniversary of their country's independence. Sri Lanka, though troubled in its recent history, remains a proud and sovereign state. There is every reason to believe that when the current conflict is settled, Sri Lankans will resume the progress toward a peaceful and prosperous country that is rightfully theirs.

It now appears that the last Indian troops will be withdrawn from Sri Lanka within 2 months. India sent its forces to Sri Lanka for the stated purpose of helping the Sri Lankan Government deal with rampant ethnic violence. Instead, those troops became actors in the very conflict they were supposed to quell. I think this is recognized both in India and Sri Lanka.

It is time for Sri Lankans themselves to settle their differences. The terrible toll of 1989—at least 8,000 deaths, many more injured, and widespread destruction of property—must not be repeated. President Premadasa has made serious proposals to bring peace to his country. This is not an easy task, given the pressures that the Sri Lankan Government faces from both extremist Singhalese and Tamil movements. However, signs of hope are not absent; extremist Singhalese violence has been curbed, and the most violent of the Tamil guerrilla groups, the LTTE, has at least stated a willingness to transform itself into a legitimate political party.

The people of Sri Lanka are old and good friends of the United States. We must not overlook them in their time of need. I urge the administration to extend whatever good offices it can to help bring the conflict in Sri Lanka to an end.

Sri Lanka is a lush and fertile island. Its population is skilled and educated, and their religious and cultural traditions are among the richest in the world. Under peaceful conditions, Sri Lanka could be a model for prosperity and quality of life in Asia. I hope that the next anniversary of Sri Lanka's independence will be a true celebration of the achievement of peace and security for all its inhabitants.

EQUAL JUSTICE AND OPPORTUNITY FOR ALL

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be an original cosponsor of the Civil Rights Act of 1990. This bipartisan legislation sends a signal that is loud and clear—Congress and the American people do not intend to move backward and reverse our Nation's commitment to equal justice and opportunity for all.

Recently, the rights of minorities and women in the workplace have come under assault. In a series of decisions by the Supreme Court we have witnessed a significant and alarming retreat in the judicial construction of Federal anti-discrimination laws. The retreat has left major gaps in our Federal job discrimination laws and made it increasingly more difficult for victims of unlawful discrimination to prevail on civil rights claims in the courts.

The battle for equal rights is not won and, therefore, the Congress must not retreat. Today, we offer a legislative response to remedy the court's decisions. This legislation seeks to restore and strengthen civil rights laws that ban discrimination in employment.

The Civil Rights Act of 1990 will work to protect Americans against race discrimination on the job and in private contracts. The legislation would facilitate prompt and orderly challenges to consent decrees and court orders, as well as make it unequivocally clear that job bias is illegal. The act does not mandate any quotas.

According to the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, "as a result of the Supreme Court's rulings claims involving racial and ethnic harassment and discrimination have been dismissed at the rate of one-per-day". Victims of employment discrimination should not have to find it more difficult, time-consuming, and expensive to seek justice under the law. It simply is not tolerable.

For the past 25 years America has made steady progress toward eliminating discrimination. The Civil Rights Act of 1990 will tear down the remaining barriers to equal opportunity and move America forward in the battle to end discrimination.

REPORT ON AFFORDABLE HOUSING FIELD HEARING

HON. DAVID E. PRICE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, on January 26 in Raleigh, NC, the House Banking Committee's Subcommittee on Housing and Community Development held a hearing on affordable housing. I chaired the hearing, in the absence of our distinguished chairman, HENRY GONZALEZ, and it was my privilege to have our colleagues STEVE BARTLETT, PETER HOAGLAND, and LIZ PATTERSON participate in this hearing.

The hearing assessed the housing problems in North Carolina and the creative and innovative solutions devised by local governments, nonprofits and the private sector to combat these problems. Furthermore, it gave the subcommittee an opportunity to evaluate what the Federal Government's role might be in aiding and complementing such efforts as we craft a housing policy for the 1990's.

The first panel looked at the partnerships which have arisen between the public and private sector in North Carolina. On this panel, we heard from Mr. Frank Gailor, president of First Federal Savings and Loan and chairman of the Triangle Housing Partnership; the Honorable Jonathan Howes, Mayor of Chapel Hill; Mr. Dennis Rash, president of the NCNB Community Development Corporation; Ms. Linda Shaw, executive director of the North Carolina Low Income Housing Coalition; Mr. Mark Tipton, chairman of the Whistler Corporation and first vice-president of the National Association of Home Builders; Mr. Greg Warren, executive director of the Downtown Housing Improvement Corporation; and Mr. John W. Winters, Sr., president of the John H. Winters Company.

From this panel, we heard about a number of innovative housing programs which have brought home ownership within the reach of people earning as little as $17,000 a year. However, resources are limited for these programs and we need to make them more widely available if we are going to reverse the decline of home ownership in this country.

We also learned about the importance of counseling in these programs. Both lenders and nonprofit groups argued that low downpayment loans are feasible if you have a strong counseling system in place for potential homebuyers. Mr. Gailor reported that First Federal had made $7.6 million in no-downpayment loans without one default.

Unfortunately, we were also told that we have not yet developed an effective delivery system for providing housing opportunities for our very poorest citizens. HUD's latest estimate of the State's need for assisted rental housing is 115,562 units based on the current number of inadequately house income-eligible renter households. We must do a better job of helping lower income families find adequate housing at affordable prices.

The second panel focused on the problem facing North Carolina's rural areas. This panel was composed of Ms. Marjorie Ellison, director of the Community Empowerment Project of the Rural Advancement Fund; Ms. Patricia Garrett, chair of the North Carolina Housing Partnership; Mr. Billy Ray Hall, president of the North Carolina Rural Economic Development Center; and Ms. Patsy Morton, executive director of the North Carolina Manufactured Housing Institute.

Rural areas have many of the same affordability problems as urban areas but, in addition, families are much more likely to live in substandard housing in rural areas. One reflection of this is the fact that North Carolina has the unenviable honor of ranking No. 1 in the number of homes with outhouses.

Developing the partnerships to solve these problems is more complicated because of the limited technical and administrative capacities in many rural areas. The witnesses reported that in many of the Farmers Home Administration offices, it was very difficult to get these offices to aggressively pursue or use housing dollars for their area. This means that in some of the neediest rural areas, FmHA programs are being underutilized.

In addition, the witnesses noted that the fiscal and administrative capabilities of nonprofits and local governments in rural areas were limited. This contributes to the inability of rural areas to put together many of the same affordable housing deals as in urban areas. Unfortunately, both the FmHA and capacity problems appear to be most drastic in the poorest rural areas.

The last panel focused on Government-assisted housing and its role in affordable housing solutions. We heard from Mr. Floyd Carter, executive director of the Raleigh Housing Authority; Mr. Bob Kucab, executive director of the North Carolina Housing Finance Agency; and Ms. Elaine Ostrowski of the Greensboro Housing Authority.

This panel first discussed the problem of drugs in public housing. I was heartened by both Mr. Carter's and Ms. Ostrowski's commitment to resolving this problem. Both authorities have developed excellent programs to fight drug trafficking and abuse in their housing developments. They have combined the resources of the police departments, social service agencies, and local residents to implement programs addressing law enforcement issues as well as drug prevention and treatment and job training. In addition, a variety of sports and cultural activities have been developed to provide alternatives to the drug trade for the area's youth.

Related to these programs, both directors endorsed the scatter site approach to public housing which limits any development to one hundred units and places them in different places throughout a city or town. From their experiences, larger developments lower the quality of life in public housing units. And their impression was that drug problems were more likely to occur in larger developments than in smaller ones.

The panel also heard criticisms about the Federal preferences regulations that give priority in public housing waiting lists to those who pay more than 50 percent of their income in rent, who are involuntarily displaced, or who are living in substandard housing. At first glance, this rule seems to be fair, but the housing authorities argued persuasively that too stringent a preference for the poorest of the poor tends to push out those working families that may be good role models and may destabilize entire developments.

The public housing authorities also testified that there was a need for more public housing construction funds in the Federal budget. These funds would allow authorities to respond with an appropriate mix of aid to families seeking help. In some tight rental markets, vouchers cannot be used. Regardless of the form of the assistance, there is a large need in Greensboro and Raleigh, with waiting lists totaling at least 7,000.

These witnesses are a talented and committed group of housing advocates, and the hearing was a very stimulating and constructive one. We are fortunate to have such people in North Carolina because we need them with the grave housing challenges that lie ahead.

The hearing demonstrated that, if we are to solve these problems, we must take a multifaceted approach which strengthens the partnership and links between the public and private sector. We must in this session of Congress begin to lay the foundations for the Federal Government's role in this partnership. It is clear that we must be flexible, willing to experiment, not simply wedded to established approaches but free to shift dollars into areas where they will do the most good.

I urge my colleagues to study the transcript of these hearings. I believe it will provide guidance on many of the important housing issues that we face in this session of Congress.

SECTIONS OF ALASKA OIL PIPELINE FACING COSTLY REPAIRS FOR CORROSION

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I would also like to take this opportunity to rise in strong support of the Presidential task force provisions of title VIII of H.R. 1465.

The Presidential task force is designed to substantially improve both Federal and State oversight of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline System [TAPS]. Significantly, title VIII provides for a comprehensive, independent engineering audit of TAPS.

In the wake of the Exxon Valdez spill, this enhanced scrutiny of TAPS is essential in order to assure the integrity of a delivery system which transports 25 percent of the oil produced in our Nation.

Mr. Speaker, a recent article from the Los Angeles Times provides ample evidence of the necessity of title VIII's provisions for an audit and improved oversight of TAPS. As the article by Bob Secter and William C. Rempel explains in detail, extensive corrosion problems on the pipeline could result in a $1.5-billion repair bill over the next several years.

I insert an article, "Sections of Alaska Oil Pipeline Facing Costly Repairs for Corrosion," into the RECORD:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Feb. 4, 1990]

SECTIONS OF ALASKA OIL PIPELINE FACING COSTLY REPAIRS FOR CORROSION

(By Bob Secter and William C. Rempel)

ANCHORAGE.—Though oil executives once swore that it wouldn't happen, corrosion is eating through critical sections of the 800-mile-long Trans-Alaska Pipeline, threatening its structural integrity and forcing an expensive and unprecedented crash program of repairs.

Pipeline officials were in Juneau last week to explain a rehabilitation plan that could cost the oil pipeline's operators $1.5 billion and perhaps more over the next five years. That in turn could cost the Alaska state government hundreds of millions of dollars in oil royalties and related revenues.

Federal officials also are concerned because the nation's foreign trade deficit could increase by more than $1 billion if the pipeline must be shut down for even a few days. Line operators have promised to complete repairs without disrupting oil flow for more than 2.5 days over the next 18 months, though federal regulators say they have heard that the interruption would be longer.

The Times has learned that the federal Office of Pipeline Safety is investigating possible violations of safety regulations. Inspection reports reviewed by The Times question the quality of installation, repair, maintenance and operations of the pipeline.

The reports of large-scale corrosion, coming on the heels of the environmentally devastating Exxon Valdez oilspill last March, have served here to heighten suspicion of Alyeska Pipeline Service Co., the oil industry consortium that runs the pipeline.

"They tell us they just got this state-of-the-art surveillance system, and that's why they found this," said Alaska Atty. Gen. Douglas B. Baily. "But we're not buying that story. This corrosion didn't just happen. They've had other technology to use."

Because every month of delay represented enormous losses to its owners, the pipeline was built under tremendous pressure to get the job done. Both federal records and regulators suggest now that the severity of corrosion problems might have been lessened and repair costs minimized had Alyeska heeded warnings from critics before completion, but rushed construction work in bad weather and been more aggressive in looking for problems once oil was flowing.

"In the oil business they always say 'pay me now or pay me later,' " said federal pipeline engineer Mark A. Reis, an inspector on the Alaskan line. "This is the 'pay me later.' This is the price of deferred maintenance."

Though company officials acknowledge difficulties, they insist that there is no crisis and that problems can be corrected without imperiling pipeline operations or the ecologically fragile tundra. "We aren't shutting down the line," said Bill Howitt, Alyeska's manager for engineering. "We're doing the repairs on the fly. We have sufficient early warning in this case . . . . We don't have pipeline integrity problems."

But Jack Overly, head of the Western regional division of the federal Office of Pipeline Safety, had a different view. "The extent of it we don't know," Overly said of the corrosion problem, "but it's big enough that it could affect the integrity of the pipeline."

Interviews with state, federal and company officials, as well as a check of federal records on the pipeline dating back to the early 1970s, indicate that:

Most of the corrosion was caused by the failure of protective coating and tape wraps, which many critics had warned were flawed long before the pipeline was finished.

Preparations for lab tests of corrosion protections were begun at the National Bureau of Standards before the pipeline started up. But the tests were never conducted.

Almost from the start, promises to conduct regular corrosion checks were not kept. During construction, the company said it would make regular runs with corrosion detecting "pigs," sensing devices designed that slide through the interior of the pipe and indicate thinning of the walls. Officials blamed technical problems, among them fears that a pig might get stuck and gum up the pipeline. Alyeska continued to develop more sophisticated pigs, but not until two years ago did equipment sensitive enough to detect significant amounts of corrosion come on-line.

Storage tank bottoms at the Valdez terminal are wearing through. Federal inspectors blame salty, untreated sea sand, which they say was used as landfill under the tanks in violation of normal construction principles. Since salt is highly corrosive, sea sand is usually washed with fresh water before it is used as a construction base. However, Alyeska officials insist that the tanks were built atop an asphalt base, not sand.

Corrosion is a slow process that weakens metal over years. And both federal and industry experts agree that, on the basis of information they now have, the corrosion problems on the Alaska pipeline pose no immediate threat to the environment or to pipeline operations.

Textbooks describe corrosion as an electrochemical phenomenon—nature's way of trying to return refined metals to their natural state. Electromagnetic currents flow naturally through the Earth and enter submerged pipelines. When buried metal comes in contact with water or soil, those substances conduct current off the metal, gradually degrading it by stripping away electrons.

For years, the oil and gas industry has tinkered with schemes to minimize or defeat the corrosion process. Though techniques vary, the primary weapons against corrosion are coatings and tapes to seal out moisture and so-called "cathodic protection" systems that divert the flow of natural current from the pipeline to sacrificial metals placed nearby, which bear the brunt of corrosive effects.

As an important backup, operators periodically run internal corrosion sensing pigs through the pipelines.

But it is the very adequacy of such safeguards—as Alyeska adapted them to the harsh, technologically challenging Arctic climate—that has been called into question by the latest findings.

The primary concern is that, if it is unchecked, corrosion could eventually weaken the half-inch-thick, 48-inch-diameter pipe wall and lead to a blowout, spewing thousands of barrels of crude oil onto pristine wilderness and forcing a shutdown of the line.

Until repairs can be completed, Alyeska has reduced pressure in the line by 20% in key locations. At the same time, the company has kept the oil flowing evenly at about 1.9 million barrels per day by injecting costly friction-reducing chemicals into the line.

Despite such precautions, investigations into corrosion, maintenance, operating procedures and repair programs have been launched by Alaskan officials as well as several federal agencies.

Alaska, where 85% to 90% of revenue in the state Treasury comes from oil-related income, has formally challenged Alyeska's plans to add corrosion repair costs to a complex formula used to determine the value of oil royalties and wellhead taxes. Baily estimated that such charges could cost Alaska $22 million in 1990 and "hundreds of millions of dollars" over the next five years. If negligence is to blame, then Alaska shouldn't lose a penny, Baily argued.

Meanwhile, The Times has learned, the Office of Pipeline Safety, part of the Transportation Department, may decide by spring, whether to cite Alyeska for violations of federal guidelines. OPS is the principle regulatory overseer for 155,000 miles of gas and oil lines across the country.

Though, the OPS probe is not complete, staff reports have suggested that Alyeska may have violated federal safety regulations by failing to adequately maintain portions of its cathodic protection system. Another possible violation, according to the same reports, could involve improper welding and repair procedures used to install containment sleeves—in effect, large metal bandages—welded over problem areas on the pipeline.

If the OPS does cite Alyeska for violating any guidelines, such an action could hurt the company's public image far more than its bottom line. Short of ordering a shutdown, something regulators say is unnecessary and unlikely, the maximum penalty that could be levied against Alyeska would be a $500,000 fine.

Federal investigators say the company, under revamped ownership and management, is now moving aggressively to deal with the problem and appears willing to spend whatever it takes to overhaul a structure which, before its completion, planners said would never need a major overhaul. Alyeska has increased the number of corrosion engineers on its staff over the last year from about six to 75, according to OPS sources.

The $7.7 billion line was built by a partnership of oil firms, among them industry giants Sohio, Arco, Exxon and Mobil. Three years ago, Sohio was absorbed by British Petroleum PLC. Through that takeover, the British conglomerate now owns slightly more than 50% of Alyeska and has become its dominant force.

Alyeska's Howitt said that in 1988 and 1989, runs with the new, more sensitive "super-pigs" identified 827 so-called "anomalies"—spots along the line that may indicate corrosion. But only closer scrutiny, generally digging up suspect spots of buried pipeline, can confirm whether anomalies indicate real problems or are merely glitches recorded by the sensing device.

So far, Howitt said, 308 suspect sites have been excavated, including all the company deemed most critical. Inspections at 30 of those locations revealed corrosion "so extensive that there was a danger the line couldn't support maximum pressures," he said. Protective sleeves were welded to those spots.

Though half the pipeline is buried and half sits above ground, Howitt said all potential corrosion problems detected so far involve buried sections.

Howitt said the anomalies under investigation are not sprinkled throughout the pipeline but are bunched largely in four sections totaling about 13.5 miles.

Howitt blamed most of the corrosion problems on a failure of the protective coating system applied to pipes, including both the outer tape wraps and an epoxy sealer known as Scotchkote 202. In testimony Wednesday before the Alaska Senate Oil and Gas Committee, Howitt declared: "If the tape outer wrap had not failed, we would not be here today."

In an interview, Howitt cited several theories that could have contributed to coating problems: a bad batch of Scotchkote; bad pipes; shoddy application of sealer; installation during bouts of snow, rain and temperatures sometimes dipping to minus 30 degrees below zero damage from rocks as ditches were filled in while pipes were laid, and even exposure to corrosive salt air when the raw pipes were shipped across oceans from suppliers abroad.

Alyeska, he said, has scheduled a minimum of 2.5 days of service interruptions during the spring of 1991 to replace at least nine miles of the most suspect pipe, in the Atigun River flood plain zone about 150 miles south of Prudhoe Bay, with new material. OPS officals, however, said they had been told that the shutdown could last 10 days and said Alyeska had ordered 22 miles of new pipe as a backup.

Such a program represents a major turnaround for Alyeska, which long had resisted shutdowns of any kind. In June, 1979, for example, 5,500 barrels of oil squirted from the line when ground subsidence buckled two underground sections, one of them in the Atigun mountain pass, another area where corrosion problems are suspected. Instead of replacing the damaged portions, Alyeska plugged the leaks by welding sleeves over the bad pipe.

Defending the procedure in a later report on the incidents, the company pointed to what it said was the "infeasibility" of taking the line out of service to replace a cylinder of pipe. Such an operation, the company said, would have forced a shutdown of more than 10 days for each leak—far longer than Alyeska now says it should take in 1991 for a much bigger job—resulting in a loss of 25.6 million barrels of production.

"To replace that 25.6 million barrels on the world spot market would have increased the national imbalance of payments by about $1.25 billion," the company wrote in a follow-up report. "Hence, the decision to not take the pipeline out of service was in the national interest as well as the interest of the owners of the Trans Alaska Pipeline."

At present, the company is also planning major overhauls of several of the dozen pump stations that keep oil moving through the line. Corrosion has attacked internal piping at many of the facilities. Repairs are also targeted for the corroded Valdez terminal tanks.

Estimates of repair costs vary widely. Howitt guessed that the Atigun pipe-replacement program alone would cost $180 million. Reis, a federal inspector on the line, said Alyeska staff had told him that the price tag would run conservatively in the area of $250 million.

Baily, the Alaska attorney general, says he has been told that the entire repair and maintenance bill over the next 5 years could reach $1.8 billion. This is significant to the state because Alaska stands to lose money if repair costs are subtracted from the net value of crude oil shipped to the Lower 48 states. Alyeska puts the five-year figure at a slightly more modest $1.5 billion.

"I believe we have a middle-aged pipeline that's getting up to old age," Howitt said. "It can last indefinitely if it's carefully maintained, but like a house or a car, the older it gets the more expensive it's going to be to maintain."

Howitt said Alyeska never expected the pipeline to remain corrosion free, but some critics remember it differently. They say that when it was trying to win construction approval, Alyeska said the line's planning was so intricate and quality so good that there was little likelihood it would suffer serious problems until the North Slope oil fields began to play out. "It was the general understanding that the pipeline had a useful life of 30 years—and that meant 30 years without major renovation," Baily said.

Ever since its conception in 1969, the Alaskan pipeline project was nagged with doubts about safety, quality and ecological impacts. It was the largest and most technologically complex construction project of any kind ever attempted. Engineers had little experience building a pipeline in such a harsh and fragile climate.

Experts had honest differences of opinion over construction methods. One of those differences involved the Atigun Pass. Alyeska argued that it was safe to build the line above ground at that point. But federal regulators insisted that it be buried, a more expensive option, because of an avalanche threat that could topple the structure. Howitt now concedes that it would have been a mistake to put the pipeline above ground there.

Because of court challenges from enviromentalists and other opponents, groundbreaking didn't get under way until 1974. By then, an Arab oil embargo and soaring oil prices had exposed the nation's growing dependence on foreign fuel sources. That gave the Alaskan project a new sense of urgency.

"Back in '76 and '77, the attitude was that we will build this line at all costs," said George Tenely, the Washington-based director of the pipeline safety office. "The operator and the public got caught up in that passion to get that line going."

By 1975, serious doubts had already been raised about the Scotchkote protective epoxy. It began flaking and chipping off some stockpiled pipe cylinders. And, it was learned, other pipelines in the Lower 48 states had experienced similar problems with the product. Alyeska sued the manufacturer, but the case was settled out of court.

Rather than scrape off the suspect Scotchkote and start fresh, Alyeska won federal approval to add an extra layer of moisture-resistant tape. Critics at the time complained that the tape had not been adequately tested. Even worse, they charged, taping over a "disbonding" layer of epoxy might create an effect similar to wallpaper buckling and popping after being slapped over peeling paint. That could permit moisture and corrosion-enhacing bacteria to seep under the tape and migrate to bare metal.

Whatever controversy the corrosion saferguards were generating, there was some doubt that they were necessary at all. The company argued, and some experts agreed, that a pipeline buried in permafrost would not have problems because frozen ground is a very poor conductor of the electromagnetic currents that promote corrosion.

But because the pipeline carries oil heated to around 140 degrees, it altered the characteristics of the soil. Bill Wilson, who monitored the construction as a consultant for the U.S. Department of the Interior, said the hot oil flow gradually created a "thermal bulb" of thawed subsoil that does conduct electricity.

"We never agreed with the theory that corrosion wasn't possible in the Arctic," said Wilson, who today is an official with a North Carolina gas company.

Wilson said the anti-corrosion approaches employed by Alyeska may have been unproved, but were far from shoddy or unwise and seemed "perfectly logical" from a technological standpoint.

HARRY BELAFONTE

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, while we were away for the end of the year recess, the Washington Times, ran a feature story of Harry Belafonte, by Hap Erstein. I submit the article for review by Members of the House of Representatives. Attached is a copy of the article.

[From the Washington Times, Nov. 27, 1989]

HARRY BELAFONTE—MR. CALYPSO HAS GREAT DAY-O AHEAD

(By Hap Erstein)

"A critic once wrote that it was my lot that were I to do 'Othello,' and if I were in fact to be the world's greatest Othello, right after killing Desdemona my horror is that someone from the balcony would yell out, 'Sing "Banana Boat."' "

Day O.

The speaker, of course, is Harry Belafonte, the one-man calypso movement of the 1950s. He offers the self-effacing anecdote without a trace of anger. For while he has moved on from being the champion of Caribbean melodies to other causes, to the multiple hyphenate roles of actor-producer-writer-spokesman-philanthropist-activist, a part of him remains on that banana boat.

It is likely that the sounds of calypso will be heard this weekend, when Mr. Belafonte will be one of five artists receiving the Kennedy Center Honor. Presented for outstanding lifetime achievement for "their contributions to the cultural life of the nation," the many-colored ribbons and medallions will also go to dancer-choreographer Alexandra Danilova, film and stage actress Claudette Colbert, musical theater star Mary Martin and classical composer-educator William Schuman. (The Washington Times will profile them all this week.)

While his most recent concert appearances have featured the music of South Africa, the 62-year-old, gray-haired, youth-fully smooth-skinned Mr. Belafonte makes a point of including a crowd-pleasing acknowledgement of his past—a bit of "The Banana Boat Song" and maybe "Jamaica Farewell."

"Day-O," he intones musically with his unmistakable, lightly gravelly voice. "That's a very pleasurable sound. But I think it's also cathartic. I think those two words—'Day-O'—and the sound that you make releases something in people and makes them smile."

He would be smiling himself now, in fact he would be out on the road performing, but Mr. Belafonte is in post-surgery pain. On crutches and impatient with them after an operation to realign his leg bones, he still winces as he moves about his vast Upper West Side apartment full of museum-quality African and Third World art.

The ailment stems from a childhood automobile accident. "Unbeknownst to us all," he says, "it had healed incorrectly, causing my body to wear out cartilage on one side. One day, I woke up and one part of my leg was just bone-to-bone. It was excruciating." Recuperation has meant the cancellation of a concert tour, but Mr. Belafonte is determined to stride down the Hall of States on his way to Sunday evening's Kennedy Center Gala without those metal walking supports.

Harry Belafonte has spent so much of his life mixing entertainment and social activism, show business and human rights fights, that distinctions between them have lost their meaning to him. "Everything in my art, everything in my life, everything in my circumstance, is social and political," he notes. "To do art that wasn't connected to it would leave me with a great sense of unfulfillment."

By that measure, here is a highly fulfilled individual. In the '60s, Mr. Belafonte organized the entertainment community in its part of the civil rights marches in Selma and Montgomery, Ala., as well as the Freedom March on Washington. He was the first entertainer appointed by President Kennedy to be a cultural adviser to the Peace Corps and, two years ago, was designated a goodwill ambassador to the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), performing concerts around the world on its behalf.

Mr. Belafonte helped inspire the creation of USA For Africa, a charitable aid group. Through that organization he set in motion "We Are the World," a musical message that helped raise millions of dollars for hunger relief. Even the lilting, finger-snapping ditties of the Caribbean that he introduced to America were not without their political side.

"When I sing the folk songs of the Caribbean, I speak to the dignity of the workers," he explains. "It's music that excites me, and the fact that I want to sing words that touch the human heart and make the mind work a bit is almost an advantage. That's my mission."

He acknowledges there are those who have hummed his tunes, even sung along, without thinking about the lyrics—of the hardships of the boat workers toiling all night on a drink of rum.

"They're there, but people extract what they want," Mr. Belafonte says with a shrug. "If I go to a library and pass by Shakespeare, it's not because it isn't there. It's not the fault of the library, and it's not the fault of Shakespeare."

For those who listened to his calypso sagas, they told not only of social ills but also of great natural beauty. This island troubadour is credited with stirring American interest in the islands and with the Caribbean tourism boom in the '50s and '60s.

Young Harry Belafonte went to Jamaica with his mother as a child, living there for five years, working on the plantations and in the cane fields, soaking up the musical rhythms that would be his ticket to fame. As a teen, he returned to his native Harlem to attend high school. But he was dyslexic and reading was a great source of frustration for him, so Mr. Belafonte quit school before graduating and joined the navy.

"To them, I wasn't living up to my potential and I was lazy, or whatever they wanted to call it," he remembers. "Nobody understood dyslexia then or any other kind of disorder. I wanted to get away to a place where I could be someone, where I could start over."

Although he never got that high school diploma, Mr. Belafonte has received a handful of honorary degrees from such institutions as Morehouse College and the State University of New York. Earlier this month, he was honored by Washington's Lab School for his achievements in the face of dyslexia.

After World War II, he returned home to find opportunities for a partially educated black man were limited. While he worked as a janitor's assistant in an apartment building, a resident tipped him with two tickets to the theater. That resident was Clarice Taylor, a founding actress of the American Negro Theatre.

Attending her performance changed Mr. Belafonte's life, for while he was waiting politely to thank her, he got involved with the set crew's dismantling of the scenery, and he became hooked.

"I wound up staying in that theater until 3 in the morning. And I couldn't wait to get back the next day," he recalls. "I found the magic of this thing when the lights went down and the curtain opened and people began to speak. I became totally overwhelmed. It had such an emotional impact."

So he became an actor, appearing first in the Irish drama "Juno and the Paycock." "I, who couldn't read, had to go through reading Sean O'Casey—in Gaelic yet, or an Irish brogue," he laughs. "I sweat through that, and it developed in me a desire to want to learn to read, more vociferously and more in depth. And to acquire knowledge."

Soon after, while appearing in a workshop revue, he got his first chance to sing a song he had written. Later, when his G.I. Bill money ran out, an admiring club owner hired him to sing a few numbers at intermission at a local jazz spot, the Royal Roost.

Was he apprehensive about his night club debut? "I threw up every five minutes," Mr. Belafonte admits. "I was a nervous wreck."

Between sets of his jazz songs, he would duck into the other clubs in Greenwich Village, listening to such singers as Pete Seeger, Burl Ives and Leadbelly. "These guys were singing about John Henry and about Joe Hill, these songs that spoke such a dynamic," he says. "It was just incredible—socially significant material being sung in a club by folk singers."

Before long, he too became quite popular, was discovered by the uptown crowd and was wooed for the legitimate stage and the movies. He made his Broadway debut in the "John Murray Anderson's Almanac" revue in 1953 and won a Tony Award. Director Otto Preminger swooped down and gave him the leading male role in the movie version of "Carmen Jones," a melodramatic retelling of the Bizet opera.

RCA signed Mr. Belafonte to a pop recording contract, and after a few years, he had an idea to sell them. "When I told them that I wanted to do 'The Banana Boat' and songs of the Caribbean, they thought I was absolutely nuts. And they were probably right, except that it was the first record ever to sell a million copies."

The career of Harry Belafonte is a series of firsts and barrier-breaking milestones. He was, for instance, the first black person to win an Emmy Award and the first black producer in television.

He has risen to a plateau of celebrity where awards and honors are a frequent occurrence, but that doesn't mean he is slowing down. On the contrary. Last year, Mr. Belafonte released his first record album in the United States in 16 years. Called "Paradise in Gazankulu," it features the music of South Africa, the nation whose policies of apartheid he has denounced so loudly and adamantly.

For his stands and statements, he is deemed "persona non grata" in South Africa, and his visa requests are rejected consistently. His musical collaborators went there to record the accompaniment for the album and had to smuggle out the tapes when their connection to Mr. Belafonte was discovered.

On his agenda for the future are many more socially conscious projects. One is a television miniseries called "The Mandelas: A South African Saga," which he will coproduce with Oscar winner Sydney Pollack. Scheduled to star for him are Jane Fonda, Sidney Poitier and Marlon Brando.

Ahead for his production company is "Sister Thea," a movie about a rabble-rousing black nun from Mississippi, being developed for Whoopi Goldberg. Also close to his heart is "The Murder of Hound Dog Bates," a new film that could mark his directorial debut.

"As the executive producer," he says, "I'm making sure that I've asked everybody who would be really qualified to direct it. Hopefully, they'll say no."

Another long-standing dream he is pursuing is the creation of a new national black repertory theater. "If we don't develop something that will be responsible for tending the best that's in us and giving us some place to be able to display that, then we will lose it all," he says.

"The rep company would train tomorrow's actors as well as present black-oriented plays with some of today's ranking black stars. "It would be the home of the elite of our profession—Lou [Gossett] and Sidney [Poitier] and James [Earl Jones] and Cicely [Tyson] and Toni Morrison and August Wilson and what-not."

As Mr. Belafonte sees it, the productions would tour major cities, including Washington, under cosponsorship arrangements with non-profit theaters and financial backing from major corporations. "I think we might just pull it off."

It is a tall order, but one that could only happen with the persuasive push of a Harry Belafonte. Although he is humbled by the thought of the Kennedy Center Honor, he scoffs at the suggestion that his career is on the wane or that he is old enough to receive recognition for lifetime achievement.

"When I heard they had nominated me, and I got this letter, the first reaction was a kind of smile and a pleasantness about it," he says. "And right on the heels of that was panic. Because we have all these things by which we measure antiquity.

"When I looked and I saw Fred Astaire and all the others who have gotten it, I thought, 'Gee, when I get to be their age, how wonderful it would be to have the nation honor you and for your country to say, "We love you." But I've got a while to go yet' That's what I thought.

"I thought, 'If it ever comes my way, by that time it will have gotten to all the important blacks. I'll be at the bottom of the line, so by default they'll have to give it to me.'"

In a more serious tone, Mr. Belafonte speaks with a certain pride—and a little amazement—about this quasi-governmental tribute to him, because in the early '50s he was one of many entertainers who were hounded and blacklisted for belonging to alleged Communist-leaning organizations.

"All those things which seemed so right and so innocent, in a country that said you have the right to do all that, and to then become victimized by the larger society and to be denied work," he says, describing those days. "Well, to have stayed the course and to wake up one day to find myself respected and like and that all things eventually righted themselves. It is overwhelming."

"I've never hidden who I am. I'm not a Jekyll and Hyde. I'm right up front," Mr. Belafonte adds softly, but with pride. "And now, this stuff, I'm being rewarded for it by my country. By my peers. They're saying. 'Hey, thanks. We like what you did.' I'm very encouraged by that."

Encouraged enough to get back into the fray of battle? "Hey, I never seem to be able to get out of the fray." He pauses and sighs. "I don't relish a lot of this. I really don't. But I do what I can do. I am an artist. I am a producer. I will do this because I believe in its humanity. I think people who are exposed to this humanity will find something enlightening and fulfilling and meaningful about it. Why shouldn't I be part of that process?"

And with his crutches thrown aside and his Kennedy Center Honor medallion in his pocket, Harry Belafonte undoubtedly will be on the run again, to sing and to speak out another day-O.

WILKES COLLEGE CELEBRATES BEGINNING NEW ERA AS WILKES UNIVERSITY

HON. PAUL E. KANJORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Speaker, Wilkes College was founded in 1933 as Bucknell Junior College, a branch of Bucknell University, to serve as a 2-year institution offering associate degrees. In 1947, Wilkes College expanded its curriculum and campus and became a 4-year independent college.

On February, 16, 1990, the Wilkes College community will celebrate the beginning of a new and exciting era as Wilkes University, a 4-year university offering both undergraduate and graduate degree programs. As a proud member of the Wilkes University Board of Trustees and a life long resident of the Wilkes-Barre area, I have seen the growth and development of Wilkes College. It has evolved into an institute of educational excellence.

The process began in September 1985 when the Wilkes College Board of Trustees met and realized that the college had grown beyond the definition of a small, liberal arts college but had become a comprehensive graduate and undergraduate institution offering a wide curriculum. The college prepared and submitted an application to the secretary of education for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania late in 1988. As defined by the Pennsylvania Higher Education Act, a university is "a multiunit institution with a complex structure, promotion of scholarship, preservation and discovery of knowledge, (and) research * * *."

Wilkes University has lived up to the requirements of the board of education. The university offers both undergraduate and graduate degrees. In fact, the enrollment of the graduate program, which was introduced in the 1960's, is almost equal to that of the full-time undergraduate program. Wilkes is divided into three schools, further meeting requirements of the board. These divisions are the School of Liberal Arts and Human Services, the School of Science and Engineering, and the School of Business and Public Affairs. With this quality and comprehensive curriculum, Wilkes University is preparing its students to enter into the working world with the knowledge and ability to greatly contribute to our society.

Situated in the heart of northeastern Pennsylvania, Wilkes University has become an integral part of Wilkes-Barre and its surrounding communities. The university has worked to foster a cooperative relationship with area business leaders and community organizations. Wilkes University has had a magnetic effect on attracting business and industry to the Wilkes-Barre area. The faculty and administration of Wilkes are committed to providing men and women with a quality education and preparing them to work with our growing labor force to build a better tomorrow for Wyoming Valley.

It is with great pleasure and honor that I congratulate Wilkes University on its new status and on its commitment to excellence. I firmly believe that our educators may be our most valuable resource, and that Wilkes University is dedicated to enhancing the lives of its students. I know my colleagues in the House of Representatives will join me in wishing Wilkes University continued success as they enter into a new and exciting era.

CITIES NEED HELP IN THE WAR ON DRUGS

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the first of a series of bills I plan to sponsor to help the Nation's cities fight the war on drugs.

Two weeks ago I appeared on a panel at the special drug task force meeting of the Conference of Mayors. Louisville Mayor Jerry Abramson is a member of the drug task force and he has been keeping me posted on the mayors' concerns.

The war on drugs affects all areas of our Nation, but the major battlegrounds are in and around our cities. Most local governments—like Louisville and Jefferson County—have stepped up their antidrug and anticrime activities on their own.

Louisville and Jefferson County—even with their soon-to-be merged narcotic squads—are like most localities in that they cannot mount an effective war on drugs without adequate Federal funds. The State and Local Law Enforcement Assistance Grant Program, authorized by the Crime Subcommittee on which I serve, is an important weapon for local governments in this fight. It has already helped Louisville and Jefferson County fund an effective street sales program and a drug testing program for those on probation or parole.

Because I believe that local governments are already financing the lion's share of the frontline war on drugs in our urban areas—and should not be asked to increase their costshare match—I am introducing legislation today to authorize a continuation of the 75 percent to 25 percent Federal/local cost-sharing formula for this important law enforcement grant program. The formula is slated to change to 50 percent and 50 percent at the end of this fiscal year when the temporary extension in the fiscal year 1990 Commerce-Justice-State appropriations bill expires. Unless current law is extended, many local governments will be hard pressed to meet this increased match and may be precluded from the program.

I also plan to introduce legislation in coming weeks which will provide local governments greater flexibility in applying for and using this grant money. Local governments currently have to apply for this money through State capitols—a procedure which causes delays and inefficiencies and which often precludes local governments from setting their own priorities. In line with the position of Louisville Mayor Jerry Abramson and the Mayors' Conference, my legislation will assure this funding is sent directly to local governments.

I hope my colleagues in the House will join me in helping the cities battle the drug scourge.

CONGRESSMAN KILDEE CONGRATULATES RONALD T. POLSGROVE, OPTIMIST OF THE DECADE

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I bring to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives the accomplishments of Mr. Ronald T. Polsgrove of my hometown, Flint, MI. For his endless commitment and dedication to the West Flint Optimist Club spanning over 20 years, he has earned himself the title "Optimist of the Decade." In recognition of this achievement, Mr. Polsgrove's fellow Optimists will hold a dinner in his honor on February 13, 1990.

Since first joining the West Flint Optimist Club in May 1969, Mr. Polsgrove has had a perfect attendance record for the club's meetings during the last 18 years. As an officer of the West Flint Optimist Club, he has served as a member of the board of directors for 14 of the last 20 years, and has served twice as president of the club, from 1972–73 and again from 1982–83.

Over the last two decades, Mr. Polsgrove has involved himself in almost every activity the Optimists have undertaken to improve the social and educational opportunities for the young people of Flint—particularly the students at the Michigan School for the Deaf, located in Flint. Year after year, Mr. Polsgrove has not only organized but also participated in the Optimists' sporting events for the deaf students, as well as the club's annual Christmas party for the Michigan School for the Deaf. He has also worked on the Optimists' oratorial contests, bike safety programs and the triathlon event, which the club sponsors with the Flint Young Men's Christian Association. Mr. Polsgrove has also given generously of his time for the club's fundraising activities.

Because of his selfless service with the West Flint Optimist Club, Mr. Polsgrove has received numerous awards for his hard work and commitment to achieving the goals of the Optimists. In 1979 and 1980, he received the Golden Circle award from Optimist International. During his second presidency, the West Flint Optimist Club became an Honor Club and Mr. Polsgrove was awarded the International Club President's Award.

His dedication and commitment to the West Flint Optimist Club over the last 20 years has truly made Ronald T. Polsgrove a "Friend to the Youth" of Flint, MI. He has already twice been designated "Optimist of the Year." It is now entirely fitting and proper that his fellow Flint Optimists should honor Mr. Polsgrove with the Optimist of the Decade award.

EARMARK PEACE DIVIDEND FOR DEFICIT REDUCTION

HON. DOUG BARNARD, JR.

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Speaker, on November 16, 1989, Secretary of Defense Richard Cheney announced that, because the Warsaw Pact was becoming "a very different animal," the United States could reduce its defense spending. Soon thereafter, Members of Congress began clamoring over the extent of the reductions to be made in defense spending and the best use to be made of the budget cuts.

As one of the more conservative Members of the House in fiscal matters, I believe that this budget windfall, or peace dividend as it has come to be called, should be used exclusively for reducing the budget deficit. I would like to take this opportunity to commend Representative JOHN PORTER for introducing a resolution to do just that and to announce that I will cosponsor his bill.

I have supported the balanced budget amendment for many years and have voted for other budget-cutting measures such as the Gramm-Rudman deficit reduction bill and a comprehensive package sponsored by the Grace Commission caucus. My voting record over the past 13 years bears out that I have supported all efforts to bring fiscal responsibility to Congress.

By using the peace dividend to reduce the budget deficit, we will be helping to reduce interest rates and to encourage private investment. We must seize this opportunity to restore the vitality that the United States economy will need to compete with Japan and the emerging powers of Europe.

America's private saving rate is a dismal 6 percent of the gross national product; Japan's is an impressive 16 percent. At this rate, the United States cannot hope to provide capital for private sector investment, particularly if we in Congress continue to borrow half of the savings to finance the Federal deficit.

Devoting the future defense savings to eradicating the Federal deficit is the best investment we can make of our peace dividend. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring Representative PORTER's bill which would provide for the defense cuts to be used exclusively for deficit reduction. We owe it to our children and our grandchildren to ease the burden that an enormous national debt imposes.

COMMUNITY DRUG FIGHTING WORKS

HON. THOMAS M. FOGLIETTA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of my colleagues the following article. It was written by a lawyer in my district who articulates the frustrations and hopes of a community working to reclaim their streets from the drug dealers and users who have taken over their neighborhoods. The effort illustrated in the article is hardly unique. Groups across the country are taking back their neighborhoods, street by street, block by block.

I have sponsored a bill, H.R. 3336, to establish a grant program to support and sustain the valiant efforts these groups are making. These groups are on the front lines fighting the war on drugs. They need our help. I urge all Members to read the article and help these groups by becoming a cosponsor of H.R. 3336:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Jan. 19, 1990]

ON THE ANTI-DRUG PATROL, THE VICTORIES ARE SMALL

(By John M. Myers)

Why would anyone waste his or her time, catch a certain cold and ruin a weekend by standing outside on some of the busiest drug corners in the city until the wee hours of the morning to try to take back one corner from the drug dealers for one night?

That's what I have been doing for the last few months, and I am not sure why.

Some of the folks with whom I stand there really believe we can make a difference. Some say we are making a difference. I believe that we don't, we won't and we can't—but I keep coming back to stand there, freeze and get inspired by the people I meet and what I see.

Whatever else it may or may not be, the experience of an anti-drug vigil is fascinating and, for me, deeply moving.

Ours is an ethnically, economically and sociologically mixed group. There must be at least one of every kind of person standing out on the corners through the night, blocking the street at our police barricade, stoking a barrel fire and making small talk. It is strange to think that this group composed of workers, doctors, teachers, lawyers, nuns, salespeople, students, the unemployed and retired would have enough in common to be able to make it through a night together, but we do, again and again.

Some nights I worry that my friends won't show and I'll have no one to talk to, but that has never happened. Whether it is the long-time Mantua resident who is just "tired" of the drug dealing, Kensington folks who are sick of being harassed by the dealers and junkies or my Spring Garden neighbors, there is a common bond. We are all sick and tired of nothing happening and simply aghast at what we see:

The unbelievable squalor of the crack houses we visit and serenade on our anti-crack house tour.

The arrogance of the teenage drug runners who love to show their machismo and wads of cash in what they believe is an effective taunt, but which simply underscores the problem.

The sad image of the stoned junkies, so far gone that they ask us for drugs (though we all wear white hard hats or coats emblazoned with "Philadelphia Anti-Drug Network"). When we tell them "the drug store is closed," they simply stumble away in bewilderment. These are the people you need to see if you think the answer is to legalize drugs.

The constant stream of New Jersey and suburban kids in their parents' cars, who are either "lost" or apartment shopping at 1 a.m.

But what is most striking about the vigils is not the squalor, the drug dealing or the ruthlessness of what we see. It is the dedication of the folks who participate.

I am a dilettante at this. I come out at 10 or 11 p.m., and I go home at 1 or 2 a.m. You see, I need my sleep. I have a family. I have a job. I have a social life.

And yet people, lots of them with the same or greater demands on their time and energy, are out there every week until 3 or 4 a.m., whenever and wherever there is an anti-drug vigil (under a citywide sharing arrangement, neighborhood groups travel to drug corners all over the city to lend support to one another).

Even the cops (who pay us special attention, thank goodness) seem a bit in awe. After all, we outlast the 4-12 shift, we have been coming back week after week, and we share our coffee.

Have we made a difference?

Not really.

I still can't take my children to the Roberto Clemente Playground, day or night; property crime continues to soar in the neighborhood; the dealers return as soon as we leave or move a few block away to peddle their wares.

On the other hand, on recent Friday and Saturday nights the Wallace-Mount Vernon "drug store" was closed. The only thing you could get at 18th and Wallace was a hot cup of coffee and a doughnut. At 17th and Mount Vernon you could have hope not dope, and the playground was empty (as it should be at 1 a.m.).

Even the drug-running cab drivers (18th and Wallace is the place to find a cab later Saturday night) seemed a bit more leery.

True, the rusting, vandalized cars where the dealers stash their drugs are still there, but the surburban drug buyers seemed genuinely startled and, I hope, frightened by our presence and the video and flash pictures we take of them. (If you live in Cherry Hill, Montgomery or Delaware Counties and you really think the problem is a "Philadelphia problem," come down here and see your kids on the weekends.)

But by Sunday, the dealers were back in business.

Perhaps it is completely ridiculous, utterly preposterous and delusional (at least) to think that people (with a small "p") can do anything about the drug problem; after all the police, FBI, DEA, CIA and everyone else have failed.

Still, I am encouraged by my fellow drug fighters who brave bad weather, lose sleep and suffer verbal abuse in an effort to make a difference, if only for a night.

And last week, I actually saw kids playing basketball at the playground.

INFANT MORTALITY LEGISLATION

HON. CARDISS COLLINS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, last week I joined my colleagues, Hon. HENRY WAXMAN, in introducing a series of Medicaid initiatives of which my infant mortality amendments are a part.

Before the high school class of 2006 even enters kindergarten, achievement will be denied through no fault of their own but because they are the innocent victims of poor parental care, low birthweight and lack of routine health care. It is one of the great ironies of our political system that the neglect of a sizeable population of children passes unnoticed.

"Quite simply, our social and political negligence is creating a generation of medically homeless children, for whom we will all pay a very high price in the years to come," said William H. Considine, head of the Children's Hospital Medical Center in Akron, OH.

The United States is one of the wealthiest nations on earth and we are having trouble taking care of our own children. Undoubtedly, we need to reshuffle our priorities and redirect our attention to this shameful dilemma of infant mortality. In 1988, the United States ranked 19th worldwide on infant survival. The number of children in this country who die before their 1st birthday is pain, while the number who die before their 5th birthday is heartwrenching.

Of the 3.8 million infants born in the United States in 1987, 40,000 died by their first birthday. In Illinois alone, in 1987, 2,102 infants died before their first birthday. The infant mortality rate was 11.6 deaths per 1,000 live births, as compared to 10.1 for the Nation.

Black infants have an even greater chance of dying before their first birthday than their white counterparts. In 1986, Chicago ranked 14th out of 18 major cities for black infant mortality with a rate of 22.9 deaths out of 100 live infants. This was compared to the 10.7 dead out of 1,000 live of white infants.

Poor and minority children are more likely to suffer health-related problems. For instance, among 15- to 19-year olds, black teenagers have a birth rate nearly three times that of white teenagers, and the babies are twice as likely to be born with low birthweights.

Undoubtedly, the sources of this unfortunate dilemma are low birthweight, lack of prenatal care, and lack of routine health care (i.e., immunization). Low birthweight (birth at less than 5.5 pounds) is the single largest cause of infant death and a major cause of disability. Excess low birthweight cost the Nation millions of dollars each year. In 1987, 13,370 or 7.4 percent of the 180,680 babies born in Illinois had a low birthweight. "If Johnny or Susie can't see properly or suffers the long-term effects of low birthweight, it's little wonder that the child can't read," said Robert H. Sweeney, president of the National Association of Children's Hospitals and Related Institutions.

There is no question that prenatal care can save lives and money. By detecting problems during pregnancy, prenatal care can help prevent low birthweight. Every $1 spent on prenatal care saves $3 off new born costs. In 1987, only 78.5 percent of women in Illinois had the benefit of critical prenatal care.

Finally, immunization can prevent eight diseases that threaten our children. Childhood immunizations save $10 for every $1 we spend. Our failure to reach infants and toddlers with vaccines has led to disease outbreaks and preventable disability and death. Immunization rates for children under 2 are declining while cases of measles, mumps and whooping cough, are on the rise. Last year, there were 2,551 cases of measles in Illinois. There must be something done to improve the health of our Nation's children. Today, only 60 percent of children younger than 4 years old have received the basic series of immunizations to avoid many common childhood diseases. While the 60 percent of white children were immunized against 6 or 7 diseases, the majority of nonwhite children only received immunization for measles 52 percent and DPT 51 percent.

The single most urgent directive is to improve children's access to health care. In 1986, uninsured children received 40 percent less physician care than their insured counterparts, regardless of their need for regular periodic assessments and immunizations. Today, one out of every five children has no health insurance, public or private. The key to ensuring care for our children lies in providing the necessary resources, public and/or private.

We must remember that our nation's future competitiveness depends on the workforce we have in place. The time to act to ensure the quality of that workforce is NOW, not in the year 2000.

I urge my colleagues to join me on this initiative.

REUNIFICATION OF CYPRUS

HON. OWEN B. PICKETT

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to draw renewed attention to the unresolved troubles which continue to plague the inhabitants of Cyprus.

As sweeping reform moves through Eastern Europe and old barriers are torn down, it is imperative we remember there is still a large Turkish military presence on the island of Cyprus which inhibits peaceful and effective governance for the Cypriot people. Since 1974, the 25,000 or more Turkish troops on the island have hindered the peace process and the path to creating a unified Cyprus. Greek Cypriots represent about two-thirds of the population, yet they are not permitted to freely move about in all parts of their island nation. They remain refugees in their own homeland. An infamous barrier 200 kilometers long, the "Green Line", restricts them from having access to fully one-third of their native soil, which is reported at this time to be suffering from neglect in the hands of the Turkish forces that are occupying it.

This island is divided, but only one part of it is internationally recognized as legitimate—the Republic of Cyprus and its elected President, Mr. George Vassiliou. The fact remains that only the government of Turkey recognizes the "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus" and its leader, Mr. Rauf Denktash.

Our Nation as well as the international community must be made to recognize the importance of promoting dialog which will lead to the reunification of Cyprus. It is essential that the United Nations, led by Secretary General de Cuellar, use its resources as a positive influence to bring together Mr. Denktash and Mr. Vassiliou for meaningful and productive dialogue.

There is great opportunity now for peaceful change in Cyprus. Mr. Vassiliou, who has shown himself to be a determined, pragmatic, and energetic leader, appears eager to work toward resolution of this impasse. He deserves our strong support for his initiatives. Hopefully, Mr. Denktash can be persuaded to engage himself in a spirit of full cooperation so that together they can bring to the Cypriot people the opportunity to fully and freely enjoy the wealth of their island and the peace of a demilitarized, democratic, and free Cyprus.

FEDERAL PRIORITIES: THE VIEW FROM MAIN STREET NORTH

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, last week, President Bush sent his budget message to Capitol Hill. In Wednesday night's State of the Union Address, the President outlined his view of America and his administration's goals for the coming year.

Mr. Speaker, what I heard the President say that night is quite different from what my constituents in Minnesota are telling me. I have been holding a series of public forums in Duluth, the largest city in my district, to determine public opinion on Federal spending priorities. Entitled "Main Street North," these forums provide the people with the opportunity to stand up and speak their minds on these issues.

Since January 8, I have held three such forums, focusing on defense, hunger and housing, and the environment. Two additional forums, on health and education, will be held between now and March 5. What I have heard so far, Mr. Speaker, is this: America needs to do more to address the social needs of our population, and reduce the slice of our budget devoted to military programs.

Today, I submit to you and my colleagues in the House a portion of the testimony gathered at the first Main Street North forum. In coming days and weeks I intend to include additional testimony in the RECORD until every voice has been heard.

These are not the words of soldiers, politicians or think-tank experts. These are the words of the common people, whose hard-earned tax dollars finance the programs we design and the priorities we set. As we undertake this year's budget process, I feel it is urgent that we read, know, and understand the views of the men and women who sent us here to serve.

I urge you to listen to the voices from Main Street North.

REMARKS OF TIMOTHY J. ALLISON BEFORE THE FORUM ON "NEW DIRECTIONS IN NATIONAL DEFENSE," JAN. 10, 1990

Good evening Congressman, ladies and gentlemen. I'd like to welcome you to the UMD campus. My name is Tim Allison and I am the Legislative Director for UMD Student Association. I am happy to be here tonight to share with you my views on the future of federal funding and the impact that the events in Eastern Europe will have on our national defense and overall government spending.

As peace and democracy "break out" in Eastern Europe, the United States must take a look at its spending priorities and revise as the changing world circumstances dictate. In my opinion, the present world circumstances call for a gradual decrease in the America's military spending. Apparently, I'm not alone. According to a Gallup poll released in this morning's edition of the Minneapolis Star Tribune, fifty percent of Americans think defense spending is too high.

Of course I have some suggestions as to where this money should be spent. As an economics major I find it hard to imagine running even a business, much less an entire government, the way the U.S. Government is being run. How can a government consistantly spend more than they take in? AND How long can they keep it up? I see a lot of merit in the idea that the government should maintain and possibly increase spending in tough times in order to stimulate the economy. However, for this strategy to work the government must make up for this excess spending by saving money during the prosperous times. The national debt is a concern that cannot and should not be put off any longer.

Having clearly stated my number one budget priority, I would like to also briefly touch on one other issue I consider to be crucial for the future of the nation: Education.

In the 1988 presidential campaign, education was a major issue. Both candidates sought to portray themselves as a leader that, if elected president, would make the education of the future leaders of this country one of their top priorities. President Bush has even gone as far as to say that he wants to be known as the "education president." These events are directly related to the growing importance that the public is placing on education and higher education. Our elected officials are responding positively to this concern because they too realize that education is absolutely crucial to the future of this nation. Through education we may one day find newer and better ways to care for our children and our elderly, to employ a nation, to provide for a better defense, to feed the starving, to house the homeless, to provide health care, and possibly even to find a cure for cancer and a host of other maladies that plague our country and the world.

I will concentrate my remarks here today on the part of education that I know best; higher education. I am very troubled by what I see occurring on the national level. Higher education has fallen in priorities. I have been disappointed and, to be frank, a little upset with our elected officials over the last few years. It appears that the ball has been dropped in terms of advancing the cause of higher education. One example of the severity of the situation can be seen in the move by the federal government to cutting grant aid to the bare bones while attempting to cover this with aid in the form of loans. Using myself for an example, I think you will see why I am worried about the future of my generation. By the time I receive my undergraduate degree, I will be over $13,000 in debt. I am considering law school, but I shudder to think of owing another $15-21,000 on top of the $13,000 I already owe. Whether I go into law or not. I will be looking for the job that best helps me get my head above water again.

In growing up and in my experiences at UMD, I have developed a strong sense of the responsibility that we all share in making our communities and our world a better place. However, when I have a debt burden that lies as a heavy weight on my shoulders, I am forced to be part of the "me" generation that considers themselves before even considering career options that may be more beneficial to society.

Higher education is the very heart of this nation. Without a strong heart, the nation does not have a strong future. I am worried about the direction the federal government has taken in the last few years. If steps aren't taken to move higher education in a forward direction again soon, the damage may be irreversable.

Senators and Representatives are generally supportive of increasing funding to higher education but often ask where the money should come from. My response is that I am not in as good of a position as you are to know the answer to that. As our congressional representatives, you have been elected to set the priorities of a nation. I say only that education should and must be a top priority for this nation. It is that important.

Let me close by leaving you with this thought—As students, we are constantly being told that we are the leaders of tomorrow; but in order for that to become a reality, we are going to need help from the leaders of our country.

REMARKS OF MARTHA B. ALWORTH

Congressman Oberstar: Thank you for arranging these Main Street North forums. Although you are always responsive to our letters, these personal contacts really are of enormous value to us, your constituents.

I have served as a member of the League of Women Voters, Duluth, Committee on International Relations for over twenty years. During that time, the League, nationally, has concerned itself with issues affecting our National Security. It has conducted two two-year studies on Arms Control objectives and Military Policy goals as reflected in the Military Budget. As a result of these national studies, the League's lobbying positions are, in brief: (1) to work to limit reliance on military force in areas where diplomacy and/or economic-social aid could be used, (2) to examine military spending in the context of total national needs.

The League believes that national security has many dimensions and cannot be limited to military policy alone. National Security can be defined as ensuring domestic tranquility, providing for the common defense, and promoting the general welfare. Key elements include the country's ability to implement social and environmental programs, and to maintain cooperative relationships with other nations. Other important components include effective political leadership and strong economy. Therefore, in decisions about the federal budget, the League urges Congressional leaders to assess the impact of U.S. military spending on the nation's economy and the ability of the budget to meet social and environmental needs.

The League believes that military force should be used as a tool of last resort. To this end we urge a cessation of underground nuclear testing. We urge the negotiation of a Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty as the logical conclusion to the Limited Test Ban Treaty signed in 1963 by the U.S., Great Britain, and the Soviet Union. In 1985, the U.S.S.R. unilaterally began a 19 month moratorium on nuclear testing. The U.S. refused to join the moratorium at that time, citing lack of verification capabilities.

In 1989, at the Second World Conference of Mayors, 50 mayors from 13 countries wrote to President Bush and to Chairman Gorbachev urging them to sign the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty in a gesture toward world peace.

In May of 1989, President Mitterand of France indicated his willingness to sign the C.T.B. Treaty.

Our military budget could be reduced by the signing of the C.T.B. Treaty. Those funds allocated to the Department of Energy for nuclear testing, for the core test program, and for testing nuclear-directed-energy weapons, as well as for safeguards, security, and construction could be eliminated.

In the light of the changes in Eastern Europe and in the U.S.S.R., we feel that the foreign policy which dictated the massive military build-up (including funding for S.D.I.) since 1980, should be reexamined as to its relevance now.

We are told that Secretary of State Baker will go to Moscow early next month to clear away obstacles to a new U.S.-Soviet treaty, which would sharply reduce long-range nuclear missiles. Any military budget discussions should reflect the goal of the projected summit meetings to slash U.S. and Soviet arsenals of long-range bombers, submarines, and missiles by 30 to 50 percent. If these objectives are seriously pursued by the Funding Authorization committees, the military budget will certainly be presented with a different target as far as our military purposes are concerned.

My remarks will be brief because as our name "Lutheran Coalition for Public Policy in Minnesota" implies our mandate is advocacy at the state legislative level. However, we felt compelled to give testimony on the issue of military spending, possible cuts in the military budget, etc., because we are concerned that domestic issues haven't been dealt with because of the high priority given to our military buildup.

LCPPM's major areas of advocacy this year: Children at risk, access to affordable health care, communities at risk (housing, jobs), agriculture and food, the environment, are all impacted by lack of federal funds, lack of federal priority and lack of federal leadership.

It is obvious that cuts in military spending could free up much needed monies. The 1 million dollars/day given in military aid to El Salvador or the money spent on just one missile could find many uses at the state level: full funding of the WIC program, child care, better VA services, affordable housing, providing funds for critical needs in our educational system—the list is long and the needs are immense.

A less obvious benefit than the millions saved by cutting the military budget would be the reprioritizing of national goals away from militarization. The headlines now grabbed by military weapons, military intervention, put news of basic human needs here and around the world on the back page of our papers.

On Monday in the Duluth paper, while the front page headlines were still concerned with Panama, on the inside of the front page was this 9 line item: A homeless man found frozen in a snowbank has been identified as Glenn Howard age 33, who had played Santa Claus on Christmas Day for a homeless shelter where he regularly volunteered. The last line states that Mr. Howard is the 4th homeless man to die in St. Paul in the last month. Would this have been front page news 10 years ago? I think so. Do we need to refocus some of our national priorities? I think so.

As critical as the need for money and priority is the need for leadership at the federal level to solve some very complex problems. Is there any doubt that the time, money, and brainpower going into the development of Star Wars directly correlates with the time, money, and brainpower not going into the development of a sound environmental program.

My father-in-law, a farmer in North Dakota, has a missile site in his pasture—a mile from his house. While we put missiles in farmers fields, small farmers in Carlton, Aitkin, and St. Louis county are being forced off their farms because we lack the leadership on the federal level to develop a just and ecologically sound farm program.

Yes, we need the money saved by military cuts but just as importantly we need our Federal leadership to refocus our national priorities away from militarization and onto the basic needs of our citizens, and to lead the struggle to solve some of our very difficult problems . . . or our national security will be threatened from within rather than from without.

"MAIN STREET NORTH" TESTIMONY—KENT PETERS, DIOCESE OF DULUTH, OFFICE FOR THE SOCIAL APOSTOLATE, JANUARY 10, 1990

I speak this evening as Director of the Office for the Social Apostolate in the Catholic Diocese of Duluth. We in the Diocese commend you for your promptness in attempting to redirect our national spending priorities in the wake of recent positive changes in the world political climate, and we thank you for the opportunity to assist you in developing a consensus on the needs of our communities and possible agenda that will help solve our common problems.

The Catholic Church of Duluth, along with other Christian and Non-Christian religious denominations, are strongly striving to be more sensitive to the unmet needs of individuals in our local community. We have a deep interest in helping our community develop economic and cultural structures that will give individuals the opportunity to live out their lives in equality and dignity. Our sincere hope is that the perspective we share, as one religious community, will help you to develop a national spending strategy that will aid our local efforts to include every individual in the mainstream of our society.

Over the past five years our nation has become comfortable with the fact that the poverty rate in the United States has not increased. In fact, the gap between the rich and poor is at an all time post-war high. Between 1979 and 1988 the poorest fifth and the second poorest fifth of Americans lost 6.1% and 2.1% of their average income respectively, whereas the richest fifth had an income gain of a full 12%.

Our sincere hope is that Congress and the White House will succeed in channeling the heavy flow of dollars and resources away from the pentagon and industries related to war readiness and toward agencies and activities that will have a real impact on the building up of our society. Today we are being given an opportunity we may never see again, a golden opportunity. Please make your attempt to redirect our national priorities a valiant one, one that at the dawn of the new millennium, we will look on with a great sense of pride.

I would like to share just a few comments on our local situation. Single people experience many difficulties when wages are low and taxes are high—over the past 20 years Minnesota has moved toward a more regressive tax structure. Low income people pay a disproportionate portion of their income for taxes when compared to the affluent. It is the family, however, i.e., married couples with children and single parents with children, that suffer the most. They carry the responsibility of bringing up the next generation, a very expensive proposition. The financial burdens facing families today are overwhelming, and the societal rewards for undertaking this important vocation are all but nonexistent.

The Catholic church has affirmed time and time again that the family is, "the primary and vital cell of society" (Vat. II, Decree on the Laity, sec. 11). The family must be considered the key to building a vibrant society. If the family fails at its task of preparing children for responsible adulthood, the society we live in will not survive the next decade. If families succeed in preparing the next generation, we can look forward to healthier times. The health of our society is directly related to how well families perform their duties. We ask, then, that if there is to be a redirecting of financial resources at the national level, every decision in that process keep in mind the difficulties moderate, low and no income families face in raising children. Let health, housing, education and the family's ability to be present to young children become the priorities of the 90s. The 90s should become the decade of the family.

Perhaps a concrete suggestion would help indicate the direction we would like Congress to take in addressing the needs of families. For low and moderate income working families, we propose a dramatic increase in the personal exemption for children, thus reducing a family's overall tax burden. The present amount for the personal exemption for children is $2,000. We would propose a sliding scale for the personal exemption for dependents; an increase to $6,000 for our nation's lowest income families, with the figure decreasing gradually to the level of $2,000 for those families able to adequately provide for their children's needs.

Families with no income should be provided with employment opportunities made possible through tax incentives given to stimulate economic activity in local communities or welfare programs that promote dignity and the will to enter the work force when employment is available.

Families with young children that choose to have one spouse at home should be able to make ends meet with one income. Perhaps a special withholding allowance could be given to families that have a full time presence of one spouse in the home.

Please consider ideas such as these, and others that will be proposed over the next few weeks, that attempt to give families and individuals the ability to provide for themselves within the economic and social structures we have created. We can build a workable economy and conditions that make providing for family and self a realizable goal.

Thank you for allowing me the opportunity to share my thoughts with you.

A PEACE DIVIDEND WITH NO DOLLAR OR RUBLE PRICE TAG

HON. TONY P. HALL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues an article I wrote which offers some additional views to the debate over the peace dividend. I believe it is important to recognize the noncash benefits that this peace dividend could offer us. I am submitting the recent oped piece which was published in the Los Angeles Times on January 31, 1990.

The article follows:

A "PEACE DIVIDEND" WITH NO DOLLAR OR RUBLE PRICE TAG

(By Tony Hall)

(Third World: An agreement between the superpowers to allow safe passage of food and medicine through battle lines would cost nothing but could save millions of lives.)

It would be a mistake to think of the "peace dividend" only in terms of ledger lines and cash flow. There is more to a peace dividend than cold currency. The very absence of an atmosphere of flammable tension is itself a dividend that could be put to use now, and in doing so we would save more than money. Without costing our Treasury a dime, the superpowers could spend a dividend of cooperation on the Third World and save lives.

In the Horn of Africa, for example, the situation in Ethiopia has reached a near-crisis stage. Current estimates place almost 5 million people at immediate risk of famine. Like the crises of 1984 and 1987, the direct cause of the problem is drought and crop failures, exacerbated by seemingly endless war and civil strife. Unlike the 1984 episode, this time relief arrived before the famine, yet it hasn't been delivered to all the people in need.

The missing element is an agreement between government forces and Eritrean separatists to establish "corridors of safe passage" through which food and medical supplies could be safely delivered across the battle lines, directly to the population at risk.

The rebel armies in Eritrea and Tigre province have shown a willingness to agree to safe passage; the only holdout is the government of President Mengistu Haile Mariam. With aid unable to reach the people, they will soon begin to leave their homes in search of food and safety, leaving no one to plant next year's crops. These migrations are already beginning. Soon television will again bring us the horrifying spectacle of children dying, and the nation of Ethiopia will again become synonymous with famine.

The United States has pressed the Ethiopian government to agree to corridors of safe passage, the Soviet Union has not. We don't have as much influence over Mengistu as the Soviets, largely because they continue to deliver weapons to Ethiopia. The Soviets have agreed to halt the arms shipments by the end of next year, but there is much more they could do.

A non-cash peace dividend of cooperation could save hundreds of thousands of lives now. In the new spirit of cooperation, why not a joint public statement by Secretary of State James A. Baker III and his Soviet counterpart, Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze, stressing the importance of relief corridors, and promising vigorous diplomatic efforts by both countries to secure them?

We could choose to continue foreign policy as usual, and hundreds of thousands of people would die unnecessarily over the next six months in a sad, distant list of places: Angola, Ethiopia, Sudan, Somalia, Afghanistan.

Or we could decide that this is where our peace dividend could be spent, at no cost to either government in dollars or rubles. President Bush and Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev could endorse the Bellagio Declaration, a call made recently by a prestigious group of development experts to eliminate "deaths due to famine among the 15 million to 35 million people at risk" in the Third World. Both the United States and the Soviet Union could pledge to use diplomatic efforts to assist and expedite the work of private relief organizations fighting famine and disease in the Third World. As simple as that sounds, it would be a tremendous step forward and would literally save lives.

Until now, the superpowers have exacerbated the problems of developing countries by treating them primarily as surrogate battle fields for competing ideologies. Now, a new reality is within reach; many lives could be spared if Americans and Soviets quickly agreed to cooperate in multinational efforts to end famine deaths. It is ultimately in neither nation's interests to allow needless Third World suffering to continue.

Events in Eastern Europe and relations between the superpowers have been moving faster than our ability to shape them. In this, the warmest winter of the Cold War, we have the chance to get ahead of history with respect to nations below the Equator not to react to events as opposing forces, but to join together as a humanitarian force to prevent unnecessary suffering and death.

TRIBUTE TO JUDGE HARRY PERKINS

HON. NEAL SMITH

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, as we consider the value of public service performed by various categories of officials in our Federal-State-local system, I think it is appropriate and perhaps overdue to focus on the contribution of State court judges to our self-governing society. Too often fair, competent, and conscientious judges are paid far less than they could have earned as a practicing lawyer and are underappreciated by the society they serve so well. Yet a good judge, although comparatively unsung in terms of public praise makes an enormous difference—not only to the quality of justice but to the quality of living—for all of us.

On February 15, a premier example of this kind of judge is retiring as State district court judge in Polk County, IA, after 25 years of distinguished service on the bench. I have known Judge Harry Perkins since law school days as a student, a young lawyer, as the chief prosecutor of Polk County—county attorney—and as a judge. In my opinion, he epitomizes that quality we associate with our best judges—the judicial temperament. He knows and is deeply committed to the law, is fair to a fault, reasonable, compassionate, and without bias or the least tendency toward self-aggrandizement.

Harry Perkins was born in Des Moines in 1923, is a graduate of East Des Moines High School, served in the Army in World War II, attended Drake University, and was awarded his degree from the Drake Law School in 1950. After 5 years in private practice followed by service as county attorney, he was appointed as State district county judge by Governor Hughes in 1965.

As prosecuting attorney and as judge, Harry Perkins has combined firmness and fairness. He is respected by his fellow members of the legal profession and by the public as well. He has never sought headlines but he has been a just and wise judge—one whose integrity and fidelity to the public good has made this a stronger and better nation.

THE FEDERAL EMPLOYEES PAY COMPARABILITY ACT OF 1990

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Federal Employees Pay Comparability Act of 1990.

For the last 12 years, Federal employees have received pay adjustments which were less than those recommended by the President's pay agent. Last August, the President's pay agent reported an average pay gap of 28.62 percent. Because of this gap, Federal agencies are having increasingly serious problems recruiting and retaining qualified individuals. I'm sure that my colleagues have all heard from Federal agencies that cannot hire lawyers, accountants, scientists, engineers, law enforcement officers, and scores of other types of employees.

The General Accounting Office has reported to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service that chemists working for the Federal Government are as much as 50 percent behind private sector chemists. Government accountants find themselves 46 percent behind. Engineers are in a similar position. Many senior scientists have left the National Institutes of Health for private sector salaries ranging from 50 to 300 percent higher than their Federal Government pay.

In an attempt to cope with these problems, Federal agencies have resorted to special pay rate authority. This authority was originally enacted to provide higher pay for those occupations where comparability increases proved insufficient to recruit and retain qualified employees. In fiscal year 1984, 28,000 Federal employees were covered by special pay rates. By the end of fiscal year 1988, 152,000 Federal employees were covered.

Expanded use of the special pay rate authority is further evidence that the Federal pay system is not working.

The Federal Employees Pay Comparability Act of 1990 is designed to make the Federal Government a competitive employer again. First, my bill would provide annual pay adjustments for all white-collar Federal employees equal to the Employment Cost Index [ECI]. The ECI is a quarterly measure of the cost of labor in the private sector and is computed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics [BLS].

In addition, my bill would authorize BLS to conduct locality pay surveys for six broad categories of jobs, including: clerical, technical, professional, administrative, law enforcement, firefighters, and health care. Those categories where Federal pay lags behind private sector pay by more than 1 percent will receive an adjustment.

The boundaries for the geographic areas that BLS will survey will be drawn by the Federal Salary Council established by the bill. The members of the Council would include: the Directors of the Office of Personnel Management and Office of Management and Budget, the Secretary of Labor, and three other members appointed by the President. There will be six representatives of employee organizations on the Council. The Chairperson of the Council will be selected by the members.

The locality surveys performed by BLS will be done every 3 years so that one-third of the white-collar work force will be surveyed in any 1 year. In addition, the locality adjustments will be phased in over 3 years.

The bill also increases the circumstances under which an agency may request special pay rates. The broader circumstances would include: higher pay rates in the non-Federal sector for similar jobs; higher pay rates at other Federal agencies; undesirable working conditions including exposure to toxic substances or other occupational hazards, and any other circumstances which the President or his designee may identify. The bill also eliminates the requirement that employees be hired at step one of a grade for positions below GS–11.

The bill would also allow the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to designate up to 400 positions Government-wide as "critical." Those positions could be paid up to the rate for Executive Level I—Cabinet level.

The bill also creates a new pay system for administrative law judges and members of boards of contract appeals. These employees will have three pay levels set by Presidential Executive order within a range. The maximum rate will be Executive Level IV and the minimum rate would be GS–16, step 1.

Mr. Speaker, reforming the Federal pay system has a cost, but I ask my colleagues to bear in mind that it represents the cost of fixing 12 years of neglect.

Ultimately, the quality of the Federal work force determines the quality of service received by our constituents. I ask my colleagues to join with me in reforming the Federal pay system.

THE INTRODUCTION OF THE ANTARCTIC PROTECTION AND CONSERVATION ACT OF 1990

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that will clearly distinguish the United States as the primary environmental leader among the Antarctic Treaty nations. This legislation will provide further protection to the Antarctic environment; prevent the exploration and exploitation of Antarctic mineral resources by U.S. citizens; and urges other nations to join the United States in negotiating a new agreement to provide permanent environmental protection for Antarctica.

Despite Antarctica's service climate, the continent contains a unique and important variety of plants and animals. Primitive soils provide nutrients to 700 species of spares vegetation that serves as food for over 200 species of invertebrates and other simple terrestrial organisms. In contrast to the land, Antarctic marine life is much more abundant due to the nutrient-rich waters. Krill, a small shrimplike organism, congregate in large swarms facilitating the feeding of 50 species of birds, 6 seal species, and several species of whales and squid. While the Antarctic Ocean can also support large populations of seals and seabirds, many of the birds including five species of penguins, three species of petrels, and two seal species use the land for breeding purposes. Several species only occur in Antarctica.

Time magazine, in a recent cover story that I will submit for the RECORD, summarizes the abuses man is inflicting on the Antarctic continent. These include oilspills, dumping of untreated sewage off the coasts, buring garbage in open pits, and disturbing native wildlife during visits by tourists, just to name a few. The United States should not be contributing to this degradation in an area that we value so highly for its pristine environment. Many of our key scientific investigations depend on the uniqueness and quality of the Antarctic environment. Yet we, and other nations, are contributing to the lowering of environmental quality by many of our actions.

Existing treaties and agreements are not capable, in the final analysis, of providing complete protection for the Antarctic environment. Mineral exploration by all nations should be permanently banned. We ought to require all Federal Government-sponsored action to be subject to environmental regulation. We should regulate the environmental impacts from tourism and commercial fishing. These principles, incorporated in this bill, are necessary to preserve and conserve the fragile ecosystem of Antarctica. Our unilateral protection of this last frontier on Earth can provide the framework for international cooperation among all Antarctic Treaty parties to universally and permanently protect this irreplaceable resource.

Now is the time to say that this continent should be preserved for future generations to continue the cooperative research that has defined the purpose of Antarctica for the last 30 years. I believe this bill will establish the United States as the leader in the protection of the Antarctic environment.

Mr. Speaker, today we have a rare opportunity to leave a lasting legacy to future generations, to preserve a continent, pristine and intact. Let's not forgo this opportunity. Let's take the lead in the world to preserve this unique ecosystem.

I have included a section-by-section summary of the bill and I urge all Members to join me and Chairman JONES as cosponsors to this legislation.

SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY

Section 1. Short title: Antarctic Protection and Conservation Act of 1990.

Section 2. Findings and statement of purpose.

Section 3. Definitions: The terms defined in this section include Antarctica; person; Under Secretary; mineral resources; Antarctic mineral resources activity; prospecting; exploration; and development.

Section 4. Prohibition on Antarctic mineral resource activity: Prohibits any person from engaging in or financing prospecting, exploration or development of minerals.

Section 5. Regulation of tourist expeditions: Establishes regulations on the activity of tourists, qualifications of tour guides, tour vessel safety standards, and training requirements for vessel officers and crew. The regulations would cover such items as foot traffic in fragile areas, dumping of plastics and garbage, and minimum observation distances for viewing wildlife. Interference in specially protected areas and unique scientific areas and the taking of souvenirs would be prohibited.

Section 6. Environmental impact assessment of United States activities in Antarctica: Requires United States agencies or others receiving funds from the Federal Government to comply with the National Environmental Policy Act.

Section 7. Commercial fishing: Requires development of fishery management plans to conserve marine resources before fishing can be undertaken by U.S. fishermen.

Section 8. International agreement: Directs the Secretary of State to enter into negotiations with other Antarctic Treaty parties to ban mineral resource activities and permanently conserve and protect the Antarctic environment.

Section 9. Civil penalties: Provides for the assessment of penalties, hearings, review, and relationship to penalties under other laws.

Section 10. Criminal penalties: Provides for fines under title 18 United States Code or imprisonment for up to one year or both.

Section 11. Authorization of appropriations: Authorizes such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of the act.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE 1990 CONGRESS-BUNDESTAG STAFF EXCHANGE

HON. RALPH REGULA

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, since 1983 the United States Congress and the West German Parliament, the Bundestag, have conducted an annual exchange program in which staff members from both countries observe and learn about the workings of each other's political constitutions first hand and convey the views of Members from both sides on issues faced by both countries. The exchange also provides an opportunity for the development of professional relationships which will be beneficial to both countries over the long term.

This exchange program is one of several sponsored by both public and private institutions in the United States and West Germany to foster better understanding of the institutions and policies of both countries.

This year, eight congressional staff members will visit Germany April 21 to May 6. They will spend about 10 days in Bonn attending meetings conducted by members of the Bundestag, Bundestag staffers, and representatives of political business, labor, academic, and media institutions. They will spend a weekend in the district of a Bundestag member. The program will conclude with a visit to Berlin during which the delegates will meet with representatives of the West Berlin Government and United States Government representatives in both West and East Berlin.

A comparable delegation of Bundestag staffers will come to the United States in late June for a 3-week period. They will attend similar meetings here in Washington and will visit the districts of Members of Congress over the Fourth of July recess.

The program is truly a two-way street; accordingly, participants should be experienced Hill staffers so that they can contribute to the success of the exchange on both sides of the Atlantic. The Bundestag sends senior staffers to the United States and a number of high ranking members of the Bundestag take the time to meet with our staffers. The United States has tried to reciprocate.

Therefore, participants should have a demonstrable interest in, if now some direct responsibility for, political, security, trade, or environmental issues as they relate to Europe in general and Germany in particular. In addition, U.S. participants will be expected to help plan and execute the program for the Bundestag staffers when they visit the United States. Among the contributions participants should expect to make the planning, the conducting topical meetings for the Bundestag staffers, and hosting one or two of the staffers in their Member's district over the Fourth of July.

Applications for participation in the United States delegation will be reviewed initially by the Congressional Staff Group on German-American Affairs; final selection of the delegation will be made by the U.S. Information Agency.

Senators and Representatives who would like a member of their staff to apply for participation in this year's program should direct them to submit a resume and cover letter in which they state why they believe that they are qualified and giving some assurance of their ability to participate during the time stated to Connie Jones, Office of Congressman Ralph Regula, 2207 Rayburn, by Thursday, March 1.

RECIPROCAL CALL BILLING ARRANGEMENTS

HON. BEN ERDREICH

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to simplify the billing procedure in situations where physicians offer the courtesy of cross-covering for one another's patients on a reciprocal basis. This legislation will allow doctors to continue the longstanding professional courtesy of covering for their colleagues when they cannot be on duty and will allow patients to continue to receive uninterrupted care.

My legislation would eliminate the Health Care Financing Administration's dictum requiring a covering physician to bill in his own name and Medicare provider number for any services performed. This reassignment prohibition even includes those services provided when a physician covers for a colleague who belongs to the same incorporated group practice. Likewise, under this directive a physician who sees a patient on a referral basis only once will be forced to process the paperwork to bill this individual as well as file the Medicare claim.

Enforcement of the current HCFA regulation would increase administrative expenses of both accounting staffs and Medicare carriers by requiring more employee time to deal with the new volume of paperwork. We all know that such an increase in expenses will ultimately be passed on to the taxpayers in the form of higher health care costs. I have long held that we must push for the highest quality care possible at the lowest feasible cost. I believe that this HCFA directive is both awkward and unnecessarily expensive.

In addition to streamlining office procedures for physicians, my legislation will have the added benefit of allowing patients to continue to receive one bill and file one claim. This proposal would eliminate the potential for confusion caused when patients are forced to decipher the different billing systems and fee structures of other physicians. Further, this legislation would remove HCFA's added obstacle to referral services which, in the case of seriously ill or elderly patients, could prove life threatening.

This legislation will preserve the courtesy service of cross-covering among physicians and will eliminate the imprudent and unnecessary HCFA directive which, if strictly enforced, will only serve to augment the bureaucratic nightmare which afflicts our Nation's healthcare system. I therefore urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

INTRODUCTION OF THE CLOSED-CAPTIONED TELEVISION IN PUBLIC FACILITIES ACT OF 1990

HON. MARILYN LLOYD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 7, 1990

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, today it is a great pleasure for me to introduce the Close-Captioned Television in Public Facilities Act of 1990. My bill is designed to increase opportunities for access to the crucial information available via television for the very large deaf and hearing-impaired segment of our Nation's population.

First, I would like to mention that it was 2 years ago this month, in February 1988, that the Commission on the Education of the Deaf reported to the President and to Congress on the great promise of closed-captioned television. At that time we were advised that the most rapid progress for persons who are deaf and hearing-impaired could be made by exploiting a technology that has been with us for some time—closed captioning—the appearance on screen of what is being said. This important technology is available and I believe it is high time that Congress mandate its use.

Before I describe how my bill will improve access to closed-captioned television, I would like to explain why this legislation is important. For 37 million citizens in the United States that suffer hearing impairment, and the 14 million persons with sufficient enough hearing impairment to deny them access to television, the Commission's report held out hope. A hope that finally they would be able to benefit from a wide range of information that those of us who hear take for granted. Please understand that we are talking about more than entertainment. Television is a critical source of communication, providing world news, information of local events, and serving an important educational role.

Unless television broadcasts are encoded for closed captions and decoding devices are available, deaf and hearing-impaired individuals are unable to receive even the most urgent advisory messages about emergencies and catastrophes. For example, I am advised that during the recent major earthquake in the San Francisco Bay Area, it was several days before closed-captioned newscasts were broadcast. I can only imagine the panic that must have been felt by hearing impaired individuals in the devastated area who were unable to determine where they should go for food, shelter, medical, and other services. Information of fire warnings, gas leakages, transportation, and safe drinking water was unavailable to members of the deaf community during this emergency.

The loss of communication due to impaired hearing is a particularly important issue to older adults in our society. Nearly 38 percent of older Americans suffer from some loss of hearing and could potentially benefit from closed-captioning technology. Approximately 1 in 4 persons between the age of 65 and 74 has a hearing impairment. This is twice the rate of individuals age 45 to 64. Moreover, in the age bracket 75 and older, 4 out of 10 persons have hearing loss.
